ESSAY III.

ON THE ENGLISH LAW OF BAILMENTS.

THE case of Doorman v. Jenkins which we have before quoted (a) was an action of trespas against a bailee; it was proved that the defendant, a Coffee-house keeper, having custody of money without reward lost it, and made the following statement:—that he had unfortunately put it with a larger sum of money of his own into his cash-box, which was kept in his tap-room; that the tap-room had a bar in it, and was open on a Sunday, but the rest of his house, which was inhabited, was not open on Sunday; and that the cash-box, with his own and the plaintiff's money, had been stolen on that day. TAUNTON, J. said, a great deal has been said on the point, whether the existence of gross negligence is a question of law or fact.

It is not necessary to enter into that as an abstract question. Such a question will always depend upon circumstances. There may be cases where the question of gross negligence is matter of law more than of fact, and others where it is matter of fact more than of law. An action brought against an attorney for negligence, turns upon matter of law rather than fact. It charges the attorney with having undertaken to perform the business properly, and alleges that, from his failure so to do, such and such injuries resulted to the plaintiff. Now, in nineteen cases out of twenty, unless the court told the jury that the injurious results did, in point of law, follow from the misconduct of the defendant, they would be utterly unable to form a judgment on the matter. Yet, even there, the jury have to determine whether, in point of fact, the defendant has been guilty of that particular misconduct. On the other hand, take the case of an action against a Surgeon for negligence in the treatment of his patient. What law can there possibly be in the question, whether such and such conduct amounts to negligence? That must be determined entirely by the jury. Without therefore laying down any abstract rule, we may, I think, with perfect safety say that, in the present case, the question was entirely for the jury. It is fact, not law. The circumstances are extremely simple. The defendant receives money to be kept for the plaintiff. What care does he exercise? He puts it together with money of his own (which I think perfectly immaterial), into the till of a public-house. We might certainly have had more explicit evidence as to the exact state of the box; in what place it was; and what class of strangers frequented the room. If there was no negligence, if the box was locked up and put in a safe place, and proper care taken of it, these were circumstances which the defendant had the best means of knowing, and, knowing them, he might have exonerated himself. In the absence, therefore, of evidence to that effect, I think that there was a prima facie case of gross negligence, which required an answer on the defendant's part. The phrase "gross negligence" means nothing more than a great and aggravated degree of negligence, as distinguished from negligence of a lower degree. (b) The case of Shiells v. Blackburne (c) created at first some degree of doubt in our minds. It was said that the court, in that case, treated the matter as a question of law, and set aside the verdict, because the thing charged, the false description of the leather in the entry, did not amount to gross negligence; and therefore the jury had mistaken the law. I do not view the case in that light. The jury there found, that in fact the defendant had been guilty of negligence; but the court thought that they had drawn a wrong conclusion as to that fact. The case, therefore, does not stand against the conclusion to which I have come. It does not appear certainly from the report, how the case was treated at the trial, nor what the judge said in summing up. But I do not find it laid down, as a rule, that in every case the question of negligence is to be matter of law. The ordinary practice is to leave it to the jury, whether such negligence has been proved as the plaintiff has charged in his declaration. If the negligence so charged be insufficient to give a right of action, the defendant may move in arrest of judgment.

PATTERSON, J. said,—It is agreed on all hands that the defendant is not liable, unless he has been guilty of gross negligence. The difficulty lies in determining what is gross negligence, and whether that is to be decided by the jury or the court. If the court is to decide it, and no evidence has been given that satisfies the court, there ought to have been a nonsuit. If the jury was to decide, I cannot feel a doubt that there was some evidence for them. I agree that the onus probandi was on the plaintiff. It appeared, by the evidence of what the defendant had said, that the money committed to his charge was laid in a box in the tap-room.

LORD TENTERDEN directed the jury to consider whether there was great negligence, which they found and found a verdict for the plaintiff.

which room was open on a Sunday, though the rest of the premises were not. Under these circumstances there can be no nonsuit; or there was a sufficient case to go to the jury. Whether, in the abstract, the question of negligence be for the jury or the court, I think it unnecessary, as my brother Taunton says, to determine. The present, at all events, is a question of fact, and therefore for the jury. The general question I approach with much diffidence. I do not know any thing more difficult than to say, in mixed questions of law and fact, what is for the court and what for the jury. In the present case, the principal doubt in my mind arose from the case of Shiells v. Blackburne. The facts in that case were not disputed. It appeared that the defendant, being employed (without reward) to send out some dressed leather, carried it at the Custom House, together with some dressed leather of his own, as ought leather, in consequence of which the whole was seized. Whether that amounted to gross negligence must have been a question for the jury. The report does not show how they were directed, nor whether the judge told them that, in his opinion, it was gross negligence. At first I conceived that nothing appeared from the report except that the court thought it was not a case of gross negligence; but on looking into the case, I find the court thought the jury had made the fact erroneously, and sent the issue to another jury.

WILLIAMS, J. said,—The only question before us is, whether the judge should have held that the case was not made out on the facts of the plaintiff, or should have left it to the jury? If the judge be obliged to lay down a rule, it is extremely difficult to discover what that rule ought to be. Who can say where “gross negligence” begins? Can it be other than a question of fact? The case was properly left to the jury. The report of Shiells v. Blackburne does not show how the case was submitted to the jury.

In Reece v. Rigby, (d) which was an action against an attorney for negligence, ABBOTT, C. J., left it to the jury to say, whether, under the circumstances, the defendant had used reasonable care and diligence: he did not take it from their cognizance, and pronounce his own opinion, and the verdict was not disturbed. In Moore v. Mourgee, (e) where the defendant was charged with negligence in insuring at a wrong office, (f) LORD MANSFIELD states his own direction thus:—“My direction to the jury was general; that if they thought there was gross negligence, or the defendant had acted malâ fide, they should find for the plaintiff.” In that case, again, we see that the judge did not take into his own hands, as a question of law, what was gross negligence and what not; and there the court above would not grant a new trial.

LORD DENMAN, C. J., said,—It appeared to me that some degree of negligence was clearly proved in the first instance. I thought, and I still think, it impossible for a judge to take upon himself to say whether negligence is gross or not. I agree to all the legal doctrine in Shiells v. Blackburne, which is, merely, that a bailee without reward is not liable to an action without proof of gross negligence. I do not find a word there to the effect that the judge is to say whether, in fact, negligence is gross or not. I certainly did not take the view which the jury did of this case, and I pressed, as strongly as possible, my opinion upon them.

(e) 2 Cowp. 479.

(f) In Wilkinson v. Coverdale, 1 Esp. 74, it was alleged that the defendant had undertaken gratuitously to get a fire policy renewed for the plaintiff, but had in doing so neglected certain formalities, the omission of which rendered the policy inoperative. Upon its being doubted at Nisi Prius whether an action would lie under these circumstances, ERKINE cited a MS. note of BULLER, J., in Wallace v. Telfair, wherein that judge had ruled under similar circumstances, that though there was no consideration for one party's undertaking to procure an insurance for another, yet, when a party voluntarily undertook to do it, and proceeded to carry his undertaking into effect, by getting a policy underwritten, but did it so negligently or unskilfully that the party could derive no benefit from it, in that case he should be liable to an action; in which distinction LORD KENYON acquiesced.

The jury had found a verdict for the plaintiff, which the court refused to disturb. (g)

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LEGAL GUIDE.

ANSWER TO PROBLEM XXIII. VOL. 3.

“What will, under ordinary circumstances, be received at law as a sufficient proof of handwriting?”

As a general rule it seems to be holden, that when a witness is called to prove the handwriting of a particular person, that the witness should have gained his knowledge by seeing that person write; but as in many cases a strict adherence to this rule would be unjust, if not absurd, we find that in some cases it is relaxed, and that under some peculiar circumstances it is unnecessary that a witness deposing to the identity of handwriting should have seen the party write; as where the handwriting to be proved was of a person residing abroad, evidence by a party who had frequently received letters from him in a course of correspondence was admitted to prove that handwriting, although the witness had never seen him write. (Bull. N. P. 236).

In proving the identity of handwriting, it does not appear to be at all necessary that a witness should positively swear that the handwriting to be given in evidence is actually the handwriting of any particular individual, but his belief that it is such, is sufficient; such belief being founded on rational grounds, (i. e.) the witness must either have seen the individual in question write his name, or have received letters from him in a course of correspondence, not having actually seen him write; or the like.

The witness is merely to form an opinion, and that only from looking at the handwriting in question.

In a case where a witness had never seen the defendant, but had corresponded with a person of the defendant's name living at Plymouth Dock where defendant resided, and where according to other evidence there was no other person of the name, stated that the handwriting of certain letters was that of the person with whom he had corresponded; it was held that this evidence was sufficient to admit the letters to be read against the defendant, (Harrington v. Fry, 2 Bing. 179; 9 Moore, 344; 3 Stark, C. N. P. 90;) and a clerk of the post-office, accustomed to inspect franks for the detection of forgeries, may be examined as a witness to prove that the handwriting of an instrument is an imitated and not a natural hand, though he never saw the supposed person write; and also to prove that two writings supposed to be imitated hands were written by the same person, Goodtitle d. Revett v. Brahan (trial at bar) 4 T. R. 497. But such evidence has been since rejected, and great doubts are entertained of its admissibility; at all events it seems entitled to but little credit, (Gurney v. Langlands, 5 B. & A. 330): and to prove the handwriting of a member of parliament the opinion of a clerk employed to inspect franks, who had occasion to apply to the member to verify his handwriting, has been held insufficient (Batchelor v. Honeywood, 2 Esp. R. 714) and so where it was evident that the witness could not speak to the identity of the handwriting except by comparison, as where the witness supposed to having merely seen the party subscribe his name to another instrument to which he was an attesting witness, and was unable to form an opinion respecting the handwriting in question without examining such other instrument. In the two last cases it will be observed were of the opinion, which the law has rejected as insufficient evidence to prove the identity of any particular handwriting; and it is submitted that however clear such opinion may be in the mind of a witness, yet it is not in reality clearer evidence than where the witness deposes only to similitude of hands, which, since the reversal of the attainder of Algernon Sidney, it seems is generally held not to be evidence in any criminal case, whether capital or not, (2 Hawk. c. 46, s. 15); and perhaps where the writing is so ancient that a witness can be found to prove it, (1 Phil. 492): as where a parson's book was produced to prove a modus, the parson having been long dead, a witness who had examined the parish book in which was the same person's name was permitted to swear to the similitude of the handwriting, it was the best evidence for the nature of the thing, as the parish books were not in the if's power to produce, (B. N. P. 236): or unless perhaps where there is already contradictory evidence of the fact as to the handwriting: evidence by comparison be properly admitted in such cases to prove the genuineness of a signature, the same kind of evidence must also be admitted to prove that the signature is not genuine, (1 Phil. 492). A witness who has seen a party write may refer to that writing to refresh and strengthen his memory, and not merely for the purpose of comparison, (Burr v. Harper, Holt, 1 N. P. 420; 8 B. & C. 16).

The best evidence to prove a signature or writing to be a forgery, is to be derived from calling the party himself whose writing is alleged to have been forged, provided he be a competent witness.

Where a person had been dead a great number of years whose handwriting was required to be proved, it was done by shewing the similarity of the handwriting in question to the handwriting of his will; and no objection was taken to this either at the bar or by the court, (Morewood v. Wood, 14 E. R. 327, n.)

The subscribing witness to a promissory note being dead, proof of his handwriting, and the presence of the defendant when the note was prepared, is sufficient without proving the handwriting of the defendant—sed quare—if proof of the subscribing witnesses handwriting alone would have been sufficient, (Nelson v. Whittall, 1 B. A. 19).

A receipt, even of more than fifty years old, offered to be put in to prove a money payment reported by it to have been received in lieu of others, is not admissible evidence of the fact of such customary payment having been acted on so as to establish the defence of a modus, unless it is also proved who the parties to the receipt were and in what character they stood, and unless proof be given of the handwriting or death of the party giving it. Wood, (B.) dissentiente. Manby v. Curtis, 1 Price, 325).

COURT OF CHANCERY.—March 4.

DUFFIELD v. ELWES.

ATTORNEYS COSTS—Orders for Payment of, after taxation within a limited time.—Regularity of proceedings upon the Order where served upon the Client after the time for payment has transpired.

This case was heard at the Rolls on the 24th of last January, which was a motion on the part of Abraham Henry Chambers to set aside an order of the Court for his commitment to the Fleet, for non-payment of a sum of money to Henry Wilton, pursuant to an order of the Court.

Mr. Pembroke and Mr. Dixon for Mr. Chambers, in support of the motion, and Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Russell for Mr. Wilton.

It appeared that Wilton was formerly the attorney of Mr. Chambers; that disputes arose between them, and that upon an application to the King's Bench that Court declared that Wilton was not an attorney of the Court. This declaration was made on the ground that Wilton had omitted taking out his certificate. A similar application was afterwards made by Mr. Chambers to the Master of the Rolls, to declare that Wilton was not a solicitor of the court of Chancery. This application was heard in June, 1838, when the Rolls Court refused to grant it, and ordered that Mr. Chambers should pay Wilton the costs of opposing it. These costs were taxed at 67*l.* 10*s.* 4*d.*, and on the 2d May, 1839, the Court made, on Wilton's application, an order that Mr. Chambers should pay him the money within three weeks of the date of the order. The order, however, was not served, nor demand of payment made, until the 8th of June, 1839, being after the expiration of the three weeks, so that it became impossible for Mr. Chambers to pay the money within the three weeks. Wilton, however, made an affidavit of the service of the order, the demand of the money, and its non-payment, and moved the Court ex parte for, and obtained, an order for the payment of the money within four days from its service, or else that Mr. Chambers should be committed to the Fleet. This order was served on the 2d of November last, and the money not being paid, an order for commitment was obtained on the 14th of November, and a detainer for this 67*l.* 10*s.* 4*d.* was lodged against Mr. Chambers, who was then in the Fleet upon other commitments. For Mr. Chambers it was contended, that process of contempt was always considered as matter strictissimi juris. The question was, whether there was a disobedience to the first order. That order being served after the expiration of the three weeks, it was impossible for Mr. Chambers to comply with it, for a subsequent payment would not have been a compliance.

Mr. Dixon cited a case, Phillips v. Worth, heard before Lord Chancellor Brougham, but not reported, to show that service of an order after its expiration was a nullity.

Lord LANGDALE said, the question of regularity or irregularity was the only matter to be determined; and on February 11, his Lordship pronounced his decision on the motion in this cause, made on behalf of Mr. Chambers, to set aside an order for his commitment to the Fleet for non-payment of costs (67*l.* 10*s.* 4*d.*), to Henry Wilton, pursuant to a former order of the Court. That order was dated May 2, 1839, and was for payment, by Chambers, of the costs within three weeks of its date, but it was not served upon Chambers until the 12th June, when the three weeks had expired. His Lordship discharged, with costs, the order for the commitment of Mr. Chambers.

Mr. Russell now moved to discharge that order, and contended that the order of the 12th of June was perfectly regular, and went into a distinction between the practice in proceedings for payment of costs between party and party, and between solicitor and client. If Mr. Chambers had appeared to the motion of the 12th of June, 1839, he could not have stopped the order then made, except by paying the costs; it was not, therefore, competent for the Court to discharge that order afterwards, and a party who did not appear on notice to oppose a motion against him, ought not to be heard to complain of irregularity. At all events, it was his duty to come to the Court to complain as soon as he knew of the irregularity, whereas he lay by until the 20th of January in the present year. He submitted that the order then made on the application of Chambers, discharging Mr. Wilton's orders, should be discharged with costs for irregularity.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, stopping Mr. Wigram, who was for Mr. Chambers, said he could not agree to the proposition, that if one party takes an irregular order, then, because the other party affected by it does not come to the Court to oppose or discharge it, such order becomes regular. All the orders obtained by Mr. Wilton subsequent to that of the 2d of May were irregular. The first order was on Mr. Chambers to pay the costs: on the 8th of February 1839, the master taxed the costs and gave his certificate, and then a demand was made for payment. Nothing was done from that day until the 2nd of May 1839, when the order on Mr. Chambers to pay within three weeks or stand committed was made. Then, on the 8th of June following, after the three weeks expired, the order of the 2nd May was served, and no payment of the costs being then made, the order of the 12th June 1839 was obtained at the Rolls on the ground that the order of the 2nd of May was not complied with. No notice was given of that order to Mr. Chambers until the time of obeying it expired, and it was not competent for the other party who obtained that order, after acting on it, to abandon it, and rest on the subsequent orders. All the subsequent proceedings did in fact rest on that order of the 2nd of May as appeared to his Lordship, and nothing being done on that order, it could not be made a ground for the order of the 12th of June. Again, the order of the 12th of June was not served till the 2nd of November, and on the 14th of November an order for commitment was made. If the order of the 12th of June could not stand, the order of the 14th of November resting on it could not stand. Nothing was done between the parties from the 12th of June till the 2nd of November after all this negligence and irregularity, when Mr. Chambers appeared on the 20th of January for relief, the Master of the Rolls was quite justified in granting it, and this application must be refused with costs.

The costs to be deducted from the costs due by Mr. Chambers to Mr. Wilton.

COLLARD v. ALLISON.

PATENTS — INJUNCTION — PRACTICE — After Verdict at Law for the Plaintiff, and rule nisi granted for a new trial.

This case came originally before the court upon motion for an injunction to restrain the defendant from infringing a patent obtained by the plaintiff about twelve years ago, for certain improvements in pianofortes. Upon that motion coming on, his Lordship refused to grant the injunction, ordering the plaintiff to bring an action at law to try the validity of his patent. The action was brought, and a verdict obtained for the plaintiff. Notice, however, was given on behalf of the defendant of his intention to apply in the present term for a new trial; but in the interim the plaintiff again set down his motion for the injunction, founding that motion upon the verdict he had obtained at law. That motion stood for hearing last Monday, but upon being called on, it was ordered to stand over till to-day, that the result of the application to the Court of Queen's Bench, which would be made in the first four days of the term, might be known. That application had resulted in the court's granting a rule nisi to show cause why a nonsuit should not be entered, or a new trial granted on the ground of want of evidence and misdirection. Under these circumstances the motion came before the court again to-day.

Mr. Richards, on behalf of the plaintiff, stating what had taken place below, observed that it was not his wish, as the court thought was not competent to him, to bring on the motion that day, but he understood from the nature of the business in the Court of Queen's Bench that it was not likely the rule which had been obtained could be heard for twelve or eighteen months, and that delay would be extremely prejudicial upon a plaintiff who had the verdict of a court of law in his favour. He trusted, therefore, the motion was to stand over, that his Lordship would request the Court of Queen's Bench to advance the case for argument.

Mr. Wigram, on the behalf of the defendant, would gladly join in that request, provided his Lordship felt himself justified in doing so.

The LORD CHANCELLOR did not see how he could interfere with the proceedings of another court. What had taken place lately in the Court of Queen's Bench certainly did not improve the situation of the plaintiff. It certainly was quite competent for Mr. Richards to make a motion for an injunction the day after the court had refused to grant one, but there was some risk with it. When the court refused an injunction on the ground that the right at law, which was doubtful, ought to be tried, it was usual that that right should be established before the court determined whether, on a second application, it would grant the injunction or not. That could not be said to have been done in the present case, because, although a verdict had been obtained, it was good for nothing without judgment, and it was at least doubtful whether that would be obtained, when the Court of Queen's Bench had granted a rule nisi for a new trial.

Mr. Richards submitted that the jury having found a verdict for the plaintiff, had thereby established the fact of the novelty of the invention, added to which they had the opinion of the Lord Chief Justice in their favour.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said it was competent to the plaintiff to proceed with the motion; but he could not give any credit to a verdict after the Court of Queen's Bench had granted a rule nisi for a new trial.

Mr. Anderdon submitted that the court ought to direct a case for the opinion of the courts of law, as by that means the matter might be speedily settled.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said, if it was consistent with the practice of the Court of Queen's Bench to advance a case, he hoped they would do it in the present instance, and during the time the argument had been going on he had communicated with the judges on the subject. As to the proposal of Mr. Anderdon, it was quite impracticable to adopt that.

Motion ordered to stand over, with liberty to either party to apply to the court.

ROLLS' COURT.—April 29.

VINER v. VAUGHAN AND ANOTHER.

TENANT for LIFE, without Impeachment of waste.—Whether he may remove the surface soil and dig for Clay for making Bricks.—INJUNCTION.

Mr. Pemberton had obtained an order ex parte for an injunction to restrain the defendants from digging up or removing the brick-earth from a certain piece of land situate near Clay Hall, in the parish of Alverstoke, in the county of Southampton. It appeared that James Vaughan died in 1823, having by his will, dated October 26, 1822, devised the premises in question to trustees, to permit his wife, Amy, to receive the rents and profits during the term of her natural life, and after her decease to sell the lands, and divide the money arising from such sale among his daughters, Amy, the wife of George Viner, Jane and Betsy Vaughan, Hannah Adams Vaughan, and Clarissa Vaughan. Upon the decease of her husband, Mrs. Vaughan took possession of the property, and continued to receive the rents till 1840, when she entered into a contract with James Hendy, of Portsmouth, builder, by which she agreed to demise to him the land in question for the purpose of digging clay to make bricks. James Hendy, in pursuance of his agreement, began to remove the surface soil and to dig clay, upon which Mr. and Mrs. Viner caused a notice to be served upon both Mrs. Vaughan and James Hendy, requiring them to desist; this was complied with in order to afford time for inquiring into the rights attached to the estate for life of Mrs. Vaughan, which having been done, and the opinion being in favour of the right to dig for clay, the work was resumed. The defendants were served with notice.

Mr. Pemberton now insisted that the injunction ought to be granted. He denied the right of a tenant for life, who was impeachable for waste, to destroy the surface, or to do any act detrimental to the inheritance. There was a great distinction between digging for minerals and for clay; in the one case the working was beneath the surface, which was not rendered wholly useless for agricultural purposes; in the other, the surface was wholly removed, leaving a barren waste for those who were to succeed to the reversion. The real question, however, was whether a tenant for life was at liberty to work pits which were not worked by the testator; and even assuming this, she was not at liberty to uncover fresh ground, since every foot dug was, in fact, opening a fresh pit. From the death of the testator to the present time no steps had been taken to dig any clay; and, therefore, he trusted that the injunction would be granted.

Mr. Stuart said the pit intended to be worked was an old pit, from which the testator himself had taken some clay. He, previous to his death, also had made preparations for fully working the pits, and had erected a mud-house, and had purchased machinery for making bricks. He contended, therefore, that by the authorities a tenant for life was fully justified in working not only such pits as the donor was working, but also all such pits as had been at any time opened upon the estate, notwithstanding they might have been abandoned and partially filled up.

Lord LANGDALE observed that the plaintiff, as one of the children of the testator, was entitled to one-fifth of the money arising from the sale of the estate, and claimed a right to restrain the tenant for life, and her lessee, James Hendy, from taking away the substance of the land. There was no doubt the plaintiff had a right to make the application; she was not bound to look to the trustee to protect her, or to say that he was answerable for not doing so. By the words of the will, Mrs. Vaughan was impeachable for waste under it, therefore she had no right to dig for clay. A tenant for life had no right to take away the substance of the land; but it was stated that she had a right to use such pits as had been used by the testator; but did it follow that a tenant for life was to re-open old abandoned pits or mines, or to commence working pits or mines which the testator had merely prepared to work? It had been said that this pit was in a course of working by the testator. It was not so stated in the affidavits. It appeared, however, that there was an old pit, which had not been worked for twenty years; from this the testator had taken some clay for some purpose not explained. There was nothing, therefore, from which it could be gathered that this was an open mine, but only that it was an old mine which the testator was preparing to work. Before the right, therefore, was determined, the plaintiff could not be permitted to take away the clay; that must depend upon the evidence in this cause, and whether the pits were in such a course of working as to enable the tenant for life to continue to work them. The injunction, therefore, must be granted, but it was not to be drawn up until again mentioned to the Court.

TENANTS FOR LIFE IMPEACHABLE FOR WASTE.

On the right of TENANTS for LIFE, IMPEACHABLE for WASTE, to work OPEN MINES, and to LEASE them under the usual POWER of LEASING.

By T.
Barrister-at-law.

There are perhaps few questions which more frequently arise between a person having only a limited interest in landed property and the reversioner, than the question of the right of a tenant for life to lead, copper, and other ores—they are parcel of the inheritance, and cannot be appropriated by the tenant for life to his own benefit, for by the act of doing so he would injure the inheritance—the only exception is of such mines as were previously worked, which is a question of fact, but one of great difficulty and complexity. We find the general rule laid down in the Commentaries of Sir William Blackstone in these words: "Waste rasmus is a spoil or destruction in houses, gardens, trees, or other corporeal hereditaments, to the disherison of him that hath the remainder or reversion in fee simple or fee tail."<sup>(1)</sup> "To open the land to search for mines of metal, coal, &c. is waste, for that is a detriment to the inheritance; (2) but if the pits or mines were open before, it is no waste for the tenant to continue digging them for his own use,<sup>(3)</sup> for it is now become the mere annual profit of the land."<sup>(4)</sup> The right then of the tenant for life depends upon this principle, that there were mines upon the property, the produce of which had prior to the commencement of his interest become annual profit of the land; and it is a fair and reasonable presumption, that a testator or settlor having lands in which there were mines of metal or coal which he worked, and having devised or settled such lands to or on any other person for life, intended that the tenant for life should during his interest draw from the gift the annual profit of the mines. It is also to be reasonably presumed, that in case a testator gave to one in his land an estate in inheritance in tail, with the remainder to another for life, that he must have intended the latter should work any mines which the tenant in tail might open; for the testator, by the very act of giving an estate tail, enabled the person to whom he gave it to search for and open mines; and it followed, that those mines being open at the determination of the estate tail, and at the commencement of the life estate, the produce of the mines having then become part of the annual profit, the tenant for life might work them and take the annual produce during his interest. This appears to have been decided in the case of Clavering v. Clavering, 2 Peere Williams, 388; although in that case the mines were not opened when the settlement was made, they having been opened by the person who by that settlement claimed an estate tail, and had afterwards died without issue. The court holding that the tenant for life might work all the mines which had been lawfully opened by the preceding tenant in tail, though subsequent to the settlement. However, the disposition of a tenant for life to make the greatest annual profit, and the anxiety of the reversioner to protect his inheritance, will necessarily lead to disputes between them. A case occurred in Devonshire, in the early part of the last century, which is thus described by LORD CHANCELLOR KING in deciding upon the case of Clavering v. Clavering (ante), "This was determined in the great cause of Hellier v. Twiford, in which I was of counsel; the matter was tried at the assizes in Devonshire before MR. JUSTICE POWELL, and held great part of the day; there it was proved by witnesses to be the course of the country, and a practice well known in those parts, among the miners, that any person having a right to dig in mines may pursue the mines and open new shafts or pits to follow the same vein; and that otherwise the working in the same mines would be impracticable, because the miners would be choked for want of air if new holes should not be continually opened to let the air into them; and the same vein of coal frequently runs a great way, and the same mine of coals was very knowable and easy to be discerned; besides, that to stop the working might be the ruin of the colliery for ever." However, though mines be open, the tenant for life cannot take timber to use in them. Co. Lit. 53 b. note 1.

There remains now to be considered whether a power of leasing to a tenant for life will enable him to lease open mines; and it has been held, that a tenant for life with power of leasing messuages, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, so as the most improved yearly rent be reserved, can lease mines previously opened and in lease; and that the reservation of a due proportion of the ore is analogous to a yearly rent. ENGLAND v. DAVISON.

REWARDS to POLICEMEN—Whether recoverable by action—DEMURRER.

This was an action of assumpsit, in which the plaintiff, a police officer, sought to recover from the defendant a sum of money which the defendant had advertised as the reward to be paid to any person who gave him information that would lead to the discovery of certain offenders who had committed a felony on his property. The plaintiff sought, and gave the information, but the defendant refused to pay him the reward. The defendant demurred to the declaration, on the ground that the promise was one which the policy of the law would not enforce.

Mr. Martin argued in support of the demurrer, and contended that public policy required that no reward should be given to a police-officer for doing his duty. The Court had held that an action of assumpsit would not lie in cases where sailors, in times of difficulty and danger, were promised rewards for extra exertions, as it was considered that sailors ought at all times and on all occasions to use their utmost exertions to save the vessel and cargo. A police-officer ought also to be vigilant and use his utmost endeavours to apprehend persons who had committed breaches of the law, and was not

Lord DENMAN : We are of opinion that there may be good services rendered by a policeman, beyond those which he is bound to render in that character, and unless we clearly see that an express engagement is contrary to public policy, we shall not prevent its being carried into effect. We, therefore, give judgment for the plaintiff. Judgment accordingly.

NEW TRIAL.

PHILLIPS AND OTHERS v. HUTH the Elder, AND OTHERS.

COMMERCIAL CASE—FACTORS ACT, 6 Geo. 4, c. 94—Bailees of dock warrants pledged by a factor—their right to convert them to their own use under the Factors Act.

This important case was argued last term upon a rule nisi for a new trial, and the Court took time to consider its judgment, by reason that it involved some very serious questions.—The declaration was for money had and received, to which the general issue was pleaded.

The action was one brought to try the right of the defendants to retain and convert to their own use the produce of a large quantity of tobacco, the cargoes of two ships consigned by bills of lading from the plaintiffs to a merchant and factor named Warwick, and his partner, subsequently taken into business by him, named Claggett, by whom the dock-warrants for these cargoes had been obtained without the sanction of the plaintiffs, and deposited with the defendants as pledges under the Factors Act, 6 George 4, c. 94, s. 2, for the repayment of very extensive advances alleged by the defendants to have been made by them to the factors on the faith of such deposits. It appeared that Mr. Warwick being in want of cash had negotiated an advance of £20,000. from the defendants on the deposit of the dock-warrants of tobacco, being the cargoes of two ships which were his own property. The defendants, however, after having advanced £12,000., objected to the sufficiency of the security, whereupon Warwick, to whom had just been consigned the Amelia, by the plaintiffs, having also tobacco, deposited the dock-warrants of that produce, and so prevailed upon the defendants to complete their original agreement for the whole sum. Soon after this Warwick, who had deposited some American securities with the defendants for another advance of £14,000. entered into the partnership with Claggett, when the cargo of the Mariposa having been consigned by the plaintiffs to them, the new firm negotiated the discounting of their acceptances for £14,000., being the amount of that discount and interest due on the other transaction of £14,000., on the deposit of the dock-warrants of the Mariposa, the American securities being then surrendered. Just when these several acceptances became due, the firm of Warwick and Claggett became bankrupt, and the plaintiffs, who had in the mean time in vain endeavoured to get some account from them of their tobaccos, found that their property had been thus fraudulently pledged with the defendants by their factors. At the trial, which took place before GURNEY, B. at the London sittings after last Michaelmas term, a verdict was taken generally for the defendants, and a rule nisi was afterwards obtained for a new trial on the ground of misdirection, and also on the further ground that the jury gave a verdict contrary to the evidence.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL contended, in showing cause against the rule, that there was evidence adduced on the trial which was applicable to these transactions as evidencing an intention on the part of the plaintiffs to entrust their factors with these dock-warrants, and that being so, the learned judge was justified in leaving it to the jury to say whether such was the fact, and that the jury were likewise warranted in coming to the conclusion at which they had arrived, and which had resulted in a general verdict for the defendants. It was enough under the 2nd section of the statute in question to give some evidence from which the jury might infer an intention to intrust the factors with these instruments the pledging of which by them was legalized by the act. The word "intrusted" ought to be construed to mean "enabled," so that as where ever a principal, by sending to his factor the bill of lading of his property in blank, enables him to deal with that property, and to obtain the dock-warrants, he may be said to have "intrusted" them to him; and as the act says, that wherever persons are intrusted with bills of lading, certificate, or dock-warrants, &c. they shall be deemed to be the true owners thereof, and as such entitles to pledge or deposit them as a security for advances to be made upon the faith of such deposits to such persons, then it would follow that these deposits are protected by the act. There was, however, another question, namely, whether these transactions amounted to advances on the terms of the act to advances on the faith of such deposits; but if the Court would look at the dates and surrounding facts, it was apprehended that it must come to the conclusion that these loans were in truth and in fact protected by the act.

Mr. Crompton, for the rule, argued that the word "intrusted" must be construed to mean a true and confidence reposed in the factor, in respect of the very instrument pledged by him, and that as the whole case showed clearly that he was not meant to be intrusted with the possession of the dock-warrants, but merely of the bill of lading, the advances made by the defendants were not protected by the act. In the next place, it was strongly urged, that as regarded the cargo of the Amelia, the advance could not be protected, as the deposit of her dock-warrant was extorted by the defendants from Warwick in express breach of their contract, as they would have been bound to complete the sum of £20,000, though these latter warrants had not been pledged at all; while, as regarded the second transaction of the Mariposa, that manifestly amounted only to a transfer or substitution of those securities for the others which were released, in which view of the case it could never be contended that the £14,400 had been advanced on the faith of those dock-warrants, there being in fact only a shifting of securities accompanied with a payment of only £122, as the balance of the interest and discount.

Mr. Baron PARKE delivered the united judgment of the court upon this case. This was an action to recover the value of large quantities of tobacco, which had been pledged by means of dock-warrants by the factors of the plaintiffs with the defendants, and by the latter claimed to be retained and converted to their own use under the terms of the Factors Act, 6 Geo. IV. c. 94, by the second section of which it is enacted that all documents representing property may be pledged or deposited to secure loans, &c. to factors, who have been intrusted with and in possession thereof in the same way as though they had been actually the owners of the property, the symbols of which they were so entrusted with and in possession of. A verdict having been given for the defendants on the questions whether the plaintiffs entrusted the factors with the amounts in question, and whether the defendants believed the factors to be the real owners of the property, a rule for a new trial was obtained on the grounds that there had been an insufficient direction of the learned Baron Gurney, by whom the case was tried, and that the verdict was one against the evidence in the cause. Time having been taken in order that the case might receive the mature consideration of himself and his learned brethren, he now read the judgment of the court, which was to the effect that the rule ought to be made absolute, on the ground that the meaning of the term "entrusted" in the clause in question, ought to have been more fully explained to the jury, it being their Lordships' opinion that it was not enough to show that the factor was in possession of these documents, but that the plaintiffs when they consigned the tobacco to their factors by bills of lading, intended and contemplated that they should be enabled to possess themselves of the other documents, dock-warrants, and so to appear to the world as the actual owners. This was clearly not so, for the factors were shown to have possessed themselves of the dock-warrants fraudulently, out of the usual course of business, and contrary to the express directions of the plaintiff. Under this view of the case, the rule nisi for a new trial must be made absolute.

The Attorney-General, who appeared for the defendants, supposed of course that it must be upon payment of the costs, as the court had said that there was no misdirection of the learned Baron, so that the verdict of the jury was the ground of the judgment.

Mr. Baron PARKE.—No, there certainly was not any misdirection, but as the learned Baron did not give any sufficient direction on the construction of the statute, we think the rule ought to be made absolute, as if there had been an actual misdirection, and without costs.

Rule absolute accordingly.

BARTER v. JONES.

UNDERTAKER'S CHARGES.

This action was brought to recover the balance of an account for 64*l.* 17*s.* 3*d.* The plaintiff was an undertaker, and the defendant a captain of a ship. In November last, the defendant being then at sea, the plaintiff was sent for by the wife of the former to receive instructions for the funeral of her brother, Mr. Watt, who had died. The defendant's wife asked the plaintiff what he would charge for furnishing a plain and respectable funeral, and whether it would exceed 40*l.*, to which the plaintiff answered that a funeral of the description required would cost that sum, or a little more, upon which the defendant's wife gave the order. The plaintiff accordingly furnished, and upon the return home of the defendant from sea also furnished his bill, which they found amounted to 64*l.* On looking into the account, the defendant observed several charges which he could not help thinking were rather exorbitant, and that, taking into consideration the rank in life of his deceased brother-in-law, some of the articles supplied were, if not superfluous, unsuitable. Amongst the former may be mentioned a charge of 4*s.* 6*d.* per pair for gloves for the servants, and, amongst the latter, was a leaden coffin for which 7*l.* 10*s.* was charged, and which it was contended was not required, and two hat-bands for each mourner, besides sundry other little superfluities, by which an ingenious undertaker will sometimes contrive to increase the éclat of a funeral and his own emoluments. On these grounds the defendant refused to pay the undertaker's bill, and hence this action was brought. The defendant had paid 50*l.* into court, pleaded a set-off of 2*l.* advanced on account, and denied his liability for the remainder.

Witnesses for the plaintiff (all undertakers) proved the reasonableness of the charges in their opinion; whilst on the other hand, the defendant's witnesses, some of whom were also undertakers, said that the charges in the plaintiff's bill were most exorbitant, particularly those for the gloves and the leaden coffin; two hat-bands for each mourner were certainly superfluous, because (as one of the witnesses shrewdly remarked) each could wear but one at a time.

GURNEY, B., said, the jury had to decide whether, in their opinion, the plaintiff was justified in exceeding the amount specified by him when he took the order. The evidence as to the reasonableness, or the contrary, of the charges, was certainly conflicting, but it was for them to decide upon the credibility of the witnesses on either side; in a word they would have to say whether, considering the rank and condition of life of the deceased the 52*l.* paid by the defendant was sufficient for a suitable funeral.

EVE v. RUMBOLL.

REWARDS for Information—What party entitled to—definition of "first information."

This action was brought by two of the London police, to recover the amount of a reward offered by the defendant, under the circumstances mentioned below, and was tried before Mr. Justice Erskine, at the Wilts summer assizes for 1839, when a verdict passed for the defendant. A rule nisi, to set aside this verdict, was obtained in a subsequent term by Mr. Sergeant Bompas, on behalf of the plaintiffs, against which Mr. Crowder showed cause on Monday last, and Mr. Sergeant Bompas was then partly heard in support of the rule.

It appeared that the defendant, who is a gentleman of property in the county, was proceeding homewards one evening in the early part of last year, when, on arriving at a certain spot, he was fired at, and though not mortally, yet dangerously wounded. This circumstance occurring in a hitherto peaceable and quiet neighbourhood, occasioned no little consternation among the inhabitants, and two of the London police were sent down for the purpose of discovering the perpetrator, but they failed in their efforts to do so; and after a short time returned to London. The alarm of the inhabitants, however, not having been quieted, but rather increased by this failure, the plaintiffs were sent down for the purpose of protecting them. An association for the prosecution of felons, of which the defendant was a member, had published handbills offering a reward of £100. to such person or persons as should give such information as would lead to the discovery and conviction of the offender. The plaintiffs employed their utmost vigilance to discover the person who had attempted the assassination of the defendant, but without effect, until at length, on information received by them and others from various persons, they succeeded in tracing the crime to a man of the name of Maskelline, who was subsequently tried, convicted, and executed for the offence. The reward was distributed amongst the persons who had given the information upon which the plaintiffs and the prosecutor had acted, but no part of the reward was given to the plaintiffs. It is unnecessary to enter into a detail of the various circumstances connected with this case, but it is sufficient to say that the question at issue was whether the plaintiffs had given the first information, so as to entitle them to the reward or any portion of it, jointly with others. It appeared that the first information which had led to a suspicion against the perpetrator of the crime was acquired by a gentleman of the name of Henley, who, being a friend of the defendant, was actively engaged in the discovery of the offender, and this information was received by him from one Farmer, who had heard one Smith say that he had heard the person suspected make use of revengeful language towards the defendant. In the course of their inquiries other circumstances were communicated to the plaintiffs as policemen, which, being acted upon by them, ultimately resulted in the conviction of the person charged as before mentioned. Upon the trial the learned judge excluded some portions of the evidence, as related to information given by certain parties to the plaintiffs, and put it to the jury whether the information given to Mr. Henley was the first which led to the apprehension of the criminal, and if so, the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover.

Mr. Crowder upon showing cause, supported this view of the learned judge.

Mr. Baron ALDERSON asked the learned counsel what was his definition of the "first information?"

Mr. Crowder said that if his Lordship put the question in reference to the present case—

Mr. Baron ALDERSON—I merely put the question as an abstract one. Suppose A gives certain information, B other information, C other information, and E other information, and then D comes in and supplies a fact without which the other facts communicated would be incomplete. Who, in this instance, would have given the first information?

Mr. Crowder should say that D was the person, but their lordships must look at the facts of the present case. It must be recollected that the plaintiffs were employed and paid for their services.

Mr. Baron ALDERSON said that he was the first who gave information who first communicated a fact, which fact ultimately turned out to be material to a conviction; and the question would then arise whether it should be a fact within that person's own knowledge, or received by him from another, who had no intention to communicate it.

Mr. Baron PARKE here read from the report of the learned judge that part of his summing up which more particularly referred to this point. The learned judge (Erskine) said the jury would have to ascertain whether the evidence was jointly given by the plaintiffs, and told them that the plaintiffs were not entitled to the reward in respect of information which they were merely the channels of conveying, and that though they were employed and paid, they were not precluded from any share in the reward in respect of any information which they might have acquired in the course of their own observations, provided such information was the first.

Mr. Crowder referred to some of the facts which constituted part of the chain of evidence against the criminal, and contended, that though they were material, and were even essential to the conviction, yet that they could not be considered to be the first information.

The COURT said they had considered the case, and they did not think there were sufficient grounds for disturbing the verdict. The rule must therefore be discharged.

Rule discharged.

INSOLVENT DEBTORS' COURT.

ANON.

ASSIGNERS.—The remedy against them for money retained in their hands after order made to pay it into Court.

ASSIGNEESHIPS.—An application was made at the rising of the Court for the committal of a person who had been an assignee of an insolvent's estate, and had kept in his possession upwards of 800*l.*, which money he had been ordered to pay into Court. Efforts had been made to serve him with a rule to show cause why he should not be committed, but he had evaded the order, and the present application was for a peremptory order for his committal. The provisional assignee made an affidavit of the facts of the case, which had been some time before Mr. Commissioner LAW.

Mr. Commissioner BOWEN thought the present motion could not be granted. The party must be served with a rule to show cause.

The CHIEF COMMISSIONER concurred, remarking that a very strong case indeed must be made out before the Court could dispense with the usual proceedings.

The COURT refused the application.

The Commissioners have laid down a rule, in all cases where there are funds in Court, or a sum to be set aside out of pensions or otherwise, not to appoint an assignee. The provisional assignee acts, obtains the money, and divides the same without any expense. By the last act the Court had the power. There were before a number of instances of delinquent assignees—persons who had received large sums, and applied them to their own uses, regardless of the other creditors.—ED.

CASE OF HORATIO HASTINGS.

Insolvent out upon Bail, and not appearing at the day for hearing—further defect in the Statute for abolishing Arrest—Whether the Bail have the power to render the Insolvent—Jurisdiction of the Court to issue a distress warrant against the Bail on their recognisance, and a warrant for the apprehension of the Insolvent.

The insolvent, who was out upon bail, was called to be heard pursuant to notice, but failed to appear. The recognisance was for £165.

Mr. Cooke applied that a warrant might issue for the apprehension of the insolvent, and also a warrant of distress on the recognisance entered into by the bail.

Mr. Commissioner BOWEN thought that a rule should be granted. The insolvent might shew illness or some other cause.

Mr. Cooke said he was bound to inform the Court if such was the case. The warrant could issue in the first instance, and the Court could grant a rule nisi on the bail.

The CHIEF COMMISSIONER asked what portion of the 38th section the learned counsel would refer to in his application.

Mr. Cooke referred to the latter part of the 38th section of the 1st and 2nd Vic. c. 110, by which it is enacted, "That in case any insolvent so discharged out of custody shall not appear at the time and place fixed for his hearing or adjourned hearing, (not being prevented by illness or other lawful impediment to be allowed of by the said Court) the recognisance so entered into shall be forfeited, and the amount secured thereby shall be recoverable in a summary way by a distress and sale of the goods and chattels of such sureties as the said Court shall direct; and the amount so recovered shall be applied for the benefit of the creditors of such insolvent in like manner as if the same were part of his estate and effects; and the said Court may also issue a warrant, authorising a specified person or persons to arrest such insolvent, and deliver him into the custody of the gaoler or keeper in whose custody such prisoner was at the time when he was so discharged as aforesaid; and all detainers which were in force against him at the time of such discharge, or which shall have since been duly lodged against him, shall thereupon be deemed to be in force; and that any insolvent so discharged out of custody as aforesaid shall, on his appearing before the said Court or Commissioner, or justices, be considered for all the purposes of this act in the custody in which he was at the time he was so discharged." The learned counsel moved for a warrant for the apprehension of the insolvent in the first instance, and for a rule on the sureties to shew cause why the recognisance so entered into should not be put in force.

Mr. Commissioner BOWEN said he had misunderstood the learned counsel in respect of the latter part of his application.

Mr. Cooke read the affidavit of Mr. John Huish Webber, attorney for the opposing creditor, stating the fact of the insolvent being discharged on bail, and his non-appearance. The present was the first case of the kind, and of no inconsiderable importance. It was a creditable circumstance, that out of the number discharged on bail, only one had been base enough to fix his sureties. He applied that the warrant against the insolvent should issue instantly, and a rule on the bail.

Mr. Woodroffe said he appeared for the bail, not to oppose the application for the warrant, but to state the circumstances of the case. The bail were respectable persons, and feared the worst. It was clear they must produce the insolvent, or have to pay the amount of the recognisance. The bail asked the Court not to issue a distress warrant, they might apprehend the insolvent, and if the Court declared the bail forfeited, they would preclude the question whether they were liable or not to the full extent of the recognisance. There was no doubt that the act was very defective, but it was peculiarly hard on bail; they had not the power to render a party; but the bail in this case would endeavour to find the insolvent, and they had some clue to where to find him, and they would bring him into Court at all risks. All they required was, that the Court would, before they proceeded to issue a distress warrant, grant a reasonable time for the apprehension of the insolvent.

Mr. Cooke thought it would be dangerous to be made known that the recognisance was not forfeited. It was forfeited when the man did not appear.

The CHIEF COMMISSIONER referred to the clause, and said the recognisance was forfeited as a natural consequence, but it was another question whether it should be put in force without a rule on the sureties.

Mr. Commissioner BOWEN expressed his concurrence in the view taken.

Mr. Cooke said the recognisance being forfeited he did not know how it was to be got over without the payment of the money.

Mr. Commissioner BOWEN remarked that they need not now discuss that question.

Mr. Woodroffe said the bail could not render the party, such was the defect in the act.

Mr. Cooke observed that there was no power to render after bail was admitted, not even if the party was on board a ship to leave England.

The COURT suggested that the warrant should be given in the name of the bail, for the apprehension of the insolvent.

Mr. Cooke asked for a rule on the bail. It might be for some period beyond a reasonable time for the apprehension of the insolvent.

The COURT granted a rule and a warrant instantly.

The COURT named Mr. Prew assignee.

A warrant was granted and given to the assignee to execute, and a rule was granted, calling on them to shew cause why the recognisance should not be put in force against them.

NEW POSTAGE STAMPS ORDER.

"General Post Office, April 28, 1840.

"NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

"The Lords of the Treasury having fixed the 6th of May next for the issue of postage stamps, on and after that day all letters written on stamped paper, or enclosed in stamped covers, or having stamps affixed to them, the stamps in every such case being equal in value or amount to the rates of postage now chargeable on such letters if prepaid, will pass free of postage in whatever part of the United Kingdom they may be posted.

"In those cases where the value of stamps on the letter is less than the amount of the postage to which it would be now liable, if prepaid, the letter will be charged double the amount of such difference on delivery. An inland letter, for example, weighing more than half an ounce, and not exceeding an ounce, if bearing only a penny stamp, will be charged twopence on delivery.

"The same regulation applies to letters prepaid by money, where the full and proper rate of postage has not been paid in advance.

"Stamps may be used for printed votes and proceedings in Parliament; if the stamps, however, should be less in value than the proper rate of postage to which these documents are subject, only the difference, and not double the difference, is to be charged.

"Stamps may also be used on foreign, colonial, and ship letters, &c. outwards. If any letter, however, addressed to places beyond sea shall bear an insufficient number of stamps, it will be sent to the Dead Letter Office, to be returned, in all practicable cases, to the writer. Stamps are not permitted to be used on letters arriving in the United Kingdom from the colonies or foreign countries. In such cases, therefore, letters will be chargeable with the same rates as they would be if not bearing stamps.

"All these regulations will be applicable to newspapers in those cases where they are liable to postage.

"It must be distinctly understood, that it is optional with the public either to use stamps or to forward their letters, &c. prepaid or unpaid, as at present.

"The instructions issued in December and on the 4th of February last remain in full force, the only alteration being that the stamps are permitted to be used in certain cases, instead of the postage being paid in money.

"By command,

"W. L. MABERLY, Secretary."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LEGAL GUIDE.

PROPOSED REMOVAL OF THE COURTS FROM WESTMINSTER HALL.

SIR,—The proposed removal of the Westminster Hall Courts, as given in your Paper of Saturday last, (a) must be a subject of great interest to the profession; and the reasons given in support of the plan are sufficiently good, except the tenth, viz. :—

"10. An excellent site, the garden of Lincoln's-inn-fields, being obtainable (as is believed) without compensation or expense."

Cap. xxvi. of George II., however, is an act which gives power to the present and future proprietors and inhabitants of the houses in Lincoln's-inn-fields "to adorn and keep in repair for the future the said fields," and which, if allowed to be built upon, according to an indenture recited in the said Act, would occasion the field to revert to the heirs of the original grantor.

This point being so far clearly settled, the question arises, can no other eligible site be obtained?

In the neighbourhood of Lincoln's-Inn there are situations in which such desirable buildings would give beauty, where there is at present none; and by throwing open places that are now close would prevent the spread of contagious diseases, and, as well as conferring local advantages to a particular class, would be a public benefit to society at large. For instance :—

1st. Adjoining Clement's Inn is Clement's Lane (a seat of typhus and other fevers, and squalid misery), and the south-east corner of Clare Market—filthy places of small value.*

2d. The site of the projected new street, near Temple Bar, where there is an assemblage of as vicious and miserable a set of inhabitants as can be pointed to in any district.

3d. The Liberty of the Rolls, Rolls Buildings, &c. east of Chancery Lane, in a line with Lincoln's-Inn, where the neighbourhood is equally confined, and of as small value, though less objectionably inhabited than either of the two already mentioned.

With respect to the outlay, it may be remarked that an eminent architect† has already published plans, demonstrating that the purchase of the most expensive of the above sites for building upon, would afford an excellent investment of capital.

Yours, &c.

We understand that a General Meeting upon this subject is called for this day, to be held at the Hall of the Law Society.—ED.

motion, "That the Building Committee of the new Houses of Parliament might be instructed to reconsider the fitness of the intended site." On that occasion, the separation of the Houses of Parliament from the Courts of Law was incidentally touched on, and Sir Frederick Pollock observed that, "with regard to those members of the profession to which I have the honour to belong, and who are also members of this house, I apprehend it is a matter of indifference to them, whether the House of Commons be situated in the vicinity of Westminster Hall, St. James's Palace, or Charing Cross. Even supposing the removal of the Houses of Parliament might occasion inconvenience to the members of my profession, I am quite sure that not one of them would be found to let any personal consideration of that sort prevail against what might be considered the general convenience of the members of the Houses of Parliament. I repeat, however, that the site of the Houses of Parliament is a matter of perfect indifference to the gentlemen of the bar. It is undoubtedly true that the Courts of Law sit a certain portion of the year in Westminster Hall; but it is also true that the Courts of Equity sit a much longer time in Lincoln's Inn, as also does the Court which I chiefly attend, at the Guildhall, in the City of London, or in its immediate neighbourhood. For my own part, I should care little whether, after my hours of business, I went from Guildhall to Westminster, or to Pall Mall. But there is a class of persons belonging to the legal profession,—I mean the solicitors and attorneys,—and a portion of the public connected with the administration of justice, to whom I believe the proximity of the Houses of Parliament to the place where justice is administered, is of the greatest importance at the time when the House of Lords is sitting as a Court of Appeal, and when committees of the House of Commons are engaged on business which requires the assistance of gentlemen of the bar. Because if the Houses of Parliament were to be removed from the place where justice is administered, and where the members of the bar congregate together, it would be impossible for solicitors, engaged in parliamentary business, to obtain that assistance and advocacy which they might desire, or the House require, without putting their clients to a very great expense. Either the business would remain for a length of time unsettled, or be done indifferently. I do, therefore, think it would be a matter of great inconvenience for those who might have business to transact with the House of Lords, or the Committees of either House of Parliament, if there were such an entire removal of those Houses, as I should look upon their removal to St. James's Palace, or the back of the Mews to be. It is not for any personal interest of my own, or that of any member in this House belonging to the same profession, that I thought it necessary to make these few observations, but for the benefit of those connected with it who are absent, and such portion of the public as would be affected by the proposed change.

Sir ROBERT PEEL.—"I entirely agree, if all other things were nearly balanced, historical recollections ought to be considered of some importance. * * * It is also of some importance that the Houses of Parliament should be in the neighbourhood of the Law Courts, where the judges are accustomed to sit, where those counsel and other gentlemen of the legal profession, by whom the parliamentary and other business is usually transacted, are in the habit of attending; for the near vicinity of the House the command of the services and assistance of the first men of the profession. This is important, especially after a general election, and I much doubt whether we should lose this advantage if the courts were removed to a distance from us."—EDITOR.

ESSAY III.

ON THE ENGLISH LAW OF BAILMENTS.

THE case we last cited of Doorman v. Jenkins (a) is of considerable importance, and ranges under the first class of Lord Holt's bailments—viz. Depositum. In that case the question of gross negligence was left to the jury, and from the decision, it is now very clear that gross negligence may be committed by a depositary, although he may have kept the property entrusted to him with as much care as his own, and that his negligence of his own goods is no defence (b). This may to superficial readers appear at variance with the opinion of Lord Holt, who in saying “The keeping them as he kept his own, is an argument of his honesty,” meant that it was an argument against the supposition of gross negligence, which his Lordship considered almost the same thing with dishonesty; this is illustrated by his own expression: “If there be such gross neglect, it is looked upon as evidence of fraud,” but it is equally clear that a depositary is not liable for any thing short of gross negligence. The doctrine of Lord Holt over-ruled the opinion of Lord Coke in Southcote's case (c), which was, that a depository is responsible if the goods are stolen from him, unless he accepts them specially to keep as his own. Before this case there was no solemn determination of this question. Sir William Jones, in his treatise on bailments(d), expresses an opinion that Lord Holt's division of bailments is a little inaccurate, that in truth the fifth sort is no more than a branch of the third, and a seventh might with equal reason have been added, since the fifth is capable of another subdivision. Sir William Jones acknowledged, therefore, but five species.—1. Depositum, which is a naked bailment, without reward, of goods to be kept for the bailor. 2. Mandatum, or commission; when the mandatory undertakes, without recompense, to do some act about the things bailed, or simply to carry them; and hence Sir Henry Finch divides bailment into two sorts, to keep and to employ, Law bk. 2, c. 18. 3. Commodatum, or loan for use, when goods are bailed without pay, to be used for a certain time by the bailee. 4. Pignori Acceptum; when a thing is bailed by a debtor to his creditor in pledge, or as a security for the debt. 5. Locatum, or hiring, which is always for a reward, and this bailment is either, 1. locatio rei, by which the hirer gains the temporary use of the thing; or 2. locatio operis faciendi, when work and labour, or care and pains, are to be performed and bestowed on the thing delivered; or 3. locatio operis mercium vehendarum, when goods are bailed for the purpose of being carried from place to place, either to a public carrier, or to a private person. In this learned and elegant essay, Sir W. Jones has, by a close analysis of the cases, shewn the confusion occasioned by Lord Coke's inaccurate doctrine, as to the responsibility of a mere depository for stealing without his default (see Co. Lit. 89, a. b. Southcote's case ante), and as to the non-responsibility of a pledge in such cases by reason as Lord Coke says of his property;

(id.) he has confirmed, with slight exception, the luminous view of the responsibility of the several bailees, by Lord Holt in Cogg v. Burnard, by reference to the text of the civil law and its commentators, from which, through the medium of Bracton, Lord Holt derived his doctrine. He has pointed out the incongruity in Lord Holt's system, in requiring the same extreme care from a hirer as from a borrower, and has traced it to its source in a peculiar expression in the Digest, copied by Bracton; and has thus, beside illustrating the subject with such apposite learning, done all that reasoning, without judicial authority, can do, to reduce the English law on the subject to a system harmonising with the settled doctrine of Rom, with the laws of other countries, and with the rules of natural equity and good sense. His conclusions may be summed up thus: that when the bailment is beneficial merely to the bailor (as in cases of gratuitous deposits to keep), the bailee is only responsible for fraud, or that extreme negligence which in legal presumption is equivalent to it: that when the bailment is mutually beneficial (as in cases of pledge, of letting, and hiring, of performing works for pay,) the bailee is responsible for ordinary neglect, or the want of that ordinary care, which a prudent man takes of his own goods: and that where the bailment is beneficial solely to the bailee (as in loans for use without reward,) the bailee is responsible even for a slight neglect. (e) The opinion of Sir William Jones was adopted by LORD LOUGHBOROUGH in Shields v. Blackburne, (ante) in which case his Lordship said, "I agree with Sir William Jones that when a bailee undertakes to perform a gratuitous act, from which the bailor alone is to receive benefit, then the bailee is only liable for gross negligence."

(e) Bac. Ab. tit. Bailment D. see also Potliff Contr. trat. de Dépôt. n. 29. Stiern de Jure Sacra l. 2. c. 5.—1 Gow. N. P. Ca. 30.—Jones v. Clark, 1 Balst. 306-312.—1 Roll. 126-80.—Kettle v. Brown, 2 Willes 118.

But if a man gratuitously undertakes to do a thing to the best of his skill, when his situation or profession is such as to imply skill, an omission of that skill is imputable to him as gross negligence. If, in this case, a ship broker, or a clerk in the Custom-house, had undertaken to enter the goods, a wrong entry, would in them be gross negligence, because their situation and employment necessarily imply a competent degree of knowledge in making such entries." This distinction does not make any unpaid agent liable for less than gross negligence. It only makes some persons who by reason of their skill, are more competent of care, liable in a greater degree to the charge of gross negligence, than less skilful persons, and even this distinction is confined to a class of cases, where competency and skill are required. With this exception, all the cases go to establish a doctrine as clearly settled, that an unpaid agent is liable for gross negligence and for nothing less.

In what cases may a joint fiat be sued out against all or some of the members of a firm, or separate fiat against one or each of them?—And what debts may be admitted to proof under each of such fiats?

ANSWER TO PROBLEM 25. VOL. 3.

By E. A.

ON WHAT SUBJECTS MAY RELIEF BE OBTAINED BY BILL IN CHANCERY?"

The first step in a court of equity on the part of the plaintiff, is what is technically called filings a bill." This bill usually contains an averment that the matter in question is within the jurisdiction of the court; and hence we are led to the observance of the necessity which exists of a correct knowledge of the nature and boundaries of this jurisdiction, in order that it may be in our compass to ascertain when and wherefore the matter in question lies within such jurisdiction.

The subjects of relief by bill in Chancery are usually divided into seven distinct classes, viz.:—

1. Accident; 2. Account; 3. Fraud; 4. Infancy; 5. Mistake; 6. The specific performance of Agreements; and, 7. Trusts. Under each of which heads it is proposed, in answering this problem, to give a certain number of examples, sufficient (with due deference to your opinion) to show the nature and extent of the relief sought for, and, we may presume, in all probability, obtained in a court of equity; first of all premising, that to some one or other of these stocks, almost every exercise of the equitable jurisdiction of the court may be referred; not only in cases which are primarily and exclusively submitted to its decision, but also whenever it lends its aid as ancillary to, or by its power of granting injunctions, restrains proceedings in other courts. Having said thus much, we will begin with the first of those heads, or stocks, which the subject is divided into, viz.:—

Accidents.—The redress for many accidents is supplied in the courts of law; as loss of deeds; mistakes in receipts or accounts; wrong payments; deaths; which make it impossible to perform a condition literally, and a multitude of other contingencies; and many cannot be relieved even in a court of equity: as if by accident a recovery was ill-suffered, a devise ill-executed, a contingent remainder destroyed, or a power of leasing omitted in a family settlement. (3 Bla. Com. 431.) But in general, a party who is, or is likely to be injured by an accident, seeks relief in a court of equity; as if by unavoidable accident, parties who have entered into an agreement, are prevented from executing it literally, a court of equity will interfere, and if compensation can be made will give relief. (Per Lord Alvanley, M. R. in the case of Eaton v. Lyon, 3 Ves. 692.) So where in consequence of the death of a trustee or other accident, the execution of a trust would otherwise fail, the Court of Chancery will execute it. (Brown v. Higgs, 8 Ves. 570.) And when advantage is attempted to be taken of any accident rendering a literal performance of a contract impossible, if the failure be not substantial, courts of equity will interfere, though courts of law could give no relief. (See Eaton v. Lyon, above cited.) A palpable case is, where a bond has been burnt, lost, or cancelled, by accident. This is another ground for relief in equity, but the averment in the bill must be supported by an affidavit, annexed, to the same effect; if the court be satisfied of the truth of the averment, it will give such relief as the circumstances of the case, and its consistency with justice, may seem to require, and that not only against a principal, but against his surety. (Skip v. Huey, 3 Atk. 93.) The grounds on which this equitable jurisdiction was originally built, were that the party suing on a bond in a court of law could not recover without profert and oyer of the bond; and when those courts, in relaxing from their strictness, dispensed in such cases with profert and oyer, the courts of equity still retained a concurrent jurisdiction with them, which, as observed by Lord Thurlow, could not be excluded by a mere change of proceeding in other courts. This jurisdiction extends to, and a like relief is given in, all cases in which the deed or instrument has been lost by the plaintiff or concealed or destroyed by the defendant. (Fonblanque, Eq. Tr. 1. 17. note.) The estate of a mortgagee usually becomes what is termed in law absolute, on non-payment of the money by a day named; but the Court of Chancery will decree a re-conveyance to the mortgagor at any time within twenty years from the last payment of interest, or payment of part of the principal, or from the last acknowledgment in writing, (a) on payment by the mortgagor of all sums due for principal and interest. It is evident that in this case the court regards the mortgagee's estate merely as a security for a debt, which the mortgagor has from accident or misfortune been prevented from paying (Id. 257. 2. n. d.); it being on the ground that accident alone has prevented their performance, that courts of equity relieve against penalties in bonds and covenants; but the party against whom relief is had must, generally speaking, be put into the same condition he would have been in if the penalty had not been incurred. (1 Mad. 32.) Upon the ground of preventing the injustice which might otherwise be occasioned by the loss or destruction of deeds by accident, equity will sometimes imply a grant, of which there is no other evidence than the acts of the parties, which, it is presumed, would not have been performed had no such grant originally existed. (1 Mad. 29.) And where a party covenants to produce title deeds (without the usual exception against accidents), and they happen to be destroyed, here equity will relieve the covenantor against the consequences of his covenant. If trustees under a power of sale, make a legal contract for sale of the estate, the contract binds the estate; and though by unavoidable accident, as by deaths of the parties, the power should be extinguished, yet the contract must be executed by those who obtained an interest by the extinguishment of the power. (Mortlock v. Buller, 10 Ves. jun. 292.) And so the death of the vendor or vendee before conveyance is in equity immaterial. (1 Sugden, Vendors, 275. last ed.) So equity will (on the presumed ground of accident) relieve a purchaser for valuable consideration against a defective execution of a power. (See Sugden's Tr. Powers, c. 6.)

CITY OF LONDON.

COURT OF COMMON COUNCIL—CORPORATION REFORM BILL.

May 8.

We have, as an important STATISTICAL matter, before noticed the motion made by CORNELIUS WHEELER, Esq., (Aldgate Ward) upon the Report of the Committee, in relation to the representation of the Wards in Common Council, and on the expediency of reducing the number of Members of the Court of Common Council; also, the opinions of the City Law Officers upon the power possessed by the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons in Common Council assembled, to increase or reduce the number of members of the Court of Common Council (a).

That Committee was of opinion that the total number of members should be 200, and that such Wards as would by virtue of the respective number of inhabitants and amount of rateable property, be entitled to more than twelve representatives, should be subdivided in such manner as that no one division should have more than twelve nor less than six representatives, and that in all cases where Wards might be subdivided, there should be representatives for such Wards should be returned by and from such subdivisions respectively independently of any other parts of the Wards.

This important measure of Corporation Reform was introduced into the Court of Common Council by Mr. Wheeler, to whom the unsparing exertions the citizens of London are indebted for the completion of the measure. This day an act of the Common Council was passed, carrying into effect the recommendations of the Committee, by which the representation of the citizens will depend now upon themselves, and if they are bound to themselves they must be well represented.

We are enabled, from authority on which we can place reliance, to place before

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LEGAL GUIDE.

SIR,—Your correspondent, “ Aliquis,” in answering Problem 22, vol. 3,(1) has omitted to state what is now considered a most important “ act of bankruptcy,” and which I will state as in continuation of his answer :—14th, By the 8th section of 1 and 2 Vic. c. 110. it is enacted, that if any single creditor, or any two or more creditors, being partners, whose debt shall amount to £100.
and upwards, or any two creditors whose debts shall amount to £150. or upwards, or any three or more creditors whose debts shall amount to £200. or upwards, of any trader within the meaning of the Bankrupt Laws, shall file an affidavit or affidavits in the Court of Bankruptcy that such debts are due, and that such debtor is such a trader as aforesaid, and shall cause him to be served with a copy of such affidavit or affidavits, and with a notice in writing requiring immediate payment of such debt or debts; and if such trader shall not within twenty-one days after personal service of such affidavit or affidavits and notice pay such debt or debts, or secure or compound for the same to the satisfaction of such creditor or creditors, or enter into a bond in such sum, and with such two sufficient sureties as a Commissioner of the Court of Bankruptcy shall approve of, to pay such sum or sums as shall be recovered in any action or actions which shall have been or shall thereafter be brought for recovery of the same, together with such costs as shall be given in the same, or to render himself to the custody of the gaoler of the court in which such action shall have been or may be brought, according to the practice of such court, in such time and manner as the said court or any Judge thereof shall direct, after judgment shall have been recovered in such action, every such trader shall be deemed to have committed an act of Bankruptcy on the twenty-second day after service of such affidavit or affidavits and notice, provided a fiat shall issue against him within two calendar months from the filing of such affidavits.

CORONERS' JURIES.—EXEMPTION OF ATTORNIES.

Case submitted to the ATTORNEY and SOLI-CITOR-GENERAL upon the liability of Attornies to serve on Coroners' Juries.—
OPINION.

CASE.

1. Whether attornies and solicitors of the Superior Courts, are liable to serve as jurymen on coroners' inquests?—and if so, to what penalty or punishment do they subject themselves by refusing to serve?

2. In case you should be of opinion that they are not liable so to serve, what course should be taken to establish the privilege, and to put a stop to the practice of causing attornies and solicitors to be summoned?—and will it be necessary that an attorney or solicitor who may be summoned should personally attend the inquest and claim the exemption, or will it be sufficient to send to the coroner notice of such exemption?—or must a writ of privilege be sued out on each occasion?—or what other mode of proceeding do you recommend to be adopted?

1. We are of opinion that attornies and solicitors of the Superior Courts are not liable to serve on coroners' inquests.

2. We think the best mode of trying the question, would be for an attorney summoned on a coroner's inquest, to attend and claim his privilege; and if he should be fined by the coroner to contest the validity of the fine in the Court of Exchequer.

CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

CASE of CELIA TIPPINS, tried and found GUILTY of MURDER of her child at the last Gloucester Assizes.

At the last assizes for the county of Gloucester, Celia Tippins, the wife of John Tippins, a painter at Bristol, was indicted for the murder of her infant child. From the evidence it appeared that shortly after her marriage with Tippins, in September, 1838, they quarrelled, and she left her husband and went to reside at Hereford. During her residence in that city, it was alleged that she formed a connexion with one Thomas Lee, that she left him in May, 1839, and having returned to Bristol in October last, she was delivered of a son (the child she was charged with having murdered), who was registered by herself in the name of "Richard Lee, the child of Thomas Lee and Celia Tippins." Shortly after her confinement, her husband sent her back to Hereford to her mother, requesting that she would assist her in obtaining some support for the child from Lee, and expressing his willingness to receive and protect his wife, if she was not burdened with the support of the child. She reached Hereford with the child in a state of great distress and fatigue, and upon application to Lee he refused to give her any thing, and pushed her out of doors. She left Hereford, on her return to Bristol, with the child on the 1st of November, and on the 2nd reached Slimbridge, in the county of Gloucester, apparently much fatigued, the weather being very wet. She left Slimbridge the same afternoon with the child, and arrived at Newport without it at six in the evening. The body of the child was subsequently found in a watercourse, about twenty yards from the road, and on being apprehended at her husband's house at Bristol on the following Tuesday, the clothes which had been worn by the infant were found in her possession. It was shown that the road from Slimbridge to Newport would have brought her for some distance along the side of the Gloucester and Berkeley Canal, into which she could have thrown her infant if it had been her object to destroy it, and in a great degree escape detection. The jury having returned a verdict of guilty, Mr. Baron Gurney pronounced sentence of death on the prisoner.

Mr. Godson, the member for Kidderminster, who was of counsel for the prisoner, being dissatisfied with the evidence on which the conviction was chiefly founded, on the 13th of April addressed a letter to Lord Normanby, forwarding a petition in favour of the prisoner, requesting his Lordship's attention to the case, and urging the propriety of referring the medical evidence to the examination of some eminent surgeon, as it was at complete variance with all medical authority. On the same day Mr. Godson received an answer from Lord Normanby, stating that the prisoner would receive a pardon on condition of transportation for life. Mr. Godson, on the 16th of April, again addressed a letter to Lord Normanby, stating that he was not satisfied with the condition imposing transportation for life, and stating that the medical evidence upon which the conviction was chiefly founded was so erroneous that the prisoner was entitled to a pardon, or at least to the punishment of imprisonment. To his second application on behalf of the prisoner Mr. Godson received no answer till the 4th of May, when he was informed that the prisoner had been removed to the Lunatic Asylum for the county of Gloucester, it having been certified to Lord Normanby that she had become insane.

The trial and conviction took place on the 6th of April. From that day the unfortunate prisoner was kept in suspense until reason gave way, a period of eighteen days having elapsed from the date of Mr. Godson's letter.—Times.

NEW BILL FOR THE BETTER ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE.

The LORD CHANCELLOR moved the second reading of this bill. His Lordship made a long statement for the purpose of showing that the Chancery Courts, as at present constituted, were insufficient to perform the immense increase of business which came under their cognizance, and proposed some alterations, of which the following were the leading points:—

That there should be two new judges in Chancery, to be called Vice-Chancellors, making altogether three Vice-Chancellors.

That there should be a new Master in Chancery.

That the Master of the Rolls should be permanently Vice-President of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

That this committee should have power to call on the 15 judges for their opinions.

That the equity jurisdiction of the Court of Exchequer should be abolished.

VICE-CHANCELLOR'S COURT,

DEC. 20.

LENNOX v. LENNOX.

LEGACY.—Construction of a bequest to a Woman surviving any Husband, and she dying unmarried.

In this case Samuel Lennox, by his will, dated 4th April, 1835, gave to trustees £4,000. upon trust after his decease to invest the same in Government Securities, and to pay the dividends to his daughter, Ann Lennox, for her life, or to any person whom she should by writing appoint to receive the same, to the intent that the dividends might be enjoyed by his said daughter during her life for her sole and separate use, independently of any husband with whom she might intermarry, and so that she should have no power to anticipate the same; and after her decease, upon trust, or to the said trust-moneys as the testator's daughter should by deed or will appoint, and in default of appointment in trust for all her children; but in case there should be no child, who should attain the age of twenty-one years, or be married, then as to the said trust-moneys, if his said daughter should survive any husband with whom she might intermarry, in trust for his said daughter, her heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, for her or their own absolute use and benefit; but if the husband of his said daughter should survive her, then in trust for such person or persons as his said daughter should, by her will, as if she were sole and unmarried, appoint; and in default of appointment, in trust for such person or persons who at the decease of his said daughter, would have become entitled thereto under the statute for the distribution of the effects of intestates, if the said Ann Lennox died possessed thereof intestate and without having married. The testator died on the 13th June, 1836. The trustees laid out the £4,000. according to the trusts of the will, and paid the dividends to Ann Lennox, until her death, in the month of March, 1839, intestate, and without ever having been married. The testator's widow claimed the £4,000. as administratrix of Ann Lennox; but the trustees refused to act, except under the direction of the Court; and the question was, whether by the death of Ann Lennox, intestate and unmarried, the £4,000. became undisposed of and fell into the residue of the testator's estate, or whether it went to her personal representatives.

Mr. K. Bruce, for the plaintiff, cited Davis v. Norton, (2 P. Wms. 309); Doe v. Shippard, (Douglas, 75); Swayne v. Smith, (1 Sim. & Stu. 56); and Murray v. Jones, (2 Ves. & Bea. 313), to shew that a party cannot speculate upon what was intended to be done by a testator in case a general bequest should fail, without having words which directly specify the intention, and contended that she has as much not survived as survived her husband.

Mr. Wigram, for the administratrix of Ann Lennox, said the cases which have been mentioned, but not particularly quoted on the other side, are those upon which I mean to rely; the first Murray v. Jones, in which the testatrix, stating her power to appoint by will under a settlement, left the interest of two-thirds of a certain sum of stock vested in trustees to E. M. for life, and, after her death, the capital to her children; and also of the other third in case of the death of persons to whom it was given. And after several other bequests, the testatrix provided, that "in case she herself should have but one child living at her death, or, in case she should have children, whether sons or daughters, who should all but one die in her lifetime, then that her trustee should stand possessed of her whole residuary personal estate, in trust for E. M. and her children, upon the same trusts as were declared of the previous gifts to the said E. M." The testatrix then died, having never had a child; and the question was, whether E. M. and her children could claim under the residuary clause. And it was held, that the testatrix, never having contemplated such an event as her own death without children, being a condition on which E. M. and her children were to take, the limitation of the residue took effect. Then Jones v. Westcomb, (Pr. in Ch. 316), where a testator devised a term of years to his wife for life, and after her death to the child she was then enceinte with; but if such child died before twenty-one, then he devised one-third part of the said term to his wife, whom he appointed executrix; the wife happened not to be enceinte at the time, and so the contingency upon which the devise to her was to take place never happened. It was held, first, that the devise to her was good, though the contingency never happened; secondly, that she should have the undisposed surplus of the personal estate, which should not go in a course of administration. In that case the residue was given upon supposition that a child would be born; here it is the same, on the supposition that the daughter would marry. In that case it was nothing to the testator whether the child was born or not; but the interests were to be protected of any child that might be born; so, here it was nothing to the testator whether his daughter married or not, but merely protection was to be given in case of marriage. The case of Makinnon v. Sewell, (5 Sim. 78, 2 M. & K. 202), there was a bequest of a residue to D. for life, with remainder to her daughter L. if she should survive her mother and attain twenty-one; but, if not, then to such other children of D. as should be living at their mother's decease, and should attain twenty-one, then over to M. D. survived her daughter L., and her only other child attained twenty-one, but died in her life time; and it was held, that on the death of D., leaving no children, the bequest over to M. took effect. And in the case of Prestwidge v. Groombridge (6 Sim. 171), a testatrix directed the interest of her residuary estate to be applied in defraying the expenses of the education of her nephews G. and C.; and the principal to be applied either in binding them apprentices at the age of fourteen, or to be reserved till they attained twenty-one, to commence business. And the testatrix went on to say, "In the event of G. and C. both or either of them, being settled before this will comes in force, I provide that the next by (J. or H.) have the benefit, and so on." G. and C. survived the testatrix, but died under twenty-one: held, that J. and H. were entitled to the residue. Aiton v. Brooks (7 Sim. 206) is another authority in support of this bill. In Meadows v. Parry (1 V. & Bea. 124), there was a gift of a residue to R. P., in case all the children which the testator should happen to have should die before coming of age, at which period the shares previously given to them were made distributable, and in the testator's lifetime. The testator died without having ever had any children; and it was held, that his having children was not a condition precedent, and the gift of the residue took effect.

Mr. Knight Bruce replied. The case of Davies v. Norton he never heard questioned there A. seised in fee had a son B. and a son C., and devised his lands to his son B. in tail general, and if his son B. should die without issue, and his wife should survive him, then to his wife to have the premises for life, remainder to C. in fee. B., the son, died without issue, but the testator's wife died before him. It was held that C. was not entitled to the remainder in fee because the contingency was annexed to all the devises over; there the mention of the wife was merely for the purpose of introducing her into the estate. Thus in the case of Doe v. Shippen (Douglas, 74), under a devise of land to trustees to pay £20 of the rents and profits to the testator's daughter, and the rest to her husband, and the whole rents and profits to the husband after the daughter's death; and in case the daughter should survive her husband, then (the land) to the use of the daughter for life, and after her death to the use of her son in tail, then to the heirs of the body of the husband by the daughter, then to the heirs of her body, then to the heirs of the husband; the daughter dying before her husband, the limitations over could not take effect, the contingency not being confined to her life estate; but affecting all the other limbs tions, and operating as a condition precedent. And, in the case of Swayne v. Smith, (1 Sim. & St. 55), the same doctrine was recognised by Sir John Leach, who says, "It is not very easy to find a satisfactory reason why the testatrix should have intended that the three legatees of the three sums of stock should take if the sister died without child or husband, having been married, which would be the effect of this will; and that the same legatees should not take if the sister died without child or husband, not having been married."

The VICE-CHANCELLOR—The question is, whether it can be collected on the face of the will, that it was the intention of the testator that the legacies should pass, other than by reason of the fact of marriage. I think that the simplest of all the cases is Jones v. Westcomb; and all the others in effect are founded on it: there, the limitation was to the child the testator's wife was eniente with; but, if such child died before twenty-one, then he devised one-third over. The fact was, she was not eniente. The question was, whether she was entitled to the one-third. There was nothing to prevent the wife's taking, except the fact of a child being alive to take it from her. It is immaterial in effect whether he said, if no child should live to attain twenty-one, or whether he said, if a child die before attaining twenty-one, that the ultimate limitation is to take effect. When an ultimate limitation is to take effect on the failure of the preceding gift, and the language which describes the preceding gift happens to be not in terms applicable, then the meaning is clear that the gift over should take effect; but it cannot be overlooked that marriage was the event which he contemplated. Plainly, the circumstance of its passing away from the bulk of his property is made to depend on the fact of his daughter there-after marrying: it might have been different if the daughter had been married. If the testator had meant that his daughter should take in the event simply of her being unmarried, he might have said, in trust for my daughter Ann Lennox only; and then he might have gone on to say, "but if the husband of my daughter shall survive her," then over. But, instead of doing that, I am of opinion that, for the purpose of marking the general intention not to let the corpus go away, except on marriage, he says, if the said daughter should survive any husband with whom she might intermarry, then in trust for his daughter. I think here that the testator did not intend, on the face of the will, that the legacy should pass away from his estate, unless in the event of the daughter's marrying. So the testator has described the very event, on the happening of which it was to go over: and it must go, under these circumstances, to the residuary legatees.

ROLLS' COURT.—May 6.

WILLIAMS v. NIXON AND OTHERS. EXECUTORS—their liabilities for the acts of each other.

Rees Williams, by his will dated July, 1824, devised to the defendants, John Trinder Nixon and Alexander William Mills, after certain legacies all the residue of his personal and all his real property upon trust to pay testator's wife £200. a year, his three sisters £10. each per annum, an annuity to his son George Rees Williams, and to pay certain other annuities, and then he directed Nixon and Mills to invest the residue of his rents and dividends upon Government or real securities, so as to accumulate until his son George Rees should attain 45, and then to pay the whole of the annual produce to his son for life, and after his death to his son's widow. The testator died in 1826, leaving Nixon and Mills, his executors, surviving, who proved his will. George Rees Williams, the son, died, and appointed his wife sole guardian to his children, the plaintiffs. By the decree, which was made on the 30th of January, 1836, there was a reference to the Master to take an account of the personal estate of Rees Williams, come to the hands of Nixon and Mills. The Master, by his report, dated August 1, 1838, certified that £13,364. had come to the hands of Alexander William Mills, and that he had disbursed £7,029. leaving a sum of £6,113. due from him. A part of this sum Alexander W. Mills had, by his answer, admitted to be in his hands on account of his personal estate, but had failed to pay the same into court, pursuant to an order which had been made by the court on the 14th of November, 1833. A small dividend, however, had been received from his estate; but there still remained due from him a sum of £5,489. 7s. 6d. But although Mr. Mills was in June, 1826, in debt to the testator's estate, yet still his co-trustee, J. T. Nixon, had joined with him in the sale of the sum of £567. 16s. 5d. Three per Cent. Reduced Bank Annuities, which had produced a sum of £480.

Mr. Pemberton contended that under these circumstances, Mr. Nixon must be considered as having been guilty of a breach of trust, and consequently liable to make good the sums for which his co-executor was a defaulter. Mr. Nixon, by proving the will, had accepted the trust, notwithstanding which he had allowed Mr. Mills to take and retain the dividends to so large an amount, though he ought to have seen that they were invested as directed by the testator's will.

Lord LANGDALE said, the question was, whether the defendant Nixon was to be charged with monies of the testator which were to be received by his co-executor, Mr. Mills. If an executor knew that the funds received by his co-executors were not applied according to the will, he would in respect of that negligence be charged with the amount. The testator here having invested these persons with the character of executors, had intrusted them, and each had a separate right of receiving the testator's property. There was money in the funds and other property. He directed several annuities to be paid, and was possessed of a leasehold estate. Both executors proved the will, and each became entitled to receive the profits. Mills received the dividends. If Nixon knew his co-executor was misapplying the property, he became liable himself, because he was a witness of, and an acquiescing party in, the application. He must have known that there was stock, and that the dividends were received by Mills, but he might have reason to believe they were applied in satisfaction of the annuities. The action had proceeded on the ground that Nixon, in point of fact, knew all he might have known. He must have known the contents of the will, and the value of the property, of which he had to make a statement, but it did not appear that he knew what Mills had done, and he did not think that the Court had ever gone to the extent now sought.

COOK v. FRENCH.

BILL OF EXCHANGE—NOTICE TO THE DRAWER.

In this case an action had been brought by the holder of a bill of exchange against the drawer, and which had been dishonoured by the acceptor, Mr. Duterran. When the bill was dishonoured, the following note was sent by the holder to the defendant:—"I beg to inform you that Mr. Duterran's acceptance for £200., drawn and endorsed by you, and due July 1, has been presented for payment and returned, and now remains unpaid. Yours, &c." On the trial the jury gave a verdict for the plaintiff, and a new trial had been moved for on the ground that this notice was insufficient, inasmuch as it did not give the defendant notice of the nature and extent of his liability.

The COURT was of opinion that the notice was sufficient.—Rule refused. (a)

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS—MAY 13.

MISSENGER v. SOUTHEY.

PROMISSORY NOTE.—What is sufficient notice of dishonour?

In this case the plaintiff, the holder of the defendant's promissory note which had been dis-honoured, wrote him as follows:—"This is to inform you that the bill I took of you for £15. 2s. 6d. is not took up, and 4s. 6d. expences and the money I must pay immediately." Proceedings took place, and at the trial the plaintiff had a verdict for the amount of the note.

A rule nisi was afterwards had to show cause why the verdict should not be set aside and entered for the defendant, on the ground of the want of sufficiency of the notice of dishonour.

Cause was shewn this day, and TINDAL, C.J., in giving the judgment of the Court, said that the rule laid down by the House of Lords in Solart v. Palmer (1), the Court was bound by, and that the notice in this case was not sufficient within that rule. According to the natural construction of the letter it seemed rather to point to presentment of the note to some third person not liable in this action. The words "and 4s. 6d. expence," could not be held to convey any positive intimation of that having been incurred for noting the bill.

(1) 1 Bing. N. C. 194; 1 Scott 2. Clarke and Fin. (Dom. Proc.) 98. In that case, which was an action by the holders against the indorsers of a bill of exchange for £683. drawn the 25th of April, 1825, by Joseph Keats, on, and accepted by, Daniel, Jones, and Co., payable at Williams, Burgess, and Co.'s, eight months after date.

Payment having been refused by the acceptors when the bill became due, the attornies of the holders wrote to the indorsers as follows:—"A bill for £683., drawn by Mr. Joseph Keats, upon Messrs. Daniel, Jones, and Co., and bearing your indorsement, has been put into our hands by the assignees of Mr. J. R. de Alzedo, with directions to take legal measures for the recovery thereof, unless immediately paid to gentlemen, your obedient servants."

At the trial of the cause, before Lord TENTERDEN, the only question was, whether this letter amounted to notice of the dishonour of the bill, without which notice the indorser would not be responsible. Upon that point Lord TENTERDEN felt himself bound, at nisi prius, by the decision in Hartley v. Case, (4 Barn. and Cres. 337). Where it was held that a notice of the dishonour of a bill of exchange must contain an intimation that payment of the bill had been refused by the acceptor, and therefore, that a letter merely containing a demand of payment was not a sufficient notice. However, observing that the sum was large, and the question of importance, he suggested that the defendant might tender a bill of exceptions, as the readiest mode of obtaining the opinion of the highest tribunal.

A bill of exceptions was tendered and sealed accordingly, and argued in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, when that Court unanimously confirmed the authority of Hartley v. Case, and held, that a letter demanding payment and threatening proceedings at law, did not amount to notice of the dishonour of a bill. (See 7 Bing. 530.)

From this decision an appeal was made to the House of Lords, and the Judges being summoned to hear the argument, PARK, J. declared the unanimous opinion of the Judges present, (Williams, B., Bolland, B., Alderson, B., Patteson, J., Taunton, J., Littledale, J., Vaughan, J., Gaselee, J., Park, J.) that the letter of the plaintiff's attornies did not amount to notice of the dishonour of the bill, as such a notice ought, in express terms, or by necessary implication, to convey full information that the bill had been dishonoured.

LORD BROUGHAM, C., said the Judgment of the Court below must be affirmed, with costs not exceeding £350., on the ground, that after the decision of Hartley v. Case, and the sanction given to the authority of that decision by the unanimous judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, and the 5th edition of Bayley on Bills, the present case was too clear for an appeal, and affirmed the Judgment. S. C. 1 Bing. N. C., 195.—From these cases a notice of dishonour must express the fact of the bill having been presented and dishonoured, a mere demand of payment is not sufficient. MORTIMER v. WRIGHT.

PARENT AND CHILD.—Liability of a Father for Debt incurred by his Child, a Minor, for Board and Lodging.

Mr. F. V. Lee showed cause against a rule for a non-suit, or for a new trial, which had been granted in this case. The action was one in which the plaintiff sought to recover a sum of money from the defendant, as the father of a young man, aged twenty, who had incurred a small debt for board and lodging during his illness in the house of the plaintiff. These facts being proved at the trial, the plaintiff put in and relied on the defendant's letter in answer to the application for the debt, which was in the following terms:—"I am sorry to hear Joseph is so ill. You have written home for money, but I cannot advance any at this time, being harvest. But Joseph will be of age soon, when he will be able to pay you what he owes you, being entitled to some money." This, it was contended by the plaintiff's counsel at the trial, was not any evidence to bind the defendant to pay this claim, but the learned BARON ROLFE, by whom the cause was tried, refused to nonsuit, and leaving the case to the jury, a verdict was given for the plaintiff. The present rule having been obtained, it was now urged in support of the verdict on the first point, that the letter in question contained evidence of an admission of liability on the part of the defendant sufficient to go to the jury to warrant them in inferring that there was an implied contract between the parties. A father was not indeed bound by law to pay the debt of a son, but very little evidence was necessary to fix him with such a liability, and the jury were quite justified in construing this letter into an admission of the father's liability. The authorities, moreover, were in favour of this position, and would be seen by reference to the cases of Blackburne v. Mackie, 1 C. and P.; Nicholls v. Allen, 3 C. and P., 36; and Low v. Wilkin, 6 Ad. and El., 718 (1) in which latter case a father had been held liable for clothes supplied to his son while at school, while there was no proof whatever that he ever even saw them in use.

The COURT, without calling upon Mr. Knowles to support his rule, made it absolute for entering a nonsuit. There was no evidence whatever to go to the jury of any contract on the part of the defendant to pay the plaintiff's claim. The was no doubt a moral obligation on the part of the father to support his child, but no legal one more binding on him than on any other relation, the only difference being, that the proximity of his connexion would lead juries more readily to infer, from circumstances, a promise to do so, or admission of liability. Beyond this letter there was, however, no circumstances whatever, and the case must, therefore, be decided, as all others, upon the construction which that letter ought to bear. Looking at its terms, then, they did not appear to the Court to contain any passage which admitted any contract or liability to pay anything for the son. The whole case went to show that the son had been in the habit of supporting himself, and the father, on being applied to in his son's illness, rather to assist him as an act of kindness than as an obligation, declined to advance anything, adding that his son would soon be in a situation to pay what he owed to the plaintiff. Throughout this there was no passage to fix any liability on a contract express or implied upon the defendant, and the case was wholly without foundation. The case of Low v. Wilkin, moreover, on which such stress had been laid by the plaintiff's counsel, as reported, was not one to which the Court could bring themselves to assent, as it went quite to remove the foundations of the law.

Rule absolute for a nonsuit.

(1) That case was an action of assumpsit for clothes sold and delivered. The plaintiff, a tailor, proved that the clothes were furnished to defendant's son, a boy at school, without the father's permission, and worn; the boy, when sent to the school, seemed in want of clothes; that when he went home for the holidays, he took the clothes in question with him, but was not wearing them; and he returned to school with them. The defendant lived at a short distance from the school. It did not appear that he had given any direction, or made any provision for supplying his son with clothes, nor was there any direct proof that the father had ever seen them. The judge (PARKE, B.) being of opinion that there was no evidence to go to the jury, directed a nonsuit, and Blackburn v. Mackay (1 Car. and Payne, 1) was cited. A rule Nisi for a new trial was granted, upon the ground that there was some evidence to charge the defendant that the contract between the father and the tradesman, in such a case, might be express or implied, and that it ought to have gone to the jury whether there was not an implied authority from the defendant for the supply of the clothes, for which Baker v. Keen (2 Stark, N. P. C. 501.) was cited.

After showing cause, Lord DENMAN, C.J., said, a father is properly liable for any necessary provision made for his infant son. In this instance the father was living at a short distance from the place where the goods were supplied; there was no evidence that he had authorized the master of the school, or any other person, to provide the boy with clothes, or that he had in any way furnished a supply for that purpose. If he wished to relieve himself from liability, I do not see why he should not have proved that he took such steps to provide for his son as rendered this supply unnecessary. If, indeed, the order had been given under circumstances which, of themselves, showed an impropriety in giving it, the case would have been different. I think it was for the jury to say, upon the facts, whether or not there was an implied authority from the father that these clothes should be furnished.

PARRISON, J., said, there was some evidence, though not a strong case. The son went home with the clothes, and we are not to suppose that while at home he shut them up in a box. The rest of the court concurred, and the rule was made absolute and set aside the nonsuit.—EDITOR.

KENNEY v. HUTCHINSON.

JUDGE'S ORDER upon a SUMMONS—PRACTICE as to the time of Service so as to prevent Judgment.

In this case the plaintiff having demurred to the defendant's plea, a summons was taken out for time to join in demurrer; and Gurney, Esq., made an order for two days' time, with the consent of the attorneys for plaintiff and defendant. This order was made at half-past four in the afternoon of the 22nd of January, and given up by five. It was not served, however, until between two and three o'clock on the following day, on the morning of which at half-past eleven, the plaintiff signed judgment.

A rule Nisi having been obtained for setting aside this judgment, after showing cause, PARKE, B., said, the attorney, it is true, may have been present at the making of the order, but how can he know from that whether the opposite party will elect to draw up the order and serve it or not? The real question is, what is a reasonable time to allow him to make that election? When the parties live within any reasonable distance of each other, there is ample time from five in the afternoon until nine at night to serve an order of this description. But at all events it ought to be served before the opening of the office next morning, or rather in strictness, before the time when the clerk of the opposite attorney would have to leave his office for the purpose of being present at the opening of it at eleven. Then as to the affidavit of merits, it is insufficient, for a man might with a safe conscience, interpret the word "defence" to signify merely a denial. The defendant had better amend, on the terms of pleading instantly and issuably, and taking short notice of trial.

The rest of the court concurred.

Leave to amend on terms.

VYSE v. WAKEFIELD.

COVENANT.—LIFE POLICY.—CONSTRUCTION of Covenant to appear at Insurance Office and to perform all the Conditions of the Insurance, and not to do any act that should avoid the Policy.—DEMURRER.

The defendant had entered into a covenant with the plaintiff to appear at any insurance-office then established, within London or the bills of mortality, for the purpose of having an insurance effected on his life, and to answer the usual questions touching the state of his health and as to his age; and, further, that he would afterwards do any act whereby such insurance might be avoided or prejudiced, and that he would well and faithfully perform all the conditions of the insurance. In pursuance of this covenant, it appeared the defendant attended at the Rock Insurance Company's office, and answered the necessary questions as to health, age, &c. The plaintiff subsequently effected an insurance on the life of the defendant at the office above-mentioned. One of the conditions of the insurance was, that the defendant should not go out of Europe. The defendant, however, did go beyond the limits prescribed, and, consequently the several premiums, of £81 per annum, paid by the plaintiff in respect of the policy, were forfeited, and the insurance became void. The plaintiff, therefore, brought his action for a breach of covenant. The defendant demurred to the declaration, on the ground that he had received no notice of the particular condition of insurance which he had violated. The question was, whether the plaintiff was bound to have given notice, or whether the defendant, in fulfilment of his covenant, was not bound to ascertain the conditions of the insurance.

Mr. Cowling contended, that the plaintiff need not have given notice to the defendant, when the latter had covenanted to perform all the conditions of any insurance which the plaintiff should effect on his life within the bills of mortality; that no such insurance could be effected without the defendant's knowledge; and that, as his residence was limited within certain bounds, the defendant ought to have ascertained, by inquiry, what the conditions upon which his life had been insured were.

PARKE, B. said, that if the covenant applied to any insurance to be effected in the Rock Insurance Office, it was clear that the plaintiff was not bound to give notice. On the other hand, if the covenant applied to "any insurance office," without specifying any one in particular, then it was equally clear that the defendant ought to have received notice of the conditions.

Lord ABINGER said he thought that the defendant was entitled to judgment on two grounds. In the first place, he was of opinion that if it were unnecessary on the part of the plaintiff to furnish notice with regard to the conditions of any insurance effected within the bills of mortality, it should be held to be equally unnecessary if the specified limit were all England. The plaintiff had reserved to himself the option of choosing the time to make the insurance, and when there was so extensive an option possessed by the plaintiff, he thought the defendant entitled to the notice. Besides the covenant was not merely to observe the usual conditions of an insurance, but to perform any conditions which might be made. There might have been a condition that the defendant should abstain from a particular kind of food, or from a particular practice, and of such conditions the defendant would certainly be entitled to notice.

PARKE, B. concurred with his Lordship, and said he thought that the correct interpretation of the covenant was, that the defendant had undertaken to perform any condition of a policy of insurance of which he should receive notice.

The rest of the Court concurred.
Judgment for the defendant.

ESSAY III.

ON THE ENGLISH LAW OF BAILMENTS.

WE will now proceed to the second class of Lord Holt's bailments, viz.—Com-odatum or lending gratis. The responsibility of the bailee in this class is more strictly forced, the loan being to the advantage of the bailee and not as in the first class for that of the bailor, and he will be made responsible for slight negligence.

There are four obligations imposed upon the borrower, and these are the result of the statute and the common law. (a)

1. To take proper care of the thing borrowed;

(a) Domat. B. 1, tit. 5. s. 2. n. 1.

2. To use it according to the intention of the lender;
3. To restore it at the proper time;
4. To restore it in proper condition.

The right of using the thing bailed is strictly confined to the use of the thing, and the conditions upon which that use was granted.

(b) If therefore A lends his horse to B to ride to York, B must not ride to Newcastle, if he does, and any accident should occur to the horse, however inevitable, he will be held responsible (c). So if A lends
B her jewels to wear, this will not authorize B to lend them to C. to wear. But if a man lends his horses and carriage for a month to a friend for his use, there a use by any of his family, or for family purposes, may be fairly presumed; though not a use for the mere benefit of strangers. In Bringloe v. Morrice, an action of trespass was brought for immoderately riding the plaintiff's horse. The defendant pleaded that the horse was lent to him by the plaintiff, and license given to him to ride him, and that by virtue of the license the defendant and his servants, alternately had ridden the animal. The plaintiff demurred; and the Court on the demurrer, held, that the license was annexed to the person of the defendant, and could not be communicated to another; for this riding was matter of pleasure. And NORTH, C. J. took a difference, where a certain time is limited for the loan of a horse, and where not. In the first case, the borrower has an interest in the horse during that time; and in that case his servant may ride, but in the other case not. A difference was also taken between hiring a horse to go to York, and borrowing a horse. In the first place, the party may allow his servant to ride, in the second, not.

It is somewhat remarkable that Blackstone and Lord Holt, should have considered that the same degree of responsibility attached to a bailee for hire, and to a borrower—the contracts are wholly unlike. Blackstone says, “Hiring and borrowing are also contracts by which a qualified property may be transferred to the hirer or borrower; in which there is only this difference, that hiring is always for a price, or stipend, or additional recompence; borrowing is merely gratuitous. But, the law in both cases is the same.”(d) Mr. Christian, in his note to this passage, observes, “the learned Commentator has here followed Lord Holt, who has treated a commodatum and a locatio, without distinction,”(e) but this seems to be properly corrected by Sir William Jones,(f) who concludes, that the hirer of a thing is answerable only for ordinary neglect; but that a gratuitous borrower is responsible even for slight negligence,(g) and that the borrower's incapacity to exert more than ordinary diligence, will not even on the ground of impossibility, furnish a sufficient excuse for slight neglect; as the borrower ought to have considered his own capacity, before he deluded his friend by engaging in the undertaking.(h) Pothier says the borrower ought to exert all possible care, such as the most careful persons apply to their own affairs; and that he is liable not only for a slight fault but for the slightest fault, de levissimâ culpâ.(i) The Pandects say, “Exactissimam diligentiam custodiendæ rei prestare compellitur, nec sufficit ei, eandem diligentiam adhibere, quam suis rebus adhibet, si alius diligentior custodire poterit.”(k) The care “such as the most careful persons apply to their own,” admits into the doctrine a qualification. Where the lender, for instance, is aware that the borrower is incapacitated from taking such care. As if a spirited horse is lent to a raw or rash youth, or to a weak and inefficient person, who is known to be such, the lender must content himself with such diligence as may be fairly expected to use; and he has no right to insist upon the diligence or prudence of a very thoughtful and experienced rider.

So that the term slight neglect must be construed to depend upon the particular circumstances of every case. The rule of the civil law that ordinary theft constitutes no excuse, because it can scarcely arise without some default or negligence of the borrower, may be relaxed where the borrower is not at fault; as if A borrows a silver ewer of B, and afterwards delivers it to a person of extraordinary fidelity and vigilance, to be returned to B; if it should be stolen from that person by thieves, without any neglect on his part, A would be excused, so if a robbery should be committed by open force or burglary. So again in cases of extraordinary casualties, against which human prudence cannot by extraordinary diligence guard against, as by fire, the fall of ruins, shipwreck, pirates, enemies, mobs, sudden inundation, sudden sickness, and even the frauds of strangers, against which the borrower could not guard himself, but there must be no default on the part of the borrower. Sir Wm. Jones says, if the house of Caius be in flames, and he, being able to secure one thing only, saves an urn of his own in preference to the silver ewer, which he had borrowed of Titius, he shall make the lender a compensation for the loss; especially if the ewer is the more valuable, and would consequently have been referred, had he been owner of them both. Even if his urn is the more precious, he must either leave it and bring away the borrowed vessel, or pay Titius the value of that which he has lost; unless the alarm was so sudden and the fire was so violent that no deliberation or selection could be justly expected, and Caius had time only to snatch the first utensil that presented itself.

This is the doctrine of Pothier, who argues that the borrower is obliged to use the most exact diligence in respect to the thing borrowed, and he bestows less than his engagement imports, when he uses less, than he applies to his own property even when he applies it to a case, where there is an impossibility of saving the borrowed property as well as his own.—So the Pandects—Si incendio vel ruina aliquid contigit, vel aliquod annum fatale, non tenebitur, nisi forte, cum posset res commodatus salvas facere, non prætulit (o).

Bacon, in writing upon this subject says, lending gratis to use for his advantage, here the borrower is strictly bound to keep it, for if he be guilty of the least neglect he shall be answerable, as if I lend a horse to go to the north of England, and he goes to the west, and the horse is stolen, he shall in that case be chargeable, for if he had gone as I directed, the horse, perhaps, would not have been stolen. This sort of bailment is mentioned in Bracton, 99; but in this case, if this horse had been in the stable of the bailee, and stolen thence without his default, as perhaps the thieves might first have bound the bailee, and then have taken the horse, he shall not be answerable. Bracton says he ought to take the utmost care, but in no place says he shall be charged where no default was in him. Such is also the French Law (p).

PROBLEM IV. VOL. IV.

CONTRACTS.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER.

In what cases will equity permit the contracting parties to make time the essence of a contract.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LEGAL GUIDE.

ANSWER TO PROBLEM 25. VOL. 3. By GUILIELMUS. (1.)

BILL IN CHANCERY.—On what subjects may relief be obtained by a bill in Chancery?

In endeavouring to answer this problem, I shall avail myself of Mr. Maddock's classification of the subjects falling under the equitable jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery. It is as follows:—1. Accident and Mistake; 2. Account; 3. Fraud; 4. Infants; 5. Specific performance of Agreements; 6. Trusts. In each of these cases relief may be obtained by filing a bill, but in some of them it is not the only, though most commonly adopted, means of gaining the assistance of the court.

1. Accident and Mistake.—The most usual case of accident, as here applied, is where a deed or instrument on which a title depends is accidentally lost or burnt or has been cancelled by mistake. Cases of mistake, in which relief may be obtained by bill in Chancery, are very numerous. It is not only in instances of palpable mistake on the face of contracts in writing, or where there has been obvious misunderstanding, that Courts of Equity will interfere, but, by abating the ri-gour of the old maxim, "ignorantia juris non excusat," they have even relieved parties from the effects of a contract founded on a misapprehension of law. Lord Thurlow once said, that money paid on a mistaken notion of law might be set right at any length of line. (See Lansdowne v. Lansdowne, Mos. 364; Jones v. Morgan, 1 Bro. C.C. 219.) The following will serve to illustrate the general nature of cases relievable in equity on the ground of mistake:—Where a deed of feoffment is not accompanied by livery of seisin, it is invalid by the common law but equity will supply the defect. Where an agreement has been entered into for a valuable consideration equity will relieve against a mistake in the execution of it. (Goring v. Nash, 3 Atk. 188.) Defects in the execution of powers, and in the surrender of copyholds, have also long been relieved against. But the court has been most frequently called upon to afford its aid in cases of settlements executed subsequent to marriage purporting to be made in execution of articles entered into before marriage. Thus where the words of the articles would create an estate tail, and so give the parents a power to defeat the intention of the settler by barring the issue, equity will decree a strict settlement, on the ground of mistake, and so frame the instrument that the main objects, namely, the issue of the marriage, shall not be defeated of the provision intended by the articles of settlement. (Ferne Cont. Rem. 112.) "Where a term for raising portions was placed after an estate tail, but should have been before, the court has rectified the mistake. So a settlement has been reformed according to the intention as declared in the recital. A settlement has been reformed in favour of the younger children against the heir of the mother claiming a reversion, upon a letter from her written long after the settlement, stating what her intention was. (1 Madd. Cha. P. 66, and cases there referred to.) One of the most recent cases, in which the court has interfered to alter a settlement, when not prepared according to the intention of the parties, is that of Keymer v. Perring, to which, as it is reported in the Legal Guide, (vol. 3, p. 377,) I refer your readers without more particularly mentioning it. "In regard to mistake by arbitrators, it has been holden, that if an arbitrator in his award make a plain mistake, either in the law, or in fact; as where an arbitrator miscalculates, or when the judgment is right but the premises are wrong, a bill in Equity may be filed against the party in whose favour the award is made, to set aside the award; provided the submission to the award has not been made a rule of court," in which case other proceedings must be taken. (See 1 Madd, 79.) Equity will also lend its aid to rectify a mistake in a will, (Williams v. Williams, 2

Bro. C.C. 87), but, it is said, it must be apparent on the face of the will. (Whitfield v. Clement, 1 Meriv. 402.) And, it is well known, parol evidence will not be admitted to point out the true meaning of the testator, where the expressions made use of in the will, however contrary to the testator's intention, are clear and explicit.

ANSWER TO THE SAME PROBLEM, BY E. A.

Actuated by the encouraging hint thrown out in your last I proceed with my answer to the problem, and having previously disposed of "accidents," will now consider,

2. Accounts.—If we trace the origin of the jurisdiction exercised by courts of equity in cases falling under this head, we shall find (3 Bl. Com. 163) that the remedy usually resorted to, to compel a man to bring in and settle his accounts, was an action of account at common law. But it being found by experience that the most ready and effectual way to settle these matters of account, was by bill in a court of equity, where a discovery might be had on the defendant's oath, without relying merely on the evidence which the plaintiff might be able to produce; these actions fell into disuse, and though when an account is once stated, nothing is more common, than an action upon the implied assumpsit to pay the balance, yet, I think I may venture to assert that courts of equity exercise an almost universal jurisdiction in matters of account, and I think the change before described, may be considered as resulting principally from the different modes of proof adopted in the respective courts. And to give an idea of what these different modes of proof are, it may not be altogether useless to introduce a passage cited by Mr. Western, in his excellent work on the Constitution and Laws of this country, in which we find that "a defendant in a court of equity has the protection arising from his own conscience, in a degree in which the law does not affect to give him protection. If he positively, plainly, and precisely, denies the assertion, and one witness, only, proves it, he is not bound to answer, but he must answer positively, plainly, and precisely, as it is demanded, and there is no circumstance attaching credit to the assertion over-balancing the credit due to the denial as a positive denial, a court of equity will not act upon the testimony of that witness. Not so at law, there the defendant is not heard, and if a witness proves the case, and however strong the defendant may be inclined to deny it, upon oath, there must be a recovery against him." (See Western's Commentaries, 2 Ed. 169.) Thus we see that when facts, or their leading circumstances, rest only in the knowledge of the party, a court of equity applies itself to his conscience, and purges him upon oath with regard to the truth of the transaction, and that being once discovered the judgment is in most cases the same in equity as it would have been at law. And it is owing to a want of a similar method of discovery at law that the courts of equity have acquired a concurrent jurisdiction with every other court in matters of account; as incident to accounts they take a concurrent cognizance of the administration of personal assets, consequently of debts, legacies, the distribution of the residue, and the conduct of executors and administrators. (See 3. Bla. Com. 437.)

As no action can be maintained at law for a legacy (Deekes v. Strutt, 5 T. R. 690.) or for a distributive share under an intestacy, (Jones v. Tanner, 7. B. and C. 545.) courts of law have no concurrent jurisdiction with courts of equity over these subjects.

A Bill in Chancery is the usual mode by which relief is obtained by partners against each other, by principals against their factors and agents, by mortgagors against mortgagees, who have been in possession, and vice versa. An account once taken cannot be re-opened, except for frauds shown, or where good reasons for suspecting it can be adduced. (1 Madd. 102.) Where liberty has been given to surcharge and falsify, the onus probandi lies on the party applying for such liberty. (Gray's Ch. Pract. 117.)

To use the words of Blackstone, it would be needless to point out all the several avenues in human affairs, and in this commercial age which lead to or end in accounts. (3 Com. 437.)

3. Frauds.—The class of cases which may be ranged under this head, will, I fear, be found more numerous than under any of the others which I have adopted, indeed, it may be said, but this is perhaps the most fertile source of equity jurisdiction. Equity will not only give relief where fraud has actually been committed, it will even interfere to prevent fraud. For this purpose it will not allow of the sale of a trust estate to the trustee, (Lister v. Lister, 6 Ves. 32.) nor of a lunatic's to a committee, (Wright v. Proud, 13. Ves. 136.) nor of a testator to an executor, (Burden v. Burden, 1 Ves. and B. 70.) conceiving that persons so situated must necessarily acquire a knowledge and influence on the confidence reposed in them which they may unduly turn to their own advantage, and to the injury of those for whom they were trusted. Upon this principle it is, that gifts and sales from clients to their attorneys and solicitors, and generally speaking, of all transactions of a pecuniary nature between persons so situated, are regarded by courts of equity with a jealous eye, and will here be set aside on grounds which would not affect similar transactions between other persons.

In many cases of actual imposition if the fraud can be clearly established, courts of law will give relief. But it has been well observed, Lord Coke, by the same passage of 4 Inst. 84. in which he desires to confine the jurisdiction of courts of equity to such "frauds, covins, and deceits, for which there is no remedy by the ordinary course of law," admits that all frauds are not relievable at law. (See Fonb. Eq. 1. 66.)

The Court of Chancery has an undoubted jurisdiction to relieve against every species of fraud, (Colt v. Wollaston, 1 P. W. 156; Stent v. Baylis, ib. 219). The variety of forms which fraud may assume sets classification entirely at defiance, and as new devices of fraud are invented they must be met by new correctives, taking care of course not to clash with former resolutions, (Webb v. Rorke, 2 Sch. and Lef. 646; Sawyer v. Vernon, 1 Ver. 387,) and to this end courts of equity have with prospective sagacity always avoided imprudently hampering themselves by defining what shall be held to constitute fraud.

Voluntary conveyances are set aside by courts of equity in every instance as against subsequent purchasers. They are also void against creditors whose claims existed prior to the conveyance. They are not, however, void against creditors having claims at the time, if made before and in consideration of marriage, or even in pursuance of a parol agreement before marriage, (Dundas v. Dutens, 1 Ves. 195). For marriage is regarded by the Court as a valuable consideration even when no portion is given to the wife, and therefore places her on as good a footing as the creditors.

Wills are in some measure an exception to the general rule that equity has jurisdiction in all cases of fraud; for if relating to personals it can only be set aside in the Ecclesiastical Court, and if it relate to real estate all a court of equity can do in the first instance is to direct an issue devisavit vel non to a court of common law. (Pemberton v. Pemberton, 13 Ves. 297; Bennett v. Wade, 2 Atk. 324; Jones v. Jones, 2 Mer. 171; Jones v. Frost, Jac. 467).

Underhand agreements which comprise the partial compromise of a debtor with some or one of his creditors unknown to the rest, marriage brokerage bonds, and the sale of a man's interest to procure another an office or employment under the crown are all relieved against in equity as being fraudulent in their nature or opposed to public policy.

If any one person obtains an undue advantage at the expence of another, and owes his success to any artifice, trick, or deceit, such artifice, trick, or deceit, will be relieved against in equity, it being there deemed a fraud; and what is of the greatest importance is that no length of time can be pleaded as a bar to relief under such circumstances. "The next question is, whether delay will purge a fraud? Never while I sit here," said Lord Northington, in Alden v. Gregory, (2 Eden, 285,) "every delay arising from fraud only aggravates its injustice and multiplies the oppression." But it must be borne in mind that fraud alone must be the occasion of the delay; for if it be partly owing to distressed circumstances, or any other cause than sheer fraud, length of time will bar. A decree obtained by fraud will be set aside, and equity will relieve against a verdict so obtained.

But the most useful jurisdiction of courts of equity is perhaps the powers they possess of restraining by injunction a party from doing that which in justice and good faith he ought not to do; this is a very usual mode of obtaining relief in Chancery and comes under the present head, as being grounded on the jurisdiction of the court to interfere in the prevention of fraud.

An injunction is a prohibitory writ directed to the defendant, and must be prayed for in the bill which sets forth the plaintiff's right to the relief prayed. (See 1 Ves. and B. 314.) I shall not enter into the subject of injunctions more fully here, but refer such of your readers as are desirous of obtaining further information on a subject of so great importance, to the Legal Guide, vol. 3, p. 115, where it will be found that the subject is amply treated of.

On the same ground of fraud courts of equity will allow a purchaser of an estate to hold it against a person who has the right thereto, if such person permitted or encouraged the purchaser to buy it of another, although such person having the right might be covert or under age. (See Hobbs v. Norton, 2 C. C. 128; Savage v. Foster, 9 Mod. 39; and Watts v. Cresswell, 9 Vin. 415; 4 Bro. C. C. 507, n.) Fraud is in equity an exception to every rule. In the case of Lord Irnham v. Child, Lord Thurlow stated that if an agreement had been varied by fraud, parol evidence would be admissible to supply the defect, (1 Bro. C. C. 92.) Under this head I shall also include the case of Foster v. Joyce, (Prec. in Ch. 7, S. C. 2 Vern. 129,) in which it was settled that if a landlord has induced the owners of cattle to leave them for a night on lands occupied by his tenant, and the cattle are distrained by the landlord after having been levant and couchant, even if the distress could be supported at law relief might be had in equity.

POSTAGE LABELS,

Under the Protection of the Statute, 3 and 4 W. 4, c. 97.

It may prove an awkward thing to give or lend a penny label to a neighbour, as it subjects the party to be seized forthwith and lodged in gaol. By the 2nd and 3d Vic., c. 52, sec. 8, the rates denoted by the labels or covers are to be deemed stamp duties, and the paper impressed with postage stamps is subjected to all the regulations, pains, penalties, and clauses contained in the acts relating to stamp duties. The labels are, therefore, under the protection of the statute 3 and 4 William IV., c. 97, by the 12th clause of which, if any person shall hawk or carry about for sale any stamped paper, "or shall utter or offer for sale or exchange, at any house, shop, or place, other than the house or shop in which he shall reside, or bona fide carry on his trade or business, any stamped paper," he shall forfeit 20*l*., and any man may apprehend him. He may be further fined 20*l*. for selling stamps without a license, and the informer may have all the penalty, at the option of the commissioners of stamps. By the same act, if any person shall fraudulently get out of, or discharge from any stamped paper any matter or thing thereon written, printed, or expressed, he shall be adjudged guilty of felony, and be liable to be transported for life. The same punishment may be awarded to any person who shall "knowingly use, or have possession of," any stamped paper, from which any matter or thing shall have been fraudulently erased, cut, scraped, discharged, or gotten.

COURT OF CHANCERY.—Nov. 6.

GARNER'S Bankruptcy.—Ex parte HOLMES.
Special Case.

APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF REVIEW.

SURETY. — Accepting Bills for the accommodation of the Bankrupt, who deposited them with his Banker for his floating balance.—The Banker proved the debt, and recovered a dividend.—The Surety afterwards paid the Bills.—Whether the Surety is entitled to recover the dividend from the Bankers, and to stand in their place for future dividends.

In this case, Joseph Garner was declared a bankrupt. Previous to the bankruptcy, the petitioner, George Holmes, for the accommodation of the bankrupt, accepted bills of exchange, amounting to £523 15*s*. 6*d*., drawn by, or made payable to the bankrupt, or order, two months after date. These bills were endorsed by the bankrupt, and deposited by him before his bankruptcy with his bankers, Messrs. Goodall, & Co., as securities for any floating balance due, or which might become due, in respect of advances made by them from time to time to and for the bankrupt. They had no notice that the bills were accommodation bills, and they proved under the fiat the £7,526. 14*s*. 11*d*. as owing to them upon the balance of accounts, and at the time of making such proof they exhibited the bills accepted by the petitioner. A dividend of 2*s*. in the pound was declared, and was paid to the bankers, with the knowledge of Mr. Holmes. He afterwards paid the full amount of the bills to the bankers, and previous to the last payment made by him he apprised them that he claimed to be entitled to stand in their situation to the amount of the bills under the fiat, and to receive all future dividends on their amount, and he also required them to pay him the dividend of 2*s*. in the pound, received by them on the bills. This they refused to do, and claimed to retain, there being still a large balance due to them. They did not prove these bills specifically as a debt under the said fiat, but exhibited them under the fiat amongst other securities they held their balance. In March 1839, a meeting for a further dividend was held, and Mr. Holmes attended, and claimed to prove for the £523. 15*s*. 6*d*., the amount of the bills, but the commissioners refused to allow the proof. In April, 1839, he presented a petition to the Court of Review, praying that Court to declare him entitled, as between him and the bankers, to the benefit of, and to stand in their place in respect of, the proof made by them under the fiat, to the extent of the sum of £523. 15*s*. 6*d*., and to the benefit of the past and future dividends on such proof to such amount as last mentioned, and that they might be ordered to refund to the petitioner the amount of the dividend of 2*s*. to the extent of £523. 15*s*. 6*d*.; or that, if necessary, the assignees under the fiat might be ordered to pay the amount of such past dividends on such last-mentioned amount to the petitioner out of any subsequent dividends which might be payable to the said bankers on the balance of their proof after deducting the amount of the petitioner's acceptances, and that the assignees might be ordered also to pay to the petitioner all future dividends on the debt proved by the bankers to the extent of the amount of petitioner's said acceptances; or that, if necessary, the petitioner might be declared entitled to go in and prove under the fiat for the amount of the acceptances, and receive dividends thereon equally with the other creditors, not disturbing the prior dividend; and that in the last mentioned case, the proof of the debt by the bankers might be reduced accordingly, or be ordered to stand only as a proof for the amount proved, less the amount of the petitioner's acceptances. The Court of Review ordered it to be dismissed with costs as against the bankers, but ordered that the petitioner was entitled in their place to receive out of the estate of the bankrupt, all future dividends in respect of the sum of £523. 15s. 6d.: and that the costs of the petitioner and of the assignees should be paid out of the bankrupt's estate. This order was now appealed from. The petitioner feeling aggrieved by that order, so far as it deprived him of the past dividend, appealed to the Lord Chancellor.

Mr. Rogers, for the appellant, cited the 52d section of the Bankrupt Act, (a) a surety "if he shall have paid the debt, or any part thereof, in discharge of the whole debt," is declared, "if the creditor shall have proved his debt under the commission, entitled to stand in the place of the creditor who has proved as to the dividends and all other rights under the commission, which the creditor possessed, or would be entitled to in respect of the proof, &c." and contended that the appellant's case was completely within that enactment, and it was supported by Ex parte Brimskill, (b) Bardwell v. Lydall. (c)

Mr. Swann, for the bankers, the respondents, said, these bills were held for their full value, and were available securities to the bankers as long as any thing was due to them from the bankrupt. They were deposited not to secure £523. 15s. 6d., but what balance was due from the bankrupt. There was a balance of £7,526. 19s. 11d. due, and the bankers were entitled to the dividends on that sum, besides the full amount of these bills. Ex parte Samman. (d) The case of Bardwell v. Lydall, had no application here, as the surety in that case was for a particular debt, but the appellant was surety for any balance against the bankrupt.

Mr. Steere, for the assignees, submitted to any order the Court might make.

Mr. Swanston, for the appellant, in reply, insisted that the dividend received by the bankers was spread over every pound of the £7,526, including the amount of these bills. The case of Ex parte Brimskill was decisive that they must refund the dividend to the extent of the amount of these bills.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The order of the Court of Review in this case assumes, that if the surety had paid the amount of the bills before any dividend was declared, he would be entitled to all the dividends by the 6th section of the bankrupt act, the surety is declared to be entitled to be in the place of the creditor, who has proved his debt to the extent of the sum for which he was surety, and which he has paid. Why should not the petitioner be entitled to the dividend of 2s.? The order appealed from admitted him to be entitled to the future dividends. On what principle is he entitled to the future dividends, that does not also entitle him to the past dividends, he having discharged the whole debt for which he was surety? It was argued that the creditor has a right to appropriate payments to such of his demands as he thinks proper. That principle has no application in this case. The dividend of 2s. was applicable to every pound of the proved debt, including the amount of these bills, and if the bankers were to be allowed to retain the dividend of 2s. in addition to the payment made in full for these bills by the petitioner, they would have received 22s. in the pound for this part of their debt; which would be contrary to reason, and to the cases. Bardwell v. Lydall, Ex parte Rushworth, (e) Paley v. Field, (f) Martin v. Bricknell, (g) Ex parte Brimskill. If the first division of 2s. is to be applied to the £523, the amount of these bills, as it clearly is, then the right of the petitioner to that dividend is not to be questioned. That part, therefore, of the order of the Court of Review, dismissing the petition with costs as against the bankers must be reversed. If there should be any difficulty in making the order on the bankers to refund, let the matter be mentioned again. In this case I would stop this sum out of the future dividends payable to the bankers, in residue of their debt.

BIRTHS, MARRIAGES, AND DEATHS REGISTRATION ACT, 6 & 7 W. IV. c. 86.—Whether an indictment is sustainable in point of law for a violation of this act, and whether the REGISTRAR can demand the information.

This was an indictment against the defendant for refusing to give the particulars of the birth of a child, pursuant to the statute 6 & 7 W. IV. c. 86, sec. 20, by which it is enacted, "That the father or mother of every child born in England after the first day of March, 1837, or in case of the death, illness, absence, or inability, of the father or mother, the occupier of the house or tenement in which such child shall have been born, shall within forty-two days next after the day of every such birth, give information upon being requested so to do, to the istrar, according to the best of his or her knowledge and belief, of the several particulars hereby required to be known and registered, touching the birth of such child." The indictment stated that the defendant was the father of a child which had been born in St. Peter's district, Birmingham. That Geo. Pinner was the registrar of that district. That in pursuance of an act he applied to the defendant and requested he be furnished with information respecting the date of the birth, the sex of the child, the names of the parents, and the business or profession of the father. That the defendant had no lawful excuse for not giving the required information, intending to prevent the due execution of the law and the carrying into effect of the statute, he contemptuously and unlawfully wholly refused to give to the said Geo. Pinner the information so demanded of him. The indictment was found at the sessions, and the defendant pleaded not guilty. The indictment was afterwards removed to this Court by certiorari, and a verdict of guilty was submitted to, subject to the opinion of this Court on a case. Two questions were originally intended to be raised, namely, one relating to the evidence necessary to show that Pinner was the registrar of the district, and as such entitled to demand the information; and secondly, whether an indictment for this offence was sustainable in point of law. The latter was the only question argued and decided. The argument occurred in Michaelmas term, 1839.

The Attorney General, in support of the indictment, said, the question whether this is an indictable offence seems to depend on two considerations. First, whether the statute requires information to be given, or leaves it optional to the parents to give or refuse the information; and secondly, whether if the information required to be given, the withholding of it amounts to an indictable offence under the statute. The act was passed for a public purpose: the information may be withheld at the will or pleasure it may be withheld by the negligence of the parents. Then the object of the act may be defeated, either by the wilful folly or the carelessness of anybody. The legislature never could have intended such to be the case. Even if the act required the information to be given, is the refusal to give it a matter which may be made the subject of an indictment? It is a principle of law, that where a public act directs something to be done for a public purpose, but does not provide any special penalty for the not doing of it, the party guilty of the disobedience to the act is punishable at common law by indictment. The law has thrown a duty upon him which he must discharge.

Sir F. Pollock contended that it was not an indictable offence. The act did not intend to compel all parties to register the births of their children, but only to give those who might be desirous of having the benefit of a complete register the opportunity to avail themselves of the means thus afforded by the legislature. The matter was left optional with the parties. It is a matter of notoriety that in passing through the legislature the compulsory clauses were struck out on an objection raised to them by the most venerable church authority in the land, and it is therefore a matter of history that the legislature intended only to pass an act offering a perfect means of registry, but not compelling persons to adopt it.

Lord DENMAN said, this was an indictment preferred against the defendant for not having given, in the manner provided by section 20 of the 6 & 7 W. IV. cap. 86, the information required by that statute, the Registration Act, to the registrar of the district concerning the birth of a child. Though in the course of the argument there did not appear to be in the minds of any of those who argued the case, any doubt that it was the general intention of the legislature to obtain this information, yet it was contended that the provisions of the statute were such as to leave it to the parties to give such information or not at their pleasure. But upon considering the provisions of the statute we cannot adopt that argument, and we think that the words of the 20th section are too strong to be got over. They declare that "the father or mother of every child born in England, or in case of the inability of the father or mother, the occupier of the house, &c., shall within forty-two days next after the day of the birth give information on being requested so to do, of the particulars required to be registered." It is the duty of the registrar to require such information, and if he neglect the duties imposed upon him by the act, he will be liable to an indictment for neglect of such duties, the performance of which is not otherwise provided for in the statute. Now it is impossible for him to perform all the duties of his office if this information is withheld. The section gives direct and positive injunctions that the information shall be afforded. Here it is withheld, and looking at the general object of the law we cannot avoid holding that these injunctions must be obeyed in this, which is a matter of great public concern. The question here is, whether the defendant has been brought within the provisions of the statute so as to be liable for the wilful though innocent refusal of obedience to its provisions. We think that he has been, and that the verdict must be entered for the crown.

The Attorney General said, the only object was to assert the law, and that he did not press for more than merely a nominal punishment.

CARN V. BRYCE AND ANOTHER.

SEPARATE USE.—Personal Property settled upon a Woman, before her Marriage, to her separate use.

This was a feigned action, in the nature of an issue directed by the Court above, under the Interpleader Act, to try whether any, and what portion of certain wearing apparel, seized by the plaintiff under an execution, was the property of a person named Morgan, who was the plaintiff's debtor.

It appeared that a widow lady named Hall, possessing considerable property, which chiefly consisted of an annuity of £500 per annum, under the will of her former husband, Mr. Hall, married, in April, 1826, a Mr. Richard Morgan. Previous to the marriage, a deed of settlement was executed, by which, with the consent of her intended husband, all the household furniture and effects then belonging to Mrs. Hall, together with the annuity of £500, were assigned to the defendants as trustees, upon trust for the sole and separate use of Mrs. Hall during coverture, without being subject in any manner to the control, debts, or engagements of her intended husband. Mr. Morgan became indebted to the plaintiff, Carn (a butcher), for meat, who brought an action to recover the amount. In that action, judgment was suffered to go by default; and an execution was issued against the goods belonging to Mrs. Morgan, which was in the house at Haverstock-hill, where she resided. The defendants in this case, as trustees in Mrs. Morgan's marriage settlement, served a notice on the Sheriff, claiming the goods seized as the sole and separate property of Mrs. Morgan; upon which the Sheriff applied to this Court for an interpleader rule, when the present issue was directed. A judge's order was obtained, directing the plaintiff to make a seizure de novo, in order that the defendant might know what goods he intended to rely on as having seized. In pursuance of that order, the plaintiff's broker accompanied the attorney of the former, who attended at Mrs. Morgan's residence, at Haverstock-hill, and, under the direction of the attorney, seized several articles of wearing apparel belonging to Mrs. Morgan and her children by her former husband. These goods were not, however, taken away, as the seizure was made merely in order to try the question at issue, the defendants having paid into court the amount claimed by the plaintiff for debt and costs.

Mr. Erle, having briefly stated the plaintiff's case, contented himself with proving the seizure, and did not adduce any evidence to prove that the articles were the property of Mr. Morgan.

Mr. Platt for the defendants, stated the grounds of defence on which he intended to rely. First, the deed of settlement, which settled the furniture and other household effects, and also the annuity, on Mrs. Morgan; secondly, that the greater part of the articles seized by the plaintiff's broker had been purchased long before the marriage with Mr. Morgan, and for such as had been purchased since then, Mrs. Morgan had herself paid for out of her own monies; and thirdly, that, if the goods were not the property of Mrs. Morgan, they became vested in the assignees of her husband's estate and effects, under his commission of bankruptcy. He contended that, in order to entitle the plaintiff to the verdict of the jury, he ought to have proved to the satisfaction of the jury, the affirmative of the issue—viz., that the articles in question were the property of Mr. Morgan at the time of the seizure.

The evidence proved that the greater part of the wearing apparel seized, had belonged to Mr. Morgan many years before her marriage to her present husband, and that those purchased since then, had been paid for by herself.

Mr. Platt, then proposed to prove a fiat and proceedings in bankruptcy against Mr. Morgan, and also a previous composition, in order to show that as 15s in the pound had not been paid under the latter, and all subsequently-acquired property would vest, by the operation of the law in such cases, in the assignees appointed under any subsequent commission of bankruptcy.

Mr. Moody, for the defendant, objected to the reception of this evidence, on the ground that, in cases like the present, when the question of property was between two parties only, a third party was not allowed to come in and set up a claim.

Lord ABINGER said he was clearly of opinion that he ought not to receive the evidence. If the assignees had made a claim in the first instance, they would, no doubt, have been made parties to this suit; and if they had been served with the interpleader rule; but had not taken any notice of it, it was a fair inference that they considered they had no claim to the property.

Mr. Moody was about to reply, when Lord ABINGER said, that, as the matter had now resolved itself into a question of law upon which he would have to direct the jury, it was, he thought, unnecessary that the learned gentleman should trouble himself. His lordship then told the jury that the question for their decision upon this issue was, whether any and what portion of the articles of wearing apparel seized, was the property of Mr. Morgan. Now, as to the goods purchased before the marriage with Mr. Morgan, the jury must, with respect to those goods, find their verdict for the defendant. But, as to such les as had been proved to have been purchased for the use of Mrs. Morgan, since her second marriage, the verdict must be for the plaintiff. It was a married woman may have the use of a chattel settled upon her, but she cannot convert that chattel into another. The trustees in this case had a property in the annuity settled on Mrs. Morgan, but they had no property in the chattels purchased with that annuity, because they belonged to the husband. As to the clothes belonging to the children, it was clear that the husband had no property in them, even if he had purchased them himself since the marriage, for, as they were not his children, but the children of his wife by a former marriage (there being no issue by the second marriage), such articles, if they had been so purchased by him, which, however, was not proved to have been the case, must be considered in the nature of gifts. His lordship enumerated the articles which it had been proved in evidence were purchased since the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Morgan.

The jury found in accordance with his lordship's direction—viz., for the plaintiff as to the articles purchased for the use of Mrs. Morgan since the marriage, and for the defendants as to the others.

Mr. Platt obtained leave to move the court on the point respecting the evidence in bankruptcy.

LEWIS v. GOMPERTZ.

OF EXCHANGE.—What is sufficient notice of dishonour to an indorser.

Mr. Kelly, on behalf of the defendant, moved for a rule to show cause why the verdict for the plaintiff should not be set aside and a nonsuit entered. This was an action against the indorser of a bill of exchange for £250, and was tried before Mr. Baron Gurney, when the plaintiff obtained a verdict. The motion was made on the ground that the notice of dishonour was insufficient at law. The following was the notice given to the defendant:—

"6, Barnard-street, Russell-square.
The bill for £250, drawn by J. Trendall, bearing your indorsement, has been presented for payment to the acceptor thereof and has been dishonoured, and now lies over due and unpaid with me as above, of which I hereby give you notice."

Mr. Kelly relied upon Solarte v. Palmer, and Strange v. Price, (2 Per. and D. 278.)
MARKE, B.—We may collect from this notice that it is necessary to make a good notice of dishonour, viz. first, that the bill was presented when due; secondly, that it was dishonoured; and, thirdly, an intimation to the party to whom the notice is addressed, that he is the person to be held liable for the payment of it. No mercantile man, and it is among such principally that notices of this kind are in use, who read this document, could fail to come to the conclusion that those three requisites were complied with. First, the bill itself is correctly described; on that subject there can be no question, for we cannot suppose the existence of another bill drawn and accepted by the same parties respectively, and for the same amount; and if there be but one bill, the defendant must know at what time it would fall due. Now it turns out, that in the present case the bill would fall due on the 22nd December, the day before this notice was given, so that this notice that it was duly presented when due, was given in sufficiently good time. Then come the words, "bearing your indorsement, has been presented for payment, and returned dishonoured." The word "returned" has obtained among merchants a sort of peculiar meaning, as implying that the bill to which it relates has been duly presented and dishonoured. So that we must understand, not only that there has been a presentment in the present case, but a presentment when due. Then follow the words, "and now lies overdue," which import that the bill was not paid when it arrived at maturity. The only part of this case on which I entertained any doubt was, whether it appeared by necessary inference from this letter, that the plaintiff meant to hold the defendant responsible for the amount of the bill. But when he says, "it now lies overdue and unpaid with me as above," i. e. 6, Barnard-street, Russell-square, what man could fail to draw from those words the inference—you are to come to 6, Barnard-street, Russell-square, to take it up. I think, therefore, that there is here a foundation for each of the three inferences necessary to constitute a good notice. There is therefore no reason to disturb the verdict in the present case, and the rule which is applied for cannot be granted.

The rest of the Court concurred.
Rule refused.

PREROGATIVE COURT.

May 1.

WILL OF THOMAS THOMPSON, Esq.
NEW WILL ACT.—As to sufficient execution and lunacy, the deceased having committed suicide; the verdict of the Coroner's Jury being temporary insanity, and the will executed the day before the death.

This was a cause of proving in solemn form the last will and testament of Mr. Thomas Thompson, formerly of University College, Oxford, and the Inner Temple, who died on the 16th of November last, aged 60, the will in question being dated the day previously. This gentleman though of very considerable property, left no known relations, and having died by his own hand, at a time when the coroner's inquest found him to have been of unsound mind, a communication of the circumstances was made to the proper officers of the Crown, which would be entitled to the property in the event of an intestacy. The executors had been sworn, when probate was stopped by the Queen's proctor; the executors then propounded the will in a condidit, and examined the three subscribed witnesses. On the publication of the evidence, the Queen's proctor, on behalf of the Crown, brought in an allegation, pleading—first, that the deceased was of unsound mind; secondly, that the will had not been executed in conformity with the late act. Upon this allegation only one witness was examined—namely, Dr. Shepherd, who had been intimately acquainted with the deceased for many years, and the case for the Crown with the facts upon the evidence of this gentleman and the evidence of the executors, who had supplied the Crown with the facts upon which its plea was framed. It appeared that the deceased towards the latter end of 1838, and in the beginning of 1839, had laboured under some erroneous impressions as to his being slighted by his acquaintance and the world, in consequence of his not having resented an insult; that shortly before his death and the execution of the will he had called upon Mr. Yatman, who, with Mr. Chambers, was appointed an executor of the will (which bequeathed the bulk of the property to them), and stated that he was in great trouble, since the Benchers of the Temple were about to disbar him, in consequence of a fraud on his part, in having represented himself on his admission as the son of a gentleman instead of a chymist. These were ascertained to be delusions, no such intention being entertained. On the 15th of November he had made an appointment with Mr. John Woolfitt, an upholsterer of Fleet-street, (who, with his shopman, had witnessed a former will,) to meet him, his shopman named Ellis, and his shopwoman, Louisa Lucas, at 3 o'clock, that they might attest his will. At the time appointed the deceased came, produced the will from his pocketbook, and these three persons subscribed the attestation clause, which purported that the deceased had "signed, sealed, declared and delivered" the same in their presence. In their depositions upon the condidit, however, one of them, Ellis, stated that the deceased did not sign the paper in their presence; another, Lucas, spoke to the same effect, and added (contrary to the statement of a former witness), that there was no signature opposite to the seal when she attested the will; the other witness, Mr. Woolfitt, deposed that the deceased signed the will in the presence of all three witnesses, and moreover declared, placing his finger on the seal, "This is my act and deed."

This part of the case was first argued.

Dr. ADDAMS, on behalf of the executors, contended that on his evidence it was clear that the testator had either made or acknowledged his signature in the presence of the witnesses, either of which would satisfy the act.

The QUEEN'S ADVOCATE for the Crown contended that the proof of signing was deficient, and that there was no acknowledgment of signature, qua signature, which was required by the act.

Sir H. Jenner said, upon this branch of the case, upon the general principle of the law, the affirmative evidence was preferable to negative evidence, and looking to the discrepancies in the evidence of Ellis and Lucas, and the consistency of that of Mr. Woolfitt (though all three intended to depose truly, as far as their recollection went,) the evidence of execution was sufficient to satisfy the requisition of the law.

The other branch of the case, viz. the capacity of the testator, was reserved for consideration.

May 9.

Sir H. Jenner gave sentence on the point reserved for consideration, viz. the capacity of the testator. The deceased was brought up at Westminster School, where he became acquainted with Mr. Yatman, and this acquaintanceship which ripened into friendship, continued to death. The deceased went afterwards to University College, Oxford, where he formed an acquaintance with Mr. Chambers, with whom he likewise kept up an intimacy and friendship to the end of his life; both of them were called to the bar together nearly at the same time. The deceased did not practise at the bar, having considerable property, his personal amounting to about £25,000, besides some real and copyhold estates. He was unmarried, and seemed to have led a very retired life, particularly of late, as a evidence of which the Crown had been able to find only one witness (Dr. Shepherd) who could depose to his habits and character. The allegation, on the part of the Crown, set up a case of habitual insanity, as well as particular delusions evinced during a few months preceding his death. The only witness, as before observed, examined on the Crown's allegations was Dr. Shepherd; the rest of the evidence in the case was supplied by the answers of the executors themselves. It was admitted that where habitual insanity did not exist, the proof of insanity, at the time of the execution of the will, must come from the party who seeks to impeach; and he could not find in the evidence anything of the nature

nity in this gentleman till the latter end of 1838, or beginning of 1839. Dr. Shepherd did nothing of the nature of delusion in him about that time. In the spring of 1839 the deceased did intimate to Dr. Shepherd that he was an object of scorn to his friends, on account of his not having resented an insult; but upon Dr. Shepherd inquiring who entertained such a sentiment, and convincing the deceased that his opinion was groundless, he gave up the delusion, Dr. Shepherd declared that it became wholly cured; thereby showing that whatever might be the cause of the delusion it yielded to reason. After his later delusion, which was admitted in the answers of Mr. Yatman and Mr. Chambers was, that the benchers of the Inner-Temple intend to ruin him on account of a supposed fraud which he imagined he had committed upon them. This was a groundless imagination, and the two executors to whom he communicated it, convinced him that it was so, one of them advising him that it was affected with some derangement of the body, that he should take physic, which he promised to do. He observed that the executors answered very fairly in their answers, furnished evidence against themselves, and therefore they were entitled to have their testimony taken, not in parts, but altogether, and when explanations were demanded by them, the Court was bound to receive them with confidence; and, upon the whole, he was clearly of opinion that, neither from the evidence adduced by the Crown, which negatived habitual insanity, from the answers of the executors, from the testimony of the attesting witness, from the contents of the will itself, which manifested a natural disposition of the property, nor from any evidence that, at the time he wrote it, he did not contemplate self-destruction, could the Court deduce any proof that the testator was of unsound mind, still less that, at the time of his making the will, he did not enjoy a lucid interval. In the course of his judgment, which was of considerable length, Sir Herbert referred to two cases, as remarked in the arguments, were put forward on these occasions, namely, Cartwright v. Cartwright, (a) and Dew v. Clark. (b) In the former Sir William Wynn had relied upon the circumstances of the will being a rational act, and it was sometimes thence inferred that every testamentary act rational in itself, which appeared to have been done in a rational manner, was entitled to the probate of the Court; but Sir William Wynn's observation was a specific reference to the circumstances of the peculiar case. Again, in Dew v. Clark, John Nicholl said that it was a rule that if a delusion is there is insanity, and this was not intended beyond the purpose for which that learned judge intended the observation, or, if he meant that in all cases where any delusion existed in the mind of an individual, that individual was insane and intestate. But in his elaborate judgment in Dew v. Clark, which must not be quoted in isolated passages, Sir J. Nicholl pointed out the manner in which the delusion of Stett, the deceased, infected the whole of his conduct towards his daughter, an amiable, accomplished and pious woman, and which appeared in a passage of his will, inserted at the express desire of the deceased himself. Nothing of the kind appeared in the present case, habitual insanity was negatived by the only witness brought to support it; the delusion in the mind of the deceased, if they were delusions, properly so called, were of a transient kind, one had entirely ceased, and the other was not unconquerable, and it was worthy of remark that Mr. Copeland, the medical attendant of the deceased, who was frequently in the habit of seeing him, owing to a disorder under which he laboured, whose attention had been particularly directed to the deceased's mind, and who could therefore, have spoken to its condition, had not been examined by the Crown. Upon the whole, he was perfectly satisfied that the will had emanated from the deceased at a time when he was of sound mind, memory, and understanding; he had, therefore, no hesitation in pronouncing for its validity, and in decreeing probate of it.

The Queen's Advocate, on the part of the Crown, asked for the Crown's costs out of the estate, observing that under the circumstances, the Coroner having transmitted the verdict of the jury to the Treasury, the Crown could have done no less for the protection of the property.

Sir H. Jenner declined to make such an order, observing, however, that the Crown could have done no less, under the circumstances in which the deceased died, leaving no legal representatives who could have contested the will.

ESSAY.

ON BILLS OF EXCHANGE. NOTICE OF DISHONOUR.

WE have received several letters upon the important subject (in this commercial country) of the recent discussions in the Courts, as to what is sufficient notice of dishonour of a Bill of Exchange or a promissory Note (a), which appears to have excited considerable excitement among commercial men, and a difficulty seems to exist as to what is a legal notice of dishonour.

We have already shewn the opinion of the law as given to the House of Lords in Solarte v. Palmer, but this must not be taken as a leading case for all notices of dishonour,—they must stand upon their own respective merits. In Solarte v. Palmer, the notice was to the indorsee as follows:—

“London, 17th Dec. 1825.

“Gentlemen,—A bill for £683. drawn by Mr. Joseph Keats upon Messrs. Daniel, Jones, & Co., and bearing your indorsement, has been put into our hands by the assignees of Messrs. J. R. de Alzedo, with directions to take legal measures for the recovery thereof, unless immediately paid to

“J. & S. PEARSE.”

This was held to be bad. The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE TENTERDEN expressed his opinion to the jury, that the letter did not in terms import that the bill had been refused payment by the acceptor,—it was not a sufficient notice of the dishonour and non-payment.

In Cook v. French the notice was to the drawer, that the bill due July 1, had been presented for payment and returned, and remained unpaid. The Court of Queen's Bench held this to be good. It should be observed that here was no demand of payment.

In Messenger v. Southey the notice was of an illiterate kind,—and was to the maker of a promissory note by the holder and payee of the note that it was “not took up,” and the Court of Common Pleas held this to be bad.

In Lewis v. Gompertz the notice to the indorser was of a more regular kind, and was thus construed by the judge (PARKER, B.)—

1st. That the bill was presented when due.

2ndly. That it was dishonoured, and 3rdly. An intimation to the party to whom the notice was addressed, that he is the person to be held liable for the payment of it.

The Court of Exchequer held this to be good, and the reasons for that judgment we have already shewn (b).

In the latter case it should be also noticed there was no demand of payment.

The decision of Lord TENTERDEN in Solarte v. Palmer was carried by writ of error into the Court of Exchequer Chamber, where after full argument, LORD CHIEF JUSTICE TINDAL delivered the following judgment:—The question in this case is whether the direction to the jury “that the letter given in evidence at the trial, and set out upon the bill of exceptions, was not sufficient notice of the dishonour and non-payment of the bill, and that upon such evidence the jury ought to find a verdict for the defendants,” was a proper direction or not. And we are of opinion that the direction was proper, and that the judgment which has been given for the defendants must be affirmed. The notice of dishonour which is commonly substituted in this country in the place of a formal protest, such formal protest being essential in other countries to enable the plaintiff to recover(c), most certainly does not require all the precision and formality which accompanied the regular protest for which it has been substituted. But it should at least inform the party to whom it is addressed, either in express terms, or by necessary implication, that the bill has been dishonoured, and that the holder looks to him for payment of the amount. Here the allegation in the declaration is that the bill has been presented to the acceptor who has refused payment, whereof the defendant has had notice; and, consequently, to satisfy this allegation, though no express form of words is necessary, the notice should convey an intimation to the party to whom it is addressed, that the bill is in fact dishonoured. Now looking at this notice, we think no such intimation is conveyed in terms, or is to be necessarily inferred from its contents. Besides, it is perfectly consistent with this notice, that the bill has never been presented at all, and that the plaintiffs mean to rely upon some legal excuse for its non presentment. The present case is stronger against the sufficiency of the notice than that of Hartley v. Case(d), where there was at least an allegation that the bill had become due, which is not found here. This letter may not improbably have been written with a different intent than that of giving notice of the dishonour to the indorser, and may have been information that an action was about to be brought by the attorney taking for granted that the notice of the bill's dishonour had been given in the ordinary way, before the bill was put into the hands for the purpose of suing thereon. In all events, however intended, it appears to us not to amount to such notice, and the judgment was affirmed (e).

From this judgment the plaintiffs brought a writ of error in the House of Lords, where JUSTICE PARK declared the unanimous opinion of the judges present (f), that the order of the plaintiff's attornies did not amount to notice of the dishonour of the bill, which notice ought in express terms, or by necessary implication, to convey full intimation that the bill had been dishonoured. The LORD CHANCELLOR (BROUGHAM) in pronouncing the judgment of the House, said, "I never saw a case which, whether regarding the facts, the principle of law, or cases bearing upon it, was more absolutely free from all doubt. The question, my Lords, is whether the letter of Messr. Pearse amounts to notice of the dishonour of the bill change referred to in that letter. As this is a point of law, a question was put by your Lordships to the Judges, whether this was a valid notice of dishonour, so as to bind the party to whom it was directed, the indorser, liable. The Judges were unanimously of opinion that it was no notice of dishonour. I never thought there could be any doubt that that must be their opinion, and I only doubted whether we ought to trouble ourselves to come here upon such a point. My Lords, I hold that this is no notice of dishonour; it is a threat of legal proceedings,—a demand of payment. It is clear on authority and by decided cases, that a demand of payment does not amount to a notice of dishonour. Lawyers and merchants alike observe this rule and they act upon it. When learned Judges are clear and unanimous in their opinion upon this subject, it seems superfluous in me to waste the time of your Lordships by arguments in support of their opinion, but I will say, that when I see learned counsel sign their names to reasons in appeal, and bottom those reasons upon precedents and authorities, I naturally look to these precedents and these authorities, to see whether they bear out the opinions for which they are offered. The case of Tindal v. Brown has been cited; (g) that case is referred to in the 4th edit. of Bayley on Bills, p. 206, which authority is also quoted in the plaintiff's "reasons." Tindal v. Brown does not warrant the purpose for which it is cited; but it is remarkable that another case should not have been looked at,—the case of Hartley v. Case (h). If that case had been looked at, it would have been found that it was on all fours with the present. The letter there is in these terms:—"I am desired to apply to you for payment of the sum of £150. due to myself, on a draft drawn by Mr. Case on Mr. Case, which I hope you will on receipt discharge, to prevent the necessity of law proceedings, which otherwise will immediately take place." Lord TENTERDEN there said—"There is no precise form of words necessary to be used in giving notice of the dishonour of a bill of exchange, but the language used must be such as to convey notice to the party what the bill is, and that payment of it has been refused by the acceptor." His Lordship said that the letter did not convey any such notice; yet it is much more explicit than the letter in the present case. The other authority referred to by the plaintiffs is the 4th edition of Bayley on Bills,—why not the 5th edition? For aught I know, the 4th edition was published before Hartley v. Case was decided. This I know, that if the 5th edition had been quoted, there would have been found at p. 257 these words—"And the notice ought to import that the bill has been dishonoured; a mere demand of payment is not sufficient." But it may be said that is more than a mere demand of payment, it is a threat of proceeding, and such a threat shows that a default must have been committed, because an indorser is not liable without a default in the other parties. But let your Lordships read the whole passage, and you will then see that such an argument cannot be used, for the passage goes on thus :—‘ And a threat of legal proceedings is not sufficient.’ I feel great displeasure, my Lords, at this. Writs of error ought not to be brought for the mere purpose of delay, and to subject parties to costs. This is a wrong that you are bound to visit with your just displeasure.” The judgment was affirmed. (i)

The case of Tindal v. Brown, referred to by Lord Brougham, applied more to the time when notice should be given than to the sufficiency of the notice of dishonour, which as it leads the law at the present day it may be necessary here to notice more particularly.

LORD MANSFIELD there said—It is extremely clear that the holder of a bill, when dishonoured by the acceptor, must give reasonable notice to the drawer or indorser. What is reasonable notice is partly a question of fact and partly a question of law. (k) It may depend in some measure on facts, such as the distance at which the parties live from each other, the course of the post, &c. But wherever a rule can be laid down with respect to this reasonableness that should be decided by the court, and adhered to by every one for the sake of certainty. In that case the bill was dishonoured on the 5th October, the clerk saw the maker on the 6th, and gave him time during the banking hours of that day, and the plaintiffs did not go at four that afternoon, but waited till the next day. Lord Mansfield said—It has been held (l) that where the party liable does not live in the same place, the holder must write by the next post after the bill is dishonoured. (m)

ASHURST J. said, it is of dangerous consequence to lay it down as a general rule, that the jury should judge of the reasonableness of time. It ought to be settled as a question of law. If the jury were to determine this question in all cases, it would be productive of endless uncertainty. The next day at the most is as long as is necessary in a case circumstanced like this. If the parties live at a small distance, this is sufficient time, if at a greater, they should write by the next post. Notice means something more than knowledge; because it is competent to the holder to give credit to the maker. It is not enough to say that the maker does not intend to pay, but that he (the holder), does not intend to give credit. The party ought to know whether the holder intends to give credit to the maker, or whether he intends to resort to the indorser.

BULLER J. said, the numerous cases on this subject reflect great discredit on the Courts of Westminster. They do infinite mischief in the mercantile world; and this evil can only be remedied by doing what the Court wished to do in the case of Metcalf and Hall, (n) by considering the reasonableness of time as a question of law and not of fact. Whether the post goes out this or that day, and what time, &c. are matters of fact: but when those facts are established, it then becomes a question of law on those facts, what notice shall be reasonable. (o)

As to giving time, the holder does it at his peril. And in no case has it been determined that the indorser is liable after the holder of the note has given time to the maker.

With respect to notice I concur in the opinion which has been given by the Court, and particularly for the reason given by my brother ASHURST. The purpose of giving notice is not merely that the indorser should know the note is not paid, for he is chargeable only in a secondary degree; but to render him liable, you must shew that the holder looked to him for payment, and gave him notice that he did so. A case might easily put, where the indorser might have notice in the holder and yet would not be liable. Though there is no prescribed form of this kind of notice, yet it must import that the holder looks on the indorser as liable, and expects payment from him that he may have a remedy over by an early application. When it becomes his business to take up the bill. But notice of having given credit to the maker will discharge the indorser. The notice by another person to the indorser can never be sufficient; but it must proceed from the holder himself.

This doctrine agrees with Marius and other general writers, who say that, the notice ought to be transmitted by the next day after it is received.

The general rule as collected from the case of Tindal v. Brown and other cases seems to be, that with respect to persons living in the same town, notice should be given the next day; and with regard to such living at different places, that it should be given by the next post. But if in any particular place the post should go out so early as to give a receipt of the intelligence, as that it would be inconvenient to require a strict adherence to the general rule then, that a notice by the second post would be reasonable, per LAWRENCE J. in Darbishire v. Darbishire, 6 East. Rep. 11.

As to what is reasonable time the Court leave to the proper judges. For what is contrary to reason cannot be consonant to law, which is founded on reason: and therefore, the reasonableness in these and the like cases depends on the law, and is to be decided by the judges. (p)

The following form is submitted as sufficient to meet all the cases.

BILL IN CHANCERY.—On what subjects may relief be obtained by a bill in Chancery?

Having said (it is hoped) sufficient to give a general idea of the jurisdiction exercised by Courts of Equity in cases of fraud, it will now be my province to consider—

4. Infancy.—Upon the abolition of the Court of Wards the care which the crown was bound to take as guardian of its infant tenants, was totally extinguished in every feudal view, but resulted to the King in his Court of Chancery, together with the general protection of other infants in the kingdom. When, therefore, a fatherless child has no other guardian the Court of Chancery has a right to appoint one, and from all proceedings relative thereto an appeal lies to the House of Lords, and subject to such correction by appeal, the court may, if it thinks circumstances render its interposition necessary, exercise its authority, although the child be not fatherless, and even so as totally to supersede the parental guardianship, though this is never done without cautious reluctance. The Court of Exchequer can only appoint a guardian ad litem to manage the defence of the infant if a suit be commenced against him; but when the interest of a minor comes before the court judicially in the progress of a cause, or upon a bill for that purpose filed, either tribunal indiscriminately will take care of the property of the infant, and the Court of Chancery, out of that property, will provide for his suitable maintenance, if the minor's father is not in circumstances to support and educate his children according to their expectations of fortune. Without such assistance, Lords Eldon and Redesdale did not think it discreet as a general rule to allow maintenance except upon a bill filed; though where the property is small the order is often made on petition, in order to save an expense the estate could not conveniently bear. What the precise limit is to which this practice may be extended does not clearly appear (see 3 Bla. Com. p. 426 & n.) There are different decisions as to the amount of property which will render the institution of a suit necessary, but I believe there is no case in which a bill has been dispensed with where the property exceeded £300. a-year, and there are cases where a bill has been required where the property exceeded £100. a-year. But it may now be taken to be the practice that where the property does not exceed £300. a-year the court will act on a petition without a bill being filed. (Gray's C. C. Pract. 190.)

The Court of Chancery, representing the King as parens patriæ, has a jurisdiction now perfectly established to control the right of a father to the possession of his child whenever the welfare of that child imperatively requires so strong a measure. In the words of Lord Eldon, "the court has interposed in many instances of this sort, but the application is one of the most serious and important nature; the interposition of the court stands upon principles which it ought not to put into operation without keeping in view all the feelings of a parent's heart and all the principles of the common law with respect to a parent's rights." (Wellesley v. the Duke of Beaufort, 1 Rus. 19.)

Infants are made wards of court by the filing of any bill to which they are or ought to be parties (Ambler, 303), and when thus brought within the protection of the Court of Chancery its control over the property of infants, who are made its wards, is of course absolute, and many statutes (the Marriage Act and others) recognise the Chancellor as the constitutional depository of that part of the King's prerogative or paternal duty, (whichever it may most properly be called) which consists of the guardianship of his infant subjects.

Should a guardian attempt to remove an infant confided to him by the court, out of its jurisdiction, or become insolvent, or there being more guardians than one, they should disagree as to the management of the ward, the guardianship will again devolve on the court, by whom it will be referred to the master to approve of some other person to be appointed.

It rests also with the court to determine what sum (if any) shall be allowed out of the ward's estate for maintenance (see ex parte Myerscough, 1 Jac. & W. 151), and with reference to the jurisdiction exercised by the court in excusing a father from maintaining the ward. I will mention an instance where Sir W. Grant (M.R.) thought that a nobleman with £6,000. a-year was not liable to provide for his children, who had become the object of a testator's bounty, while the possession of only half that income by a private gentleman would assuredly entail that duty upon him (Jervoise v. Silk, Coop. 52.)

In the marriage of infants, who are wards of the court, it exercises a very jealous interference not only requiring the consent of the guardian but its own as well (Leeds v. Barnardiston, Sim. 538). Upon an affidavit that an infant ward is about to contract an improper marriage the court will restrain all communication with such infant by letter or otherwise, (Pearce v. Cruchfield, 14 Ves. 206.) All persons instrumental in the unauthorised marriage of a ward are punishable for contempt. The court will, in all such instances, oblige the husband to execute a proper settlement in favour of the wife, and if he refuses will commit him to prison until he complies, (Winch v. James, 4 Ves. 386.—Wells v. Price, 5 Ves. 398 & notes.) Indeed the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery is constantly raised by anything affecting the interest or any way concerning an infant ward.

Where estates are vested in infant trustees the conveyance of such property is provided for and placed under the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, by 11 Geo. 4, and 1 Gul. 4, c. 60.

When a ward comes of age the guardian is bound to give him an account of all that he has transacted on his behalf, and must answer for losses occasioned by his wilful default or negligence. In order therefore to prevent disagreeable contests with young gentlemen it has become practice for many guardians, of large estates especially, to indemnify themselves by applying to the Court of Chancery, acting under its direction, and accounting annually before the officers of that court,—for the Lord Chancellor is the right derived from the crown the general and supreme guardian of all infants as well as idiots and lunatics, that is of all such persons as have not discretion enough to manage their own concerns. In case, therefore, any guardian abuses his trust the court will punish and check him, nay, sometimes proceed to the removal of him and appoint another in his stead (1 Bla. Com. 462.)

5. Mistake.—Errors and deficiencies occasionally arise in deeds and wills, which if allowed to remain uncorrected would work hardship to and militate against the intention of those concerned. Thus the imperfect execution of a power is in certain instances relieved in equity (see ante p. 4), where some direction which ought to have been followed in the execution of a power has been omitted, as where a power of appointment by will was to be executed in the presence of three witnesses.

uses, and it was executed in consideration of marriage by two only, the defect was supplied by the court (1 Madd. Chan. 53). But Equity will not supply the non-execution of a power; and a party to whom a power is given do nothing denote an intention of exercising it there is no ground for the interference of the court, and if a power of appointment is confided to a party it is immaterial whether he will exercise it or not, and therefore the non-exercise of it cannot raise the jurisdiction. Where a mortgage in fee was made by way of feoffment, and no livery was given, this defect in the conveyance was supplied in equity, (Id. 50). In cases, too, of agreements, which have been reduced into writing in a sense contrary to the intention of the parties, relief will be given, (the Marq. of Townshend v. Stan- zom, 6 Ves. 328). But the proof in these cases must be of the strongest nature, and such as to leave no doubt in the minds of the court.

If a person, having a right to an estate, purchase it of another person, being ignorant of his title, Equity will compel the vendor to refund the purchase money with interest from the date of bringing the bill, although no fraud appears (Bingham v. Bingham, 1 Ves. 126).

Equity has as much jurisdiction to relieve in respect of a plain mistake in contracts in writing, well as against fraud, but in these cases there should be the strongest proof possible, (Henkle v. the Royal Exch. Ass. Office, 1 Ves. 317): and in a case much agitated before Lord Thurst, that Chancellor laid down the rule with great latitude—"That if a mistake appears it is as much to be rectified as fraud," (Taylor v. Madd, cited, 5 Ves. J. 595).

Where, at the time of the contract, the purchaser was fully aware that the vendor could not execute the agreement, and consequently could not enforce the performance of it, Lord Redesdale determined that the agreement must be presumed to have been executed under a mistake, and the purchaser could not insist upon a performance as to the interest to which the vendor may be actually entitled (Lawrenson v Butler, 1 H. & Lef. 13). But it is no bar to a specific performance that the conveyance will not have the operation which the vendor thought it would, (Mildmay v. Hungerford, 2 Vernon, 243). Where a purchaser has by mistake given an unreasonable price for an estate, the court will, in a proper case, relieve him by totally rescinding the contract (Morshead v. Frederick, Sugden V. P. App. 10). But, it must be observed, that a deed will be rectified in Equity on the ground of mistake or fraud to the prejudice of a bona fide purchaser, without notice; neither will he be prejudiced by the mistake or ignorance of any of the parties to a conveyance of their right in the estate (see Thomas v Davis, 1 Dick, 301, and Malden v. Menill, 2 Atk. 8).

Here I must take occasion to introduce a few cases where even at law the palpable mistake of a word will not defeat the intention of the parties. In a case in the Common Pleas, where the condition of a bond was that it should be void if the obligor did not pay, and performance being pleaded, on the ground of literal expression, the court held the plea bad. (Anon. Doug. 384, cited.) It seems clearly settled, that words evidently omitted in a will by mistake, may be supplied both at law and in equity. (Tollett v. Tollett, Amb. 194; Cayton v. Hellyer, 2 Burr. 923, cit.; Doe v. Michlem, 6 East, 486. See Lane v. Goudge, 9 Ves. jun. 225; and Philps v. Chamberlain, 4. ib. 45-51.) But however evident the mistake may be, the words will not be supplied if the testator's manifest intention would be defeated by the insertion of them. (Chapman v. Brown, 3 Burr. 1626. See 2 Ves. jun. 365.)

Mistakes in wills, which, owing to the ignorance, misinformation, and weakness of many testators, are not only very likely to occur, but do occur, and that very frequently, and such mistakes are relieved on probable presumption. Thus where a testator gave a sum in Bank Annuities to his wife, and it happened that at the date of the will he had no other stock than Long Annuities, the court directed the legacy to be paid out of the latter. (Selwood v. Midmay, 3 Ves. 306.) Mistakes, too, in the christian and surnames of legatees will be rectified upon reasonable proof given of the identity of the person intended to be benefited. (Parsons v. Parsons, 1 Ves. 266; and note, Beaumont v. Fell, 2 P. Williams, 141; Standen v. Standen, 2 Ves. 589.)

ANSWER TO THE SAME PROBLEM,

By GUILIELMUS.

Account.—Generally whenever it is competent for a person to file a bill in Chancery for an account he is entitled to his remedy at common law; it is, therefore, natural to ask how the Court of Chancery obtained a concurrent jurisdiction with those of common law; and how it has become the tribunal to which matters of account are most frequently referred. The reason is discoverable in its mode of proceeding, which presents peculiar advantages for investigating matters of this kind, and compelling payment of the balance due to the party entitled. (See Mistf. p. 120.) Here it may be observed, that a court of equity will not entertain a suit if the subject be capable of proof, and a matter of set-off at law. (Dinwiddie v. Bailey, 6 Ves. 136. Where, by means of misrepresentation, securities have been obtained from an inexperienced young man, a bill for an account may be filed between a tradesman and his customer. (Long Courtenay v. Godschall, 9 Ves. 473.) Bills for account are filed most commonly in cases of partnership transactions, and against persons standing in the characters of mortgagee, agent, auditor, land steward and manager, and executor. The court will not allow a stated account to be unravelled, unless where fraud has been mixed up with it. (Vernon v. Vawdrey, 2 Atk. 119.) Bills for tithes are, as matters of account, very frequent in the Court of Chancery. Tithe causes, however, do not fall under the natural jurisdiction of the Chancellor.

3. Fraud.—Under this head come a great variety of cases; here, as in the former part of my answer, I shall aim at the utmost conciseness consistent with practical utility. In the necessarily limited portion of your columns devoted to these answers, Mr. Editor, it is impossible to do full justice to the present problem: it is, therefore, my endeavour, by a judicious selection, to give a general idea of the subjects relievable by Bill in Chancery rather than point out every, or even the majority of cases, in which this method of proceeding may be practicable. It is a general principle, that when persons invested with a fiduciary character purchase the estates of parties for whom they hold, the court will, on bill filed, set aside such sales if completed, and if not, will interfere to prevent their taking place. "With a view to prevent fraud, a trustee is not permitted to become a purchaser from himself of part, or the whole, of the trust estate; nor can the solicitor of a trustee purchase the trust estate. Commissioners, assignees, and solicitors, under a commission of bankruptcy, whether bidding for themselves or others, are within the operation of this rule, and are not allowed to purchase the bankrupt's estate. (1 Madd. 110.) If a trustee for sale for the benefit of an infant is desirous of purchasing the trust estate, he must file a bill to carry the trust into execution under the direction of the court, and apply for leave to purchase, offering to give more than any other person. (Campbell v. Walker, 5 Ves. 681.) It seems an auctioneer comes within the rule; but I do not know of any positive decision to this effect. A court of equity regards the conduct of solicitors and attornies, whilst managing the business of their clients, with great jealousy; therefore, if an attorney purchase property of his client, it is incumbent on him, in order to support his purchase, to show that he paid the full amount he could have obtained from any other person. (Harris v. Tremendhere, 15 Ves. 42.) But if the relationship between them has ceased, and with it all influence, then a client may, even by a voluntary conveyance, make over part of his property to his solicitor as well as to any other person. (Wells v. Middleton, 1 Cox, 112; Wright

v. Proud, 13 Ves. 138.) And, in the absence of fraud, and with long acquiescence under certain circumstances, the court will not disturb a sale made during the existence of such relationship; as was decided in the recent case of Rudd v. Sewell and another. (Legal Guide, vol. 3. p. 359.) Here, the solicitor sold the property again, in the course of a few weeks, for £300. more than he gave for it. The decision, however, was grounded on the peculiar circumstances of the case, and the Lord Chancellor observed, "Nothing that the court did with reference to the present case would in the slightest degree affect the principle of the authorities on that important subject, and it ought to be well known to all professional men that they never could be allowed to take any gain from such transactions, while there was the greatest risk of their losing much in professional character." The bill was dismissed with costs. Expectant heirs are equally protected against all the world in dealing with their expectancies, as are cestui que trusts against the purchase of their estate by trustees; and if a suit be commenced, it will lie on the purchaser to show that the transaction was a fair and bona fide one. (Goldsmith's Equity, p. 27, and cases cited.) The court manifests a like jealousy of conveyances between persons in the relation of guardian and ward. (1 Ball & Beatty, 230; Hylton v. Hylton, 2 Ves. 547.) But it will not set aside a reasonable grant as a reward for care and trouble, if the ward, when he becomes sui juris, thinks fit to make any. (Darson v. Massey, 1 Ball & Beatty, 219.) For the prevention of fraud the court will, in numerous instances, on bill filed, grant prohibitory writs called injunctions; with these, I conceive, I have little to do in this answer. Where a person has a right which may become the subject of litigation between various persons at different times, and by different actions, he may file a bill called a Bill of Peace; and the court will thereupon prevent a multiplicity of suits by directing an issue to determine the rights, and ultimately an injunction. (1 Madd. 166.) Bills of this kind are most frequently between Lords of Manors and their tenants, and between the tenants of one manor and another; for in these cases there are several rights common to many parties, and resting upon the same principles.

A Bill of Interpleader is resorted to when a person in possession of an object, to which he lays no claim, is in danger of being harassed by the conflicting demands of other persons, claiming in different or separate interests the same object, and knows not to whom he ought to deliver it up. The bill prays that the parties may interplead, in order that the court may adjudge to whom the property belongs, and that the plaintiff may be indemnified. Perhaps it will be unnecessary to enter upon the consideration of the in which it is eligible to proceed by bills peritiorari, to perpetuate testimony, of discommodities, Quia Timet, and some others of a peculiar character, because their object is not so much to give relief as to prevent anticipated injuries or losses. "Frauds on powers are often the subject of relief in equity. A party, for instance, will be allowed to execute a power for his own benefit, which was intended for the benefit of others; as where a person having a power of appointment amongst children, and thinking one of his children was in a consumption, appointed in favour of that child, with a view, as the court has decided, to take the chance of getting the money from the administrator of the child, the appointment is set aside." (1 Madd. 311.) Private Acts of Parliament, when obtained on fraudulent suggestions, have been relieved against. Where a false use of a legal demand has been obtained by fraud, it will be set aside. (Pascoe v. Pascoe, 12 Ex., 109.)

NEW POSTAGE.

M<sup>r</sup>. C. B. HAMILTON requested to know from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether any objection existed on the part of her Majesty's Government to issue an order respecting the discontinuance of prepayment of postage? An impression had gone abroad, that after a certain number of letters would not be received at the Post Office unless they were stamped or enclosed in one of the figured envelopes. The report of a proceeding on the part of the Government had an injurious effect on the retail stationary trade, which had already suffered to a considerable extent, and therefore, if there was no such objection on the part of the Government, it might be as well to have it stated publicly.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER replied, there was no such intention on the part of her Majesty's Government.

THE MARRIAGE ACT.

M<sup>r</sup>. LANGDALE rose to move for leave to introduce a bill, the object of which was to remedy an inconvenience occasioned by the interpretation put upon one of the provisions of this Act.

In consequence of the opinions of the advisers of the crown to that effect, the registrars were directed to grant certificates to parties to be married elsewhere than in a place of worship in the district in which one or other of them resided. In some cases this operated as an absolute bar to marriage, because in many instances there was no place of worship belonging to the communion to which the parties were attached in the district in which they resided. He proposed to remedy this inconvenience by enacting that the registrar should have power to issue no certificates to be married elsewhere than in the district in which the parties resided, but with this exception, that it should be competent to the parties to prove that there was no place of worship of their persuasion in the district in which they resided, and that upon that proof he should grant the certificate to be married in the nearest place of worship in their district. He moved for leave to bring in a bill authorising the solemnisation of marriages in a place of worship in or near the district in which the parties reside.

M<sup>r</sup>. SHAW thought it worthy of consideration whether the proposed change might have the effect of invalidating any of the marriages solemnised under the act as it at present stood.

Dr. LUSHINGTON said the act was so framed, that no change of the law could affect the validity of marriages solemnised under it. Had there been the slightest possibility of the present bill producing such a result, he should have felt it his duty to warn the House of it.

Lord J. RUSSELL said, that, after what had fallen from his right hon. and learned friend, no doubt could exist as to the point raised by the right hon. gentleman (Sir F. Shaw). It was sufficient, however, to read the clause in the act itself, which was sufficiently decisive on this head. With respect to the bill of the hon. member for Knaresborough, he had no objection to its introduction, because, in fact, it was long supposed that the law really was what the hon. member now proposed to make it. He would advise the hon. gentleman, however, to consider of some closer definition of the words "in or near," as those words would certainly give rise to doubts as to what would be considered as near. It would be better to state at once within what limits certificates should be allowed to have effect.

Leave given to bring in the bill.

MARRIAGE ACT.

The following correspondence, relative to the Marriage Act, has lately passed between a clergyman and the registrar-general of marriages, &c.:—

"— Rectory, 30th April, 1840.

"Sir,—Application has been made to me to marry a couple in the church of S—, under the following circumstances. The man lives in the parish of St. J—, in —. The woman in the parish of N—. The banns have been published before the board of guardians of the poor law union, in which all the three parishes are situated; and I have received the usual certificate from the registrar, because the notice stated that the marriage would be solemnised in S—— church. I have objected, however, to marry the parties in this parish, because, although the act of 1 Vict. cap. 22, sec. 36, authorises the publication of banns before the board of guardians of the poor law union, I conceive that it does not allow the marriage to be solemnised at any parish church within the union at the option of the parties, but that the previous act for preventing clandestine marriages still remains in force, which requires one or other of the persons about to be married to be living in the parish where the ceremony is to be performed. The superintendent-registrar tells me, however, that I am in error. May I therefore request an answer at your earliest convenience, informing me whether, in your opinion, a clergyman is either compelled, or has the option, in the present state of the law, to marry, in his parish church, parties whose banns have been published as herein stated, provided neither of them be living in his parish? I am, Sir, your very obedient servant.

London.”

“General-register Office, May 1, 1840.

“Rev. Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge your letter of the 30th ult., and in reply to inform you, by direction of the registrar-general, that it is the opinion of the legal authorities whom he has consulted on the subject, that, notwithstanding the provisions of the 36th section of the act of 1 Vict., c. 22, a clergyman is not compelled to marry parties in his parish church on production of a superintendent-registrar's certificate, unless one of them be living in the parish in which his church is situate. I am, Rev. Sir, your obedient servant,

“Sir,—I am much obliged by the prompt attention which has been paid to my letter of the 30th ult., and I regret having to give any additional trouble on the subject, but the letter of the 1st inst., which you have directed to be sent to me, refers only to one of the questions I had submitted to you. It informs me that ‘in the opinion of the legal authorities you have consulted, &c.’ a clergyman is not compelled to marry parties, &c. (see letter No. 2); and this opinion, if generally known, would practically set the point at rest, because very few, if any clergymen, would consent without compulsion to such a deviation from ecclesiastical order and custom as to marry persons in their church who do not reside in their parish. But as the subject is one of considerable importance, and your attention appears to have been already directed to it, perhaps you may have no difficulty in stating whether, in the opinion of the legal authorities you have consulted, a clergyman has the option to marry the parties if he think fit. On reference to the clause in the Act, it appears to me that he has not that option; for the words seem intended to state, that the registrar's certificate of publication before the board of guardians shall place the parties in precisely the same, but in only the same situation, with reference to the Marriage Act, as if the banns had been published in church. But the banns can only be published in church, and the parties be married consequent on that publication in the parish church where the parties actually reside; and if they live in separate parishes, the marriage cannot be solemnized unless the banns be published in both parishes, and a certificate be produced of that fact. If, therefore, by the publication before the board of guardians an option is given to the incumbent or curate of each of the numerous parishes of which an union may consist to marry parties living in any of those parishes, a power is conferred beyond that which previously existed, and which tends in effect to annul those clauses in the Marriage Act which were framed to prevent clandestine marriages. I submit these observations to your notice with great respect and deference, and I trust the necessity of having a subject of such public interest properly understood will be accepted by you as my apology for this intrusion. I have the honour to be, Sir, your very obedient servant.

“General-register Office, 5th May, 1840.

“Rev. Sir,—I am directed by the registrar-general to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 4th instant, and in reply, to inform you that he has not taken a legal opinion upon the specific question which you have therein submitted to him.—I have the honour to be, Rev. Sir, your obedient servant,

The following is an extract from the clause mentioned in the foregoing letters:—

“Be it enacted, that the giving of notice to the superintendent-registrar, and the issue of the superintendent-registrar's certificate, as in the said act and by this act provided, shall be used and stand instead of the publication of banns for all intents and purposes, where no such publication shall have taken place; and every parson, vicar, minister, or curate in England shall solemnise marriage after such notice and certificate as aforesaid, in like manner as after the publica-banns: provided always, that the church wherein any marriages according to the rites of the Church of England shall be solemnised, shall within the district of the superintendent-rector by whom such certificate as aforesaid shall have been issued."

COURT OF CHANCERY.—May 2.

CLAPTON v. BULMER.

APPEAL from the VICE-CHANCELLOR.

quest by a Testator "to the nearest of kin of his own family for ever." After the decease of the Testator's Child without issue—CONSTRUCTION.

This was an appeal from a decree of the Vice-Chancellor made on the 24th January last.

As appeared by the pleadings, that William Clapton, by his will, gave the residue of his personal estate, to trustees, upon trust, out of the dividends to pay to his wife an annuity of £150. for life, and to pay the surplus to his daughter Amelia Rebecca Johnson, (afterwards Amelia Rebecca White), for life; but, in case of the death or intermarriage of his wife, then he directed the whole of the dividends to be paid to his daughter for life, for her sole and separate use, and after the decease of his daughter, then, upon trust, to assign and transfer the said trust monies unto all and every the child and children of his daughter in manner therein mentioned. He followed this proviso:—"Provided always, I declare my will and mind to be, that in case my said daughter should happen to die without leaving any issue, then I will and direct that my said trustees, or the survivors or survivor of them, or the executors or administrators of such survivor, shall, upon her decease without issue, raise and pay the sum of £3,000. to such person or persons as she shall in and by her last will and testament in writing, or any writing purporting to be her last will and testament, or any codicil thereto, nominate, give, direct, or appoint. And in case my said wife shall happen to survive my said daughter, and my said daughter shall die without issue, then I will and direct that my said trustees shall, upon the decease of my said daughter, and such failure of issue as aforesaid, raise and pay out of the said trust monies the further sum of £2,000. unto my said wife, to and for her own absolute use and benefit. And I will and direct that my said trustees or the survivors or survivor of them, or the executors or administrators of such survivor, do and shall assign and transfer the residue of such trust monies, and of my personal estate, unto the nearest of kin of my own family for ever." The testator died, leaving his wife and daughter, and John Martin Bulmer, his next of kin, him surviving. The testator's widow died in the lifetime of her daughter. The testator's daughter intermarried with Percival White, and died without issue, and appointed by her will the £3,000. in favour of her husband, Percival White. The bill was filed by the trustees against John Martin Bulmer and Percival White. The master made his report, and found that the defendant, John Martin Bulmer, was the next of kin of the testator, and of the testator's daughter at her death, which was absolutely confirmed. The cause now came on for further directions. The question was, whether the testator intended that his residuary estate should vest in his next of kin at the death of his daughter without leaving children, in exclusion of his daughter herself, in which case the defendant Bulmer would be entitled as such reported next of kin; or whether it should go to his nearest of kin who should be living at his death, including his daughter, in which case the defendant White, her husband and legal personal representative, would be entitled.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR, at the hearing before him said, I think it is plain there is not an intestacy, because after the testator has made that disposition of the residue of the property which consists in the fact of giving the daughter an interest, and making the provision for her children, then he proceeds in this manner: "Provided always, and I do declare my will and mind to be, that in case my said daughter shall happen to die without leaving any issue, then I will and direct that my said trustees, or the survivors or survivor of them, or the executors or administrators of such survivor, do and shall, upon her decease without issue as aforesaid, raise and pay the sum of £3,000. to such person or persons as she my said daughter shall in and by her last will and testament in writing, or any writing purporting to be her last will and testament, or any codicil thereto, nominate, give, direct, or appoint." That is one proviso; one part at least of what he directs under the general head of the provision. And then he says, "And in case my said wife shall happen to survive my daughter, and my daughter shall die without issue as aforesaid, then I will and direct that my trustees shall, upon the decease of my said daughter, and such failure of issue as aforesaid, raise and pay out of the said trust monies the further sum of £2,000. unto my wife." And then he says, "And I will and direct." Then he proceeds to complete the ultimate proviso, by declaring that he does direct "that the trustees shall assign and transfer the residue of the trust-moneys, and the residue of my personal estate, unto the nearest of kin of my own family for ever." I consider, therefore, there is no intestacy; it is a gift: and it can be no intestacy unless it is made out that these words necessarily have no meaning; if they have the meaning which either one or other of the counsel contend for, then there is no intestacy; he says, "unto the nearest of kin of my own family for ever." Now, if he had meant to say his own nearest of kin, how simple it would have been to have said, "my nearest of kin;" but it is plain he did not mean that, because, if that which is said to be a man's intention is obviously easy to execute, and the party does not execute it in the obvious and easy manner, I think it is a fair inference to hold that he really meant something else than that which is so obvious and easy; he says, "the nearest of kin," not of myself, but "of my own family for ever." Now, I cannot but think, if he had used the words "in the event of the death of my daughter, and failure of issue of my daughter," and so on, "the trustees shall transfer it to the nearest of kin of my family," that would have been a gift to the daughter. And when he says "the nearest of kin of my own family," I cannot but think that the most natural construction of the words is, to make the persons of whom the nearest of kin are spoken of, those persons who, according to ordinary language, would be his family, that is, his daughter; and I am more inclined to think that this is the meaning of the phrase, because, though the construction has been put by courts of law upon the words "relation," and so on, which has been established by that series of cases beginning with the case of Harrington v. Harte, (a) I believe, out of the courts of law, nobody would think that that is the construction; and the multitude of cases shew the willingness to dispute the point where it is disputable. Now, the words, therefore, of themselves, of necessity implying his own next of kin, are his own relations, by the testator having thought proper to use that phrase, which appears to me to be truly singular, for I never remember to have heard it before. For the purpose of construing this phrase, which here has received a legal construction, I will look at what he has done by the former part of the will; and there he has given the residue of his property to his daughter for her life, with remainder to her children, obviously only words to make a provision in favour of his daughter; now the issue no longer being able to enjoy the property, and having regard also to the particular circumstances of the property, as given by him in these most singular terms (which I never saw before), it appears to me it is not a reasonable or rational construction to hold that, under the terms of "the nearest of kin of my own family," the nearest of kin of his daughter is of necessity the nearest party to take.

Against this decree the present appeal was brought, and now came on for judgment.

Mr. Wigram appeared for the appellant, and contended that the testator's daughter took through her representative, or that there was an intestacy, and in either case the husband was entitled.

Mr. Jacob, on the part of the respondents supported the view taken by the Vice-Chancellor. It was clear the testator did not intend to give the residue to his daughter, for he had expressly directed that she should have a power of appointment over a certain sum, and then proceeded to dispose of the residue.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said, the words admitted but of two constructions, and must either refer to the nearest of kin at the testator's death who was his daughter, or his nearest of kin at her death. Circumstances showed that his own death could not be referred to, and as the defendant filled both characters, and was nearest of kin both to the testator at his daughter's death and to the daughter herself, he was entitled. His Lordship added, that the decision of the Vice-Chancellor was right; appeal dismissed with costs.

The following cases were cited in the argument for the plaintiff:—Jones v. Colbeck, Ves. J. 38; Briden v. Hewlett, 2 Myl. & K. 91; Elmsley v. Young, id. 82; Butler v. Bushnell, 3 id. 232; Long v. Blackall, 3 Ves. J. 486.

For the defendant—Doe v. Lawson, 3 East 278; Pope v. Whitcombe, 3 Mer. 689; Dart v. Norton, 2 P. Wms. 390; Pearce v. Vincent, 2 Keene, 230; and Wright v. Atkins, 19 Ves. J. 299.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER, May 13.

JONES v. HUGHES.

ATTORNEYS. Whether upon a plaintiff and defendant settling an action between themselves, without the plaintiff's attorney, and without paying his costs, the latter may, nevertheless, proceed with the action to judgment as if no such settlement had been made.

This was an action for work and labour, and goods sold and delivered to the amount of £75. The plaintiff had a verdict for £50.

Mr. Richards had obtained a rule nisi on behalf of the defendant, to set aside the verdict which, it was alleged, had been obtained by the attorney for the plaintiff, after the action had been settled between the plaintiff and defendant.

Mr. Kelly now showed cause against the rule.

It appeared that the plaintiff had fitted up the machinery for the defendant, and having agreed to perform the contract, as the defendant alleged, the latter refused to pay the amount claimed in the action, which was £75. In the month of March last, a short time previous to the assizes, it appears the plaintiff and the defendant met, when the former expressed a strong desire to settle the action without going to a trial, because, as he said, although the defendant had money to go to law with, he (the plaintiff) had not. Being near a public-house at the time, they entered and sent for a mutual friend, and an agreement was drawn up and signed by both parties, the terms of which were that each should pay his own costs, and the defendant was to pay the plaintiff such sum of money as he in his honour and conscience considered was due from him to the plaintiff for the work done. The costs then incurred by the attorney of the plaintiff appeared, amounted to £50, for which the plaintiff proceeded and obtained a verdict.

Mr. Williams also argued against the rule, now concluded that the attorney had a right to proceed to keep his verdict, because, though it might not appear distinctly in the agreement, yet all the circumstances of this case showed clearly that there was collusion between the parties for the purpose of keeping the attorney out of his costs. PARKE, B. observed, that collusion must be clearly shown, because it was well known that an attorney gives credit, and can only look to his client for the payment of his costs, and a plaintiff and defendant had a right to settle the action how they pleased. Unless fraud and collusion were proved,—the attorney had certainly a right to look to the defendant for the payment of his costs.

Mr. Williams submitted that the affidavit clearly showed the collusion charged against the parties. The fact was, the plaintiff was a poor man, indeed an insolvent; but the defendant was a rich man. The plaintiff stated that the agreement was obtained from him after he had been drinking for some time in a public-house at Brecon, and that the defendant, knowing the amount of costs which had been incurred, said to him, "Oh, never mind the matter; you are a poor man, here is £15 for you and your children; keep it, and don't you tell Mr. Thomas." It was, therefore, evident that the defendant intended to prevent Mr. Thomas from obtaining from him the amount of his costs, and thus save himself the sum of £35. Under these circumstances the learned gentleman said he would submit to the court that the rule setting aside the verdict ought to be discharged.

Mr. Kelly said—It was quite evident that the plaintiff as well as his attorney had been overruled by the defendant. The plaintiff was a poor man, and had been induced by the defendant to sacrifice his own interests as well as those of his attorney. He hoped, that even if their Lordships should think the verdict ought not to stand, they would not give the defendant any costs against either the plaintiff or his attorney, for, at all events, it was clearly a case for strong suspicion.

Mr. Richards, in support of the rule, denied that there was the least colour of a collusion in the agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant. The latter, of course, wished to make the best bargain he could with the former. The defendant denied that the plaintiff had any claim upon him at all, but not wishing to go into court after an arrangement which had been in progress during ten days, they at last entered into an agreement by which it was stipulated that each party should pay his own costs. He would ask whether there was any thing like collusion in such an agreement? He had affidavits showing that the plaintiff, both on the evening of the day the agreement was entered into, and four days afterwards when he had been paid the £15 by the defendant, said to several friends that he had entered into an arrangement which was perfectly satisfactory to him. In making the arrangement his principal object was to settle the action, and he urged that he should have to pay the costs against an argument that he ought to have more money from the defendant.

Mr. Petersdorff followed, and submitted that there was no pretence for saying that in this case there was any collusion between the plaintiff and the defendant to defraud the attorney, and according to the doctrine laid down in all the cases, such a charge must be positively and distinctly proved in the affirmative before the court could act upon it.

PARKE, B. said there was no doubt upon the law of the case. A plaintiff was certainly master of his own actions, although attorneys appeared very often to forget that fact, and thought the action was brought merely for the purpose of recovering their costs, and not any damages to which their client might consider himself entitled. The law was clear, and he was of opinion that it was clearly made out in this case, that the agreement was entered into in fraud of the attorney but not of the plaintiff. Here was a poor man, whom the defendant knew to be in insolvent circumstances; he was well aware that the plaintiff could not pay the costs to his attorney, and he tempts him with £15, telling him at the same time to never mind his attorney, but keep the money for himself and his family. It was, therefore, clear that there was an intention to keep the attorney out of his costs. The verdict must be reduced to one shilling damages, which will carry the attorney's costs.

The Court gave the costs of the present motion to the plaintiff.—Rule discharged with costs.

May 12.

SAUNDERSON v. WESTLEY AND ANOTHER.
WARRANT OF ATTORNEY.—Effect of ONE
ATTORNEY being employed by both parties.
 Mr. Thesiger had obtained a rule nisi to set aside a warrant of attorney.

Mr. Platt now showed cause against the rule.

It appeared that one of the defendants, Miss Walters, when she came of age would be entitled to some property. The defendant Westley (who was her brother-in-law) had negotiated with the plaintiff a loan of £400 upon the security of Miss Walters. When the security for the money, which was a warrant of attorney, was taken to Miss Walters for her signature, she expressed a wish that it should be prepared by her attorneys, Messrs. Walters and Reeve. She was, however, told that those gentlemen would not allow her to complete the transaction; and having perfect confidence in her brother-in-law, she went to the office of Mr. Goddard, the plaintiff's solicitor, where a paper was read over to her, but she did not understand it, and signed it as a security for her brother-in-law. Mr. Goddard, it was stated, did not explain the nature of the instrument, and Miss Walters stated in her affidavit that he had not, upon any occasion, acted as her attorney, nor was any one present then on her behalf. In answer to this, Mr. Platt said he was furnished with the affidavit of the plaintiff, from which it appeared that the £400 had been advanced; that he proposed that Messrs. Walters & Reeve should draw up the instrument, but the defendant declined, and named Mr. Goddard, who acted as the attorney for both parties.

PARKE, B. said it appeared that in this case there was but one attorney acting for both the plaintiff and defendant. It had been held that that would not do. The defendants ought to have their own attorney.

Mr. Platt said it was stated in the affidavits that Mr. Goddard prepared the instrument at the request of the defendants, and was employed by them.

Mr. Thesiger said, it also appeared that Mr. Goddard was the solicitor of the plaintiff on former occasions; that for this very business the bill of costs was made out against the plaintiff; and that when Messrs. Walters and Reeve applied to Mr. Goddard for an inspection of the security signed by Miss Walters, he refused, and said he could not do so until he saw the plaintiff, his client. It further appeared, from the affidavit of Mr. Westley's father, that Miss Walters was rather silly, and there had been no protection thrown around her by the presence of Mr. Goddard.

The COURT were of opinion that in this transaction Mr. Goddard must be taken to have acted as the attorney for the plaintiff, and not for the defendants. Indeed there was no pretence that he had ever acted as the attorney of the defendant, Miss Walters. Wherever there was one attorney only present at such transactions, it ought to appear very clearly that he acted in no manner for the plaintiff, otherwise the protection intended to be given by the Act of Parliament would be entirely taken away. Here the warrant of attorney was clearly bad, and was, therefore, void and of no effect. Rule made absolute.

REVIEW OF NEW BOOKS.

ART, showing the Descent of Estates and Inheritance in Fee Simple in Possession, Freehold, Copyhold, in Remainder, Reversion, or by Custom upon Deaths, after the day of January, 1834, under the Statute 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 106. By W. B. D., Esq., one, &c. John Richards & Co., Fleet Street.

This is a very useful Chart of intelligence for the attorney's office, and for the student. It is not alone a mere Chart of Descent, but the illustrations make it one of practical value, which in these glorious LAW REFORM days is much wanted. The following observations of the author are very concise, and will give some idea of his illustrations.

The Act 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 106, extends to all hereditaments, corporeal, and incorporeal, freehold, and copyhold, and whether descendible according to the common law, or according to the custom of gavel kind, borough English, or other custom.

Descent, or hereditary succession, is that means by virtue of which on the death of the ancestor intestate the real estates, including heirlooms and other chattels annexed to the freehold, devolve upon the heir. For a person to be lawful heir he must be legitimate, a natural born subject, an alien naturalized by Act of Parliament, or a denizen by the King's letters patent.

Gavel kind lands descend to all the sons equally, and in default of sons to all the daughters in the same manner: females, however, representing males, inherit with males. (Rob. Gav. 113, ed. 1822.) This species of descent extends also to collaterals and to limitations in tail, the male issue of tenants in tail inheriting equally as heirs of the body. (Rob. Gav. 115, 119, ed. 1822.)

Borough English lands descend to the youngest son, and this is the case even should the property be estates in tail. (Litt. s. 165, 1 Inst. 110 b. n. 3.) This custom does not extend to collaterals (Rob. Gav. 118, Cro. Jac. 198); if, therefore, lands descend to a younger brother, and he dies without issue, the eldest brother will be entitled.

As regards copyhold and other customary lands, the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 106, does not change the descent of those lands which are governed by the custom, unless to such a degree as its enactments may be applicable to them in common with freehold lands.

Estates tail descend per formam doni, and are not interfered with by the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 106, but are governed by the statute de donis conditionalibus (13 Ed. 1, c. 1); this descent is called descent by statute.

The descent of an estate tail must be traced to the first purchaser or donee, and through that description of heirs which is specified in the original gift; the maxim sesina facit stipitem does not apply to this estate (3 Rep. 41 b, 2 Ves. s. 364), and there is no exclusion of the half-blood, for the issue in tail are always of the whole blood of the donee. (8 T. R. 213.) Nor is the descent of an estate tail interrupted by attainder, as the issue claim per formam doni, and are as much within the intention of the gift and described in it as the ancestor.

Succession per Stirpes, or according to the root, is where all the children take the same share as their root, whom they represent, would have done. By this rule the descent is kept uniform and steady.

Succession per capita is where the issue claim in their own right, as next of kin to the ancestor, without reference to the stock from whom they sprung.

Agnatic succession is where the issue is derived from male ancestors through the father's side. (2 B. C. 235.)

Cognatic succession is where the issue is derived from female ancestors through the mother's side. (2 B. C. 235.)

Lineal consanguinity subsists between persons of whom one is descended in a direct line from the other, as John Doe, in the table, and his father, grandfather, &c.

Collateral consanguinity is something like the former, inasmuch as it agrees with it in this, that they claim descent from the same ancestor, but do not descend one from the other.

"The Purchaser" to mean the person who last acquired the land otherwise than by descent, or than by any escheat, partition, or inclosure, by the effect of which the land shall have become part of or descendible in the same manner as other land acquired by descent. (See sec. 1.)

ESSAY.

ON THE ENGLISH LAW OF BAILMENTS.

WATKINS puts three cases to justify his approval of the doctrine of the Pandects. (a) First, where the thing borrowed is of greater value than the borrower's own property: secondly, where the things are of the same kind and value; thirdly, where the borrower's own are of the greatest value; and he decides each of the cases against the borrower, admitting the last to be of chief difficulty. He thus reasons upon the last case. It is true that the borrower cannot be reproached with any want of fidelity; but still the borrower undertakes for extraordinary diligence tenetur adhibere exactissimam diligentiam, and by the nature of his contract he engages for all risks, except losses occasioned by the vis major. “Præstat omne periculum præter casus fortuitos seu vim majorem.” Certainly that alone is deemed to be vis major, which cannot be resisted, vis major, cui resisti non potest. Although the borrower could not save both his own and the borrowed goods; yet he could have saved the latter at the expense of his own, and therefore they could not be said to be lost by the vis major. Pothier admits that it would be otherwise, where the tumult is such that the borrower has no choice, and saves what comes to his hands first, without any exercise of judgment. But (he says) there is an implied exception to all these cases of casualty and accident, which is that they shall be without any default on the part of the borrower; for if they are connected with his default, his responsibility remains. As if a borrower is imprudent enough to leave the high road and pass through some thicket, or unfrequented path, or to travel at an unseasonable hour, or on a road notoriously frequented by robbers, without proper precautions, and a robbery takes place, he will nevertheless be liable for the loss. So, if he rides a borrowed horse on an improper road, and he falls, and is killed by the accident; or if he puts the horse into an improper pasture, and he is stolen by robbers; for accident or irresistible force will not excuse his own rashness. So if a lady borrows jewels to wear at a ball, and by her imprudence they are lost by robbery; or if she exposes them to any other undue perils, by leaving them in an improper place, the loss, though by accident, will be her own. There is, however, this difference, which POTHIER considers very material in solving questions of this nature, that in a like case of borrowed jewels, if they were lost by robbery or by accident, and the borrower used them in a suitable manner, and left them in suitable places only, then the loss must fall on the lender; for, although the lady's wearing them, or leaving them in the particular place, may be said to be the occasion of the loss, yet it was not the cause of the loss. So passing through a forest with a borrowed horse may be the occasion of the borrower being robbed of him there; but in a just sense, if the forest were necessary to be passed in the journey, the borrower passing could not be considered as the cause of the loss, as he was guilty of no neglect.

But the cause of the loss is correctly to be referred to the robbery. So that the borrower is responsible for the loss, not only when he might have saved the thing by proper care from the accident, but when his own neglect has been the occasion of the accident. Again, if the borrower puts a borrowed horse under a ruinous building, and it falls, and kills or maims the horse, and the borrower might have foreseen this, he is responsible. But if the fall is caused by an unexpected storm, then he is not responsible, if, in ordinary cases, the place would have been safe (b). So, again, where a party is desirous of purchasing a horse obtains the loan of it for the purpose of trial, and employs an inexperienced person to make such trial, the borrower shall be liable to the value of the horse; but if he employs a skilful person who makes the trial and the horse runs away and is killed, then he is not responsible (c).

We may next consider, in this class of bailments, upon whom, in case of any damage or loss to the loan, the burthen of proof rests. Pothier considers that the burthen of proof rests upon the borrower; but as in these cases rest upon their own peculiar individual circumstances, it is difficult either to ascertain or lay down any general rule; in some cases it has been held that the burthen of proof rests upon the lender (d).

We may next inquire, who is to be deemed the owner or proprietor of the thing during the period of the loan, or, in other words, whether the borrower has a special property in it, or only a naked possession. A gratuitous permission to a third person to use a chattel does not, at the common law, take it out of the possession of the owner.

(c) See Lord Camoys v. Smar, post 90.

and this rule agrees with the civil law. The lender still retains the sole proprietary interest, and nothing passes to the borrower but a mere right of possession and user of the thing during the continuance of the bailment. The possession of the borrower is in fact the possession of the lender. "Rei commodatæ possessionem et proprietatem retinemus. nemo enim commodando rem facit ejus cui commodat" (f); so that an action for trespass or conversion will lie in favour of the lender against a stranger, who has obtained a wrongful possession, or has made a wrongful conversion of the thing loaned; and although the borrower has no special property in the thing loaned, still it seems, that if the injury done by a stranger is of such a nature that the bailee would be liable over to the lender, the latter may maintain an action of trespass, and even trover, founded upon the wrongful possession, to recover damages (g). A lender has a sufficient interest to sue the borrower (h).

ANSWER TO PROBLEM 25. VOL. 3. (Continued from p. 73.)

IN CHANCERY.—On what subjects may relief be obtained by a bill in Chancery?

Infants.—In matters relating to infants, the Court has most commonly been called upon for its aid with regard to one of these three classes; 1. Guardianship; 2. Maintenance;

Dig. Lib. 13, tit. 6. l. 6, 8; Ayliffe's Pand. B. 6, p. 517; Domat. B. 1, tit. 5, § 1, n. 4. Burton v. Hughes, 2 Bing. R. 172; Sutton v. Taunt, R. 302; Rooth v. Wilson, 1 B. & Ald. Lord Raym. 911; 2 Bl. Com. 453. Burton v. Hughes, ante; see also Ogle v. Atkinson, 759; Amory v. Delamirie, 1 St. R.

3. Marriage. But frequently in these matters the method of proceeding is by petition, and the object sought is frequently not relief in its strict sense; we may, therefore, treat this division of our subject with all possible brevity. As respects guardianship, there is little applicable to our subject—the most usual form of application being by petition. If, however, a testamentary guardian has taken the trust upon him, and it is desirable he should be removed for misconduct, a bill must be filed. (O'Keefe v. Casey, 1 Sch. & Lefr. 106.) The right to guardianship will be decided only on bill, and not on petition. (Ex parte Hopkins, 3 P. Wms. 152.) Maintenance is sometimes granted on petition in very special cases; but, as a general rule, a bill should be filed. If a child has property left to it independently of its father, and the father be not of ability to maintain it suitably with its expectations, the Court will decree an allowance during the child's minority. (Buckworth v. Buckworth, 1 Cox, 80.) It is not necessary to show that the guardian or father of such child is in distressed circumstances. (Roach v. Garvan, 1 Ves. 100.) Where maintenance is allowed, it is always paid to the parent out of the child's estate; and there is no instance of its being deducted out of a legacy left by a father to the child, or out of a debt due from the father though insisted on by creditors. (1 Madd. 344.) Generally, trustees will not be allowed to break in upon the capital of an infant's fortune, though the capital be so small as not to leave a comfortable maintenance and education; and it is very rarely that the Court itself will do this. (Walker v. Wetherell, 6 Ves. 474.) Although the Court will assume the right of controverting the direction of the will in cases when, under an accumulation clause, the children have an equal chance to take the capital with the accumulation, that is, if all persons interested consent, and it is for the benefit of the children; yet, if it is provided that the share of any child dying under the age of 21 years leaving issue, shall go to such issue, maintenance will not be allowed. (Errat v. Barlow, 14 Ves. 203.) With respect to the marriage of infants (being wards in Chancery), it will suffice to remark that the most common applications to the Court are for leave to marry, and for a reference to the master to see whether the settlement proposed is proper. It is sometimes necessary to file a bill for an order on an infant trustee to convey. (Ex parte Vernon, 2 P. Wms. 549.)

Specific Performance of Agreements.—“Equity looks upon things agreed to be done as actually performed.” It is on this principle that the Court of Chancery enforces the specific performance of agreements. Therefore, when a contract has been entered into for the sale of an estate, equity regards the vendor as a trustee for the purchaser of an estate sold, and the purchaser, as a trustee for the vendor, of the purchase money; and if the vendor or vendee die before the time appointed for completing the contract, it is immaterial. (Sug. V. & P. 160; Gold's Equity, 69.) I need not, perhaps, remind your readers that the equity maxim, above given, is not altogether without exception. Those who wish to examine the exceptions may refer to the cases cited by Mr. Maddock (C. P. V. I. p. 370.) It is stated as a general rule that agreements which the Court will decree to be specifically performed must be, 1. According to the forms prescribed by law; 2. Between parties able and willing to contract; 3. They must be certain, equal, and fair. The forms, above alluded to, depend upon the statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3, § 6); by a liberal interpretation of this statute, a letter containing the terms of the agreement has been held sufficient (Kennedy v. Lee, 3 Meriv. 441); but it must clearly import a concluded agreement, and not a mere treaty. Sometimes when there has been part performance of a parol agreement a written contract has been dispensed with; it must, however, be shown that it was the identical agreement which was in part performed. (Lindsay v. Lynch, 2 Sch. & Lefr. 8.) Letting the vendee into possession, especially where he has, in consequence, laid out money in improvements, has been deemed part performance. (Hawkins v. Holmes, 1 P. Wms. 770.) It is laid down as a general rule, that where a person stipulates to perform that which is either in his own power to do, or in the power of others over whom he can exercise controul in that behalf, the Court will compel him to do it, or procure it to be done. Thus, a married man has been ordered to procure the acknowledgment of his wife of a fine in mortgaged lands. (Gold's Eq. 76; and cases there cited.) The specific performance of covenants is frequently sought in equity. Covenants which run with the land will be decreed to be specifically performed for or against successive owners of the land. (1 Eq. cases, Abr. 473,) If one agrees to sell lands he does not possess, he will be compelled to perform his agreement, should he afterwards acquire them, (2 Cha. cas. 112), a bill will lie for the specific performance of an award. (Wood v. Griffiths, 1 Swanst. 43.) It is to be observed, that where a party wishes to compel a specific performance by another, he must make his own part of the agreement precedent: also, that the Court will not in all contracts decree a specific performance. It is only where the party wants the thing in specie (2 Bro. C. C. 341), and where a legal remedy is inadequate or defective. (Flint v. Brandon, 8 Ves. 163.) And in cases where the Court usually will grant relief, the party filing a bill must come into court with "clean hands;" for he who seeks equity must do equity. Gross laches will sometimes prove a bar to relief (Newman v. Rogers, 4 Bro. C. C. 391). As the rule requires that the parties must be able and willing to contract, agreements, generally speaking, of married women, infants, and lunatics, will not be enforced: nor where one of the parties was intoxicated. The last part of the rule requires little comment; the terms should be explicit, and the consideration not inadequate or unconscionable.

Trusts.—These are a very fruitful source of Chancery business in a variety of manners. The infinite number of cases coming under this head precludes my giving it that degree of particular attention, which has been manifested in the former part of the subject. It is a general rule that a trust shall never fail of execution for want of a trustee; and, therefore, when property is bequeathed in trust, but no trustee appointed the Court, in the case of real estate, considers the heir-at-law as a trustee. In the case of personal estate, it considers the personal representative a trustee, and will see to the execution of the trust. (See White v. White, 1 Bro. C. C. 12.) The Court is frequently called upon to lend its aid in the execution of the provisions contained in marriage-settlements—to determine upon the extent to which the marital rights of the husband attach to the wife's separate property—to direct in what manner portions may be raised for younger children, and in various other matters of a similar nature to interpose its authority. Mortgages form another source of Chancery business. The principal occasions on which the attention of courts of equity is called to mortgages, is upon bills filed, 1. To redeem; 2. To foreclose; 3. In respect of equitable mortgages. Trusts created by deeds for the payment of debts, or of compositions for debts, are frequent, and courts of equity will assist in the enforcement of agreements for a composition obtained without fraud or misrepresentation. (1 Madd. 541.) The Court is often called upon to pronounce a decision upon the meaning of last wills, and otherwise to aid in carrying them into effect. It is not only with respect to trusts expressly declared by some instrument in writing that the Court will lend its aid, but it will enforce the execution of implied trusts. In regard to these, it is frequently called upon to render its assistance in the administration of assets, and with respect to legacies. As, for instance, by decreeing a distribution of a legacy among creditors; or by compelling a residuary devisee in trust of lands, or bill filed by creditors. When, from circumstances, it is deto remove a trustee, the proper course is to bring a bill for that purpose. Such are some of the most important subjects on which relief may be obtained by bill in Chancery: but, for more particular information respecting the same, I must refer your readers to the various books of practice.

6. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE OF AGREEMENTS.

Equity also compels the specific performance of agreements, and although this part of jurisdiction was in its origin built upon the foundation of a legal right, the law giving the title (Halsey Grant, 13 Ves. 76.) or rather a legal right to see the title completed, (Alley v. Deschamps, 13 Ves. 228.) yet to this right courts of law, who could only adjudge damages for non-performance, had not the means of giving effect (Harnett v. Yielding, 2 Sch. & Lef. 553.); but courts of equity interfered, and having long established their jurisdiction to this extent, did not stop here, but laid down another principle, now well settled, prohibiting the forms of law from being made the instruments of injustice, and therefore, as I observed in the beginning of my answer, when advantage is attempted to be taken of any accident or innocent mistake, rendering a strict and literal performance of contracts impossible; if the failure be not substantial, the courts of equity will interfere, though courts of law could give no relief, (Seton v. Slade, 7 Ves. 4.; Eaton v. Lyon, 3 Ves. 693.; Larnon v. Napper, 2 Sch. & Lef. 684).

By the Statute of Frauds, all parol agreements respecting any interest in or to arise out of real estate, except leases for terms not exceeding three years, are declared void. But courts of equity have long been accustomed to decide in contradiction of this express enactment. The example was set by the House of Lords in the case of Lester v. Foxcroft, (Colles, P. C. 108) where it was held to be against conscience to suffer a party who had entered and expended money on the faith of a parol agreement, to be treated as a trespasser, and for the other party in breach of his engagement (though it was merely verbal) to enjoy the advantage of the money so laid out, and it was ordered and adjudged that the agreement should be specifically performed. In this decision I need scarcely add is constantly relied upon as authority.

The only justification of an equitable decree in contradiction to the statute of frauds, is the furtherance of the great object which the legislature had in view when passing that statute. It is only when it would be a fraud in one of the parties to run from an agreement that parol evidence of its terms will be received (Savage v. Carroll, 1 Ball & B. 282), and that if sufficiently proved, its specific execution will be decreed (Lockey v. Lockey, Prec. in Cha. 519).

I have previously stated that a party injured by the non-performance of an agreement could obtain damages in a court of law for the injury; but equity gives a more complete remedy by compelling the party who is desirous of doing an injury to another, by refusal to perform an agreement, to do what in foro conscientiae he is bound to do. Relying on its own power to effect this equity considers what is contracted for a valuable consideration to be done as actually performed, (1 Fonb. Eq. tr. 419) and the property contracted to be dealt with, is affected with precisely the same consequences as it would have been, had the contract been bond fide executed. Thus A enters into a written contract to sell his land to B, but no conveyance is made, immediately after this contract is signed, A is in equity considered as a trustee of the estate for B, and B as a trustee of the purchase money for A. B is entitled to the rents and profits of the land; A to the interest of the money. In such circumstances the estate is vendible and devisable by B, and if he die intestate, it will descend to his heir at law. So money directed by a will to be laid out in the purchase of land, is in equity considered as land, and though the land be not purchased in the lifetime of the person intended to be benefited, it will not pass as personal estate under a bequest of all his personal property to a legatee.

The original foundation of decrees for specific performance was, that the damages which might be given in a court of law, would not compensate the party to that extent which he was entitled, nor would put him in so beneficial a situation as if the agreement had been carried into execution. On this ground the court, in a variety of cases, has refused to interfere, where from the nature of the case the damages must be commensurate with the injury sustained, (Errington v. Annesly, 2 Bro. c. ca. 341.; Flint v. Brandon, 8 Ves. Jr. 363, Mitf. pleadings, 109), as for instance in agreements for the purchase of stock, it being the same thing to the party where or from whom the stock is purchased, provided he receives the money that will purchase it. This shows what were the grounds on which courts of equity first interfered, but they have constantly held that a party coming into equity for a specific performance, must come with perfect propriety of conduct, otherwise they will leave him to his remedy at law (Harnett v. Yielding, 2 Sch. & Lef. 553). The decreeing a specific performance is a matter of discretion, but it is not an arbitrary nor a capricious discretion, but must be regulated upon grounds that will render it judicial.

I must observe, however, that in cases of agreements the doctrine I am now stating is only applicable to those founded on a bond fide consideration, and where the party seeking the assistance of the court has performed, or is willing to perform his part of the contract; there must also be a mutuality and certainty (1 Madd. C. P. 424) in the agreement, and no very great inadequacy in the price. A specific performance will not be obtained if the plaintiff has been guilty of gross laches, and has not evinced any anxiety or readiness to execute the agreement (Guest v. Homfray, 5 Ves. 818.; Ryle v. Swindels, 1 McClell. 519). And it may be stated as a general rule, that the assistance of the court would be refused in all cases where a specific performance would occasion a failure of justice, or be opposed to public policy, or any of those great ends for which the jurisdiction of equity itself was established (Powell v. Lloyd, 2 Y. & J. 372).

Lastly—I come to speak of Trusts. The form of a trust or second use gives the courts of equity an exclusive jurisdiction as to the subject matter of all settlements, and devises in that form, and of all the long terms (vide Legal Guide, vol. 3, 389) created in the present complicated mode of conveying property. This is a very ample source of jurisdiction, but the trust is governed by very nearly the same rules as would govern the estate in a court of law, if no trustee was interposed, and by a regular positive system established in the courts of equity, the doctrine of trusts is now reduced to as great a certainty as that of legal estates in the courts of common law (3 Bla. Com. 439).

It was owing to the statute of uses having, as it were, abolished from courts of law the cognizance of trusts, that the courts of equity interfered, and reduced them under its jurisdiction, and this as well as every other advance in the equitable jurisdiction was founded in justice only, because without the recognition and support which they received in equity, such trusts must have been inoperative, and hence it is that they are usually styled “creatures of equity,” and lie exclusively within its jurisdiction.

Trusts are either express or implied, and may be created of real or personal estate.

Express Trusts are made by deed or will, and the trustees are either formally designated by name or pointed out by some other circumstance, as the possession of an office. Implied Trusts are created by the construction which the courts put upon the words, acts, or situations of the parties. Executors and administrators are always, and heirs at law sometimes, considered as trustees by the court. If a trust is created by will, but no trustee is named, the heir at law will be held to be a trustee, so far as real estate is concerned, and the personal representative a trustee for the personal estate.

The difference between uses and trusts, since the statute, consists in the Court of Chancery adopting a contrary construction from that which prevailed at law with regard to uses, the difference is not in the principles or rules of decision but in the application of those principles.

If an estate is purchased in the name of one, but the money is paid by another, (unless the case be one of advancement), it is a trust in Equity, although there is no declaration in writing by the nominal purchaser, but unless it appear on the face of the purchase deed that such was the case, the proof of the fact must be very clear (Ryall v. Ryall, 1 Atk. 59—Groves v. Groves, 3 Y. & J. 171). If two take a conveyance of lands to themselves and their heirs, this is a joint tenancy, and by the jus accrescendi or right of survivorship, incidental to and inseparable from such tenancy, in case of the death of either the survivor would succeed to the whole; but if it appear that the purchase money was paid by the parties in equal proportions Equity will interfere and declare the survivor a trustee for the heirs of the deceased tenant as far as concerns his share (1 Eq. Ca. Abr. 291). Whenever a trustee, mortgagee, or tenant for life, gets an advantage either by being in possession or being the back of the cestui que trust mortgagor or remainder man he must not retain it for his own benefit but hold it in trust (Nesbitt v. Fredenick, 1 Ball and Bea. 46). If the executor of a mortgagee purchases the equity of redemption of the mortgaged estate in his own name with the money due on the mortgage and a small advance of his own money he will be considered in Equity as a trustee of the purchase for the benefit of the testator's estate, having credit in the accounts for the sum advanced out of his own funds, (Forbrooke v. Balguy, 1 Myl. & K. 231). If such a purchase were made without the application of any portion of the trust funds the decision might be different (Randall v. Russell, Mer. 190). Words of request, recommendation, or confidence are sufficient in a will to raise a trust, where the property to be given is certain, and the objects to whom it is to be given are certain, (Pierson v. Garnett, 2 Bro. c. c. 133—Cruwys v. Coleman, 9 Ves. 323).

HOUSE OF LORDS.—June 1.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE IN EQUITY.

On the order of the day being moved for going into committee upon the Administration of Jus-

the Bill, Lord Brougham declared his adherence to the opinions he had formerly given upon the subject, which were opposed to the large increase of judicial force which was proposed by the present bill. There had been, indeed, a great increase in the number of bills filed and petitions presented, which were the main sources of business in the courts of equity, but this increase had been occasioned by the clearing off of arrears between 1831 and 1834, by which the obstruction of justice which formerly existed was removed. The labour since the time of Lord Hardwicke had increased three-fold, so in proportion had the business increased. An arrear, however, still existed, but that was merely temporary; and it could, therefore, be unnecessary to appoint judges who, after having disposed of the arrear, would have but little else to do. There would, indeed, additional business transferred to the Court of Chancery from the Equity Exchequer Court, and there would be, doubtless, more delays when there was a certainty of a speedy decision upon their causes; but that increase could only be very small, in proportion to the number of additional judges which it was proposed to create. It had been asked, why was there not a board regularly sitting, to which the appellate jurisdiction should be confined? But it must be remembered, that if the members of this board were only judges of appeal, they would be comparatively less able to transact appeal business. If, on the other hand, the board was to be composed entirely of the judges of other courts, it followed that there could be no permanent sittings, and he was, therefore, of opinion that a board should be formed, to consist partly of those who, as judges of the inferior courts, had experience in matters of ordinary practice, and partly of men who should act only as judges of appeals, the great law officer of the Crown, of course, presiding over the court.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, after stating the great delay which suitors must unavoidably experience in the present state of the Court of Chancery, observed upon the great danger of a failure in justice when the judge had only in view the rapidity with which he could get through the causes. The time of the court was principally occupied by the hearings, and it was by the comparatively small number of these alone that Lord Hardwicke had been enabled to get through the business. The House had at present not only to provide for the arrear which now existed, but for the immense number of suitors who would resort to the court when they knew that their business would be speedily despatched. The details of the bill had been alluded to, but these he thought might be more profitably discussed in committee.

Lord LYNTHURST said, he was quite satisfied that the House could come to no satisfactory decision upon the bill, except by referring it to the consideration of a committee up stairs. One judge in addition would, at least, be necessary to dispose of the present arrears, and his only doubt was whether one judge only would be sufficient.

The LORD CHANCELLOR expressed his entire acquiescence in the motion for referring the bill to a select committee.

Lord DENMAN thought their Lordships were perfectly competent, after all the inquiries which had taken place upon this subject, at once to form an opinion as to the best remedy for an universally admitted evil without sending this bill to a committee upstairs. At all events, he hoped the committee would proceed with its inquiries forthwith, and report as speedily as possible. He had come, with great reluctance, to a full conviction that it was necessary to increase the judicial strength of the Court of Chancery, and the sooner that remedy was applied the better. A state of transition in courts of justice was one of the worst for the suitors that could possibly exist.

The bill was then referred to a select committee.

Lord LYNTHURST presented a petition from 410 solicitors of the city of London, praying that the bill might pass into a law, as far as related to the appointment of two additional judges, and the abolition of the equity jurisdiction of the Court of Exchequer; two petitions with a contrary prayer, as far as related to the Court of Exchequer, from a conveyancer of eminence, and some country solicitors; also petitions from various classes of officers in the Court of Exchequer, for compensation in case the equity side of the Exchequer should be abolished.

The petitions were referred to the committee on the bill.

Law Reports.

COURT OF CHANCERY.—May 27.

BUSINESS OF APPEALS from the VICE-CHANCELLOR and MASTER of the ROLLS.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said it had become indispensably necessary to lay down some general rule in cases where new evidence was offered on appeals against orders proceeding from the other branches of the court. They were, in fact, not appeal motions at all; and, though he would not refuse to hear them, they would henceforth be regarded as original motions, and instead of receiving precedence they would be postponed until all the appeals were disposed of.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.—MAY 22.

Sittings at Nisi Prius.

REGINA v. AHRENFELD AND OTHERS.

CONSPIRACY TO DEFRAUD a Merchant of goods by false representation of character.—INDICTMENT.

This was an indictment against four defendants, Ahrenfeld, Cussel, Lassel, and Scholefield, for conspiring together to induce Messrs. Rayleigh and Co., of Manchester, warehousemen, by false representations of the character and property of Lassel, to sell him £1,770. worth of goods on credit.

The defendants pleaded not guilty. Lassel had absconded.

It appeared that Lassel carried on the business of a merchant in Muscovy-court, Trinity-court, Trinity-square, and in the month of June, last year, sent his clerk, George Daniell, to Manchester, for the purpose of seeing Mr. Sichell, who held his dishonoured acceptance, to ask him not to mention the circumstance of the dishonour, and give Lassel an extension of the credit which he usually gave him. Daniell, when at Manchester, met Ahrenfeld, who was a Manchester warehouseman, and having told the object of his visit to Manchester, Ahrenfeld said he could him the names of several houses which would give Mr. Lassel credit, but he must not mention his (Ahrenfeld's) name. Ahrenfeld then mentioned among the different houses that of Rayleigh and Co., and Daniell on the following day called there and looked out goods to the amount of £2,000., and gave as references Mr. Sichell and Lees, Kershaw and Co., with whom Lassel had had dealings. Rayleigh and Co. required further references, and Daniell mentioned the name of Scholefield, who had long carried on a respectable business as a Manchester warehouseman in Watling-street, and a Mr. Brislaw (one of the witnesses for the prosecution, a teacher of languages). Mr. Goode, a partner in the house of Rayleigh and Co., accordingly came up to London and saw Scholefield, who it was alleged gave Lassel so excellent a character as to satisfy Mr. Goode of his respectability, and he agreed to furnish the goods. Mr. Goode then returned to Manchester, but his partner entertaining suspicions of Mr. Brislaw, Mr. Goode again came to London and saw Brislaw and Scholefield, and stated the suspicions of the firm. Ahrenfeld, who was in the habit of sending up goods to Scholefield, was then referred to, and he gave Brislaw a good character, and took Mr. Goode to Cussel, who also spoke well of Brislaw's means. It was finally arranged that Lassel and Brislaw should give bills for part of the value of the goods, which amounted to £1,770., and that Scholefield should give a bill at nine months' date for £590. The goods were then sent to Scholefield's warehouse. The circumstances then took place on which the case for the prosecution principally rested. On the day after the goods arrived, it was stated that Lassel and Brislaw called on Scholefield relative to them, and for a certain balance which was to come to them, it was alleged, by agreement. Scholefield then handed them a statement, by which it appeared he claimed to appropriate to himself the sum of £590., the amount of the bill he had given Rayleigh and Co.,—£300. odd; a debt which Lassel owed him, £500. odd for loss on the sale of the goods, and £100. odd which Brislaw owed, and five per cent. commission, and the balance of £120. he handed over to Lassel. It was supposed by Rayleigh and Co. that the goods were to be sent to Gibraltar; but instead of that, they were sold three days after they reached the warehouse of Scholefield, to Messrs. Fever and Cracknell, for £1,140. Scholefield paid his bill to Rayleigh and Co. for £590. He afterwards became a bankrupt, as did Ahrenfeld and Cussel, and Lassel absconded. Fever and Cracknell also became bankrupts. It was contended on the part of the prosecution that all the parties knew of the insolvent state of Lassel, and that they gave the false representation of his circumstances with the view of procuring payment of the debt which he owed to Scholefield, and also of the debts of Brislaw and Ahrenfeld, and evidence was given to show that Cussel when he gave the character to Brislaw, claimed to be paid out of the goods of Rayleigh and Co. the sum of £100. which Brislaw owed him.

The case for the prosecution was chiefly made out by Daniel Brislaw and Mr. Goode.

On the part of Scholefield, his warehouseman and clerk were called, and the former stated that Mr. Scholefield expressly told Mr. Goode that he could say nothing in favour of Lassel to induce him to give him credit, and also showed his books and a dishonoured check of Lassel's which he then held. They described Scholefield as in no way connected with any of the parties except in business, and that he had always carried on business in an honourable and respectable manner.

Several witnesses were called, who gave the defendants a good character, especially Mr. Scholefield, whom they said they had known some fifteen, and others twenty years, and they considered and always found him a man of the strictest integrity and honour.

LORD DENMAN told the jury if they thought the defendants had one common object in view—viz., by false representations to induce Rayleigh and Co. to part with the possession of the goods to Lassel, then the case was made out and they would return verdicts of guilty; if, on the other hand, they entertained doubts, they would, of course, give the defendants the benefit of them, and find them not guilty.

Guilty against all the defendants.

Sittings in Banco.*SAVORY v. CHAPMAN.*IN RE DAVIE v. CRESSWELL.

NEY AND CLIENT.—Whether the defendant should be allowed to defend himself having permitted the escape of a prisoner in his custody at the suit of a judgment creditor, on the ground that the plaintiff's journey in the original suit had authorized such release, the plaintiff himself having become a bankrupt after the time which the prisoner had been lodged in the custody of the defendant?

This was an action brought by the assignee of a bankrupt against the defendant, the marshal of Queen's Bench Prison, for having permitted the escape of a prisoner of the name of Cresswell, who had been in his custody at the suit of the bankrupt. In answer to the action the defendant pleaded as a justification, that he had discharged the prisoner under an authority from the attorney of the plaintiff in an action that had been brought by the bankrupt before his bankruptcy, in which he had obtained a judgment, for which Cresswell was charged in execution, and the bankrupt's attorney in that action remained upon the record. The replication back was that before Cresswell was discharged the plaintiff in the action against him had become bankrupt, and the plaintiff in this action was his assignee, and that consequently the authority of the attorney was revoked. To this there was a demurrer, which now came on for argument.

LORD DENMAN said, that the simple question was whether the defendant should be allowed to defend himself for having permitted the escape of a prisoner in his custody at the suit of a judgment creditor, on the ground that the plaintiff's journey in the original suit had authorized such release, the plaintiff himself having become a bankrupt after the time at which the prisoner had been lodged in the custody of the defendant. It appeared in some of the old books that the authority of the attorney for the plaintiff terminated with the judgment, and that the authority of the attorney for the discharge was enough. According to the later books it appeared that the authority of the attorney lasted for one year from the date of the warrant of attorney, and that he possessed the right to take the debtor in execution and detain him twelve months if the debt was not remain unsatisfied. In the present case it was thought sufficient had not been shewn to release the defendant from the duty of retaining and the responsibility of discharging the prisoner. The whole statement of the defendant was, that the attorney for the plaintiff had expressed a desire for the discharge of the prisoner, without the defendant saying forth either that the debt and costs had been satisfied, or the special authority of his client that such discharge should take place. If the defendant had been deceived on this occasion, it was most fortunate for him. The plea was, in reality, no answer, no defence, to the action; it did not amount to a sufficiency of justification. It had not been argued that the defendant would have been subject to an action for false imprisonment if he had detained the prisoner; but if that had been the consequence, and the defendant had been sued for false imprisonment, and it had been shewn on the trial that the original plaintiff himself had not authorized the discharge of the prisoner, then that action must have failed.

PATTERSON, J., concurred, and cited Mr. J. Holroyd's opinion in Corver v. Pillking and another (a), to show that the Marshal has a right to detain a prisoner to satisfy himself that the debt has been paid after an order of discharge left with him.

The other judges also concurred.

ATTORNIES EXECUTORS.—Whether a Bill of Costs delivered by the Executors of an Attorney, upon which he had brought no action, can be referred to the Master for taxation?

In this case the attorney for the lessor of the plaintiff had died. After his death his executor had delivered a bill of costs, and had obtained an order of LITTLEDALE, J. that it should be referred to the Master for taxation. A rule was obtained to shew cause why this order should not be rescinded, on the ground that the bill was not taxable, and that the Judge consequently had not the power to refer it for taxation.

Cause was now shown, and the following judgment was given by the court:—

PATTERSON, J.—The recent cases in all the courts have repudiated the notion of any general power in the courts to refer a bill for taxation, independently of the statute of Geo. 2. Clarkson v. Parker (a), takes the distinction between compelling an attorney to deliver a bill and referring such bill for taxation where there were no taxable items. The Court of Exchequer recently refused to refer a bill without taxable items, although an action had been brought on it. This brings me to the point, that the commencing of an action of itself does not give the court jurisdiction. Though in Curling v. Sedger, (b) the Common Pleas uses expressions seeming to lead to a different conclusion, (but there that bill was itself taxable); yet in Penson v. Johnson, (c) that Court ordered a bill, delivered by an executor of an attorney, after action, to be taxed,—altering their practice, which was otherwise, according to two cases in Barnes' Notes, by reason of the practice of the King's Bench. I do not think that it can fairly be collected from the cases that they proceeded upon the distinction of action or no action, but rather that they may be taken as authorities generally that such a bill may be taxed. However, it having been determined that the executor of an attorney is not within the statute 2 Geo. 2 as to delivering a bill a month before action, nor as to paying costs of taxation where more than one-sixth is taken off, which points are clear. I think that it should also be held that he is not within that statute for other purposes. (1)

(a) 4 Bairn. & Cress. 96.

Rule absolute.

The following cases were cited in the argument. Against the Rule:—Penton v. Johnson, 4 Taunton, 724; Dagley v. Kenlish, 2 Barn. & Adol. 411.

For the Rule:—Weston v. Poole, 2 Str. 1056; Gregg's case, 1 Salk. 89. In re Cole, 2 Sim. & Stu. 463.

(1) The question was decided by LORD COTTENHAM, C., in Maddeford v. Austwick, 3 Myl. & Cr. 423, which was an appeal from an order of the VICE-CHANCELLOR, who had made an order against the personal representatives of a deceased solicitor that the solicitor's bills of costs should be taxed under the 2 Geo. 2. c. 23. The LORD CHANCELLOR said, What is the use of a jurisdiction to tax, as against the representatives of a solicitor, if there is no power to compel payment? Such a jurisdiction would be perfectly nugatory, because, if the client comes in as a creditor, he must institute a suit for that purpose, and the court will not let him recover without having the state of the assets ascertained, as well as having the claim investigated. Sir John Leach has expressly decided, that the penal provision in the 23rd section of the Act, does not apply in the case of the executor, or administrator, or the assignees of a solicitor. Besides, I do not see how it is possible to work out the summary remedy, given by this order, in such a manner as to be consistent with the rights of other creditors.

The question is a very important one, and it seems singular that it should not have been raised before. It was not necessary to consider it, and in fact it was not raised in Waters v. Taylor, (2 Myl. & C. 526,) the party who then appealed asking relief upon that point. The order complained of must be discharged.—EDITOR.

LORD CAMOYS v. SCUR.

BAILMENTS—Whether where a person obtains a horse for trial, employs an experienced person to make the trial, and the horse runs away and is killed, the borrower is responsible for the value of the horse.

This was an action brought to recover damages to the amount of £47. 5s. the value of a horse of the plaintiff, which had been killed while in the care of the defendant, on trial, previous to an intended purchase. It appeared that in June, 1839, Lord Camoys bought the horse from Mr. Shackel for £57. 15s. On the 4th of January of the present year he sent it back to Shackel's to be sold, and the price fixed on it was £45. The defendant, who is a minister of the established church, and in every respect a good judge of the merits of a horse, took a liking to this, and on the 18th of January took it off for the purpose of becoming practically cognizant of its merits. He was not, however, satisfied with riding it himself, but entrusted it also to a groom of General Dyson, and that person so managed that it met with a severe accident in Hyde-park, the result of which was its speedy death.

Mr. Kelly for the plaintiff submitted that the defendant was to be considered as having the loan of the horse on this occasion, and he was not justified in permitting a third party to interfere with it, as had occurred in this instance. The case of Bringloe v. Morice (1) set that question quite at rest. Evidence was given on the part of the plaintiff that the horse was an excellent temper, by the horse dealer and his groom.

(a) 7 Dowl. 87.

(b) 4 Bing. N.C. 743.

(c) 4 Taunt. 724.

Mr. Platt, for the Rev. Mr. Scur, submitted his confidence to his lordship that in this case the defendant had the mare in his possession solely for the purposes of trial, and with that object in view had been justified in making use of the services of an experienced rider. The groom, whom he had allowed to ride the mare, was a favourite servant of General Dyson, and was noted as a skilful horseman. On the morning when the accident occurred, from which the action arose, Mr. Scur had taken out the mare to Mr. Shackel's, and had ridden it quietly to a wish-place, opposite the house of his friend, the general, but it had shewn considerable temper, and General Dyson had recommended him, for prudence-sake, to allow the groom to try it in the Park. He did so—the animal continued to display unquietness, and eventually ran away. The groom did all in his power to restrain it, but in vain, and it rushed against the posts of the gate near the gate-house at Hyde Park-corner, giving its rider several yards forward over its head, and severely injured its own chest. The man did not recover his senses for a considerable time, and would probably feel for the rest of his life the injuries he then received. The mare was led to the stable of a veterinary surgeon in Park-lane, where she shortly afterwards died. The quality in regard to temper had been wholly misrepresented, and had the defendant been on her back instead of the groom when she ran away, it was probable that his life also would have been sacrificed.

Hobart, the groom of General Dyson, deposed that the mare showed an irritable temper from the moment that he saw her. When he mounted at his master's recommendation and Mr. Scur's request, he rode her partly walking and partly in a trot to the park. Then as he went towards the gate-house, she shied at a carriage and ran. He exerted all his energies to stop her, but was unable. He tried to turn her head up the ring-road, and afterwards up the line to Kensington Barracks, but still without effect. She rushed up against the metal post of the fence at the gate-house, and he was thrown violently from her head. He was thoroughly stunned, and coming to himself found that the mare had been taken away.

The groom in the service of Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, who happened to be near the catastrophe occurred, and also the gate-keeper of the park, saw the mare and groom as they came along, and agreed in deposing that the courage and judgment displayed by the latter in his endeavour to keep the animal on a safe path had been conspicuous.

General Dyson deposed that the Rev. Mr. Scur was on a visit at his house at the time when the transaction occurred. He saw his friend on the mare. He rode her several times up and down before his house. She appeared to be hot and very difficult to manage. He thought his friend was not competent safely to try her powers. He recommended the latter to assign that task to his groom, Hobart. This man had been in his service for several years. He was an admirable horseman. When down at Cheltenham, Hobart had distinguished himself by riding a celebrated Irish horse, remarkable for its power of jumping.

COLERIDGE, J. left it for the counsel for the plaintiff to consider whether they could go further after this evidence. He did not go with them in their view of the law as applicable to the case. The defendant had had the horse upon trial, and it would seem that the most careful trial was to be effected, not by himself alone, but by his putting on the back of the animal a man of well-known powers as an equestrian. The only question he could put to the jury was, whether the defendant had been right in allowing the groom to ride, and he would tell them that, in his opinion, he had been.

(1) 1 Mod. Rep. 210.; 3 Salk, 271. S. C. where an action of trespass for immoderately riding the plaintiff's horse. The defendant pleaded, that the horse was lent to him by the plaintiff, and license given to him to ride him, and that by virtue of the license the defendant, and his servants, alternately had ridden the animal. The plaintiff demurred. And the Court, on the demurrer, held, that the license was annexed to the person of the defendant, and could not be communicated to another for this riding was matter of pleasure. And Lord CHIEF JUSTICE NORTH took a difference, where a certain time is limited for the loan of a horse, and where not. In the 1st case the borrower has an interest in the horse during that time, and in that case his servant may ride; but in the other case not. A difference was also taken between hiring a horse to go to York, and borrowing a horse. In the first place the party may allow his servant to ride; in the second not. The case is obscurely reported. But the real meaning of the Court seems to have been, that in cases of a mere gratuitous loan, the use is to be deemed strictly a personal favour, and confined to the borrower, unless a more extensive use can be implied from other circumstances.—EDITOR.

GRAHAM v. BUNN.

HUSBAND and WIFE.—Liability of the Husband to the Father of his Wife for the expense of her support, after an agreement that the Father should receive her back to his own house in case of her misconduct.

This was an action by the father of the defendant's wife to recover 45 weeks' board and lodging, supplied her at 12s. per week. It appeared that the plaintiff was formerly a publican, but had retired, and now resided at Edmonton: the defendant was a publican in the Kingsland Road. In 1835, the latter married Mr. Graham's daughter, with whom he lived until May, 1839. During that time he had treated his wife with great cruelty. On one occasion it was stated that he beat her violently on the face, and that she had repeatedly marks of blows given her by the defendant. At length, in May, her clothes were packed up, and Bunn ordered her out of the house, and compelled her to go to her father. The latter had since then supported her.

The case for the defendant was, that Mrs. Bunn was given to habits of intemperance, which had previously induced him to separate from her. He, however, again consented to live with her, on her promise to abandon those habits, an arrangement being at the same time made that the father would receive her back to his own house, if she resumed her intemperate mode of life. She did return, but having recurred to her former habits, the husband was obliged to take her from his own house to her father's.

TINDAL, C. J., said, that the question was whether there had been such violence on the part of the husband as had been alleged by the plaintiff; or whether he had turned her out of his house against her will. If such had been the case, the verdict must be for the plaintiff. But if an agreement had been entered into between the parties, to the effect that the father was to take her back if she returned to her habits of intemperance, the defence was an answer to the action.

Verdict for the plaintiff—damages, £27.

SEMPLE v. TURNER.

WRIT of ERROR, CORAM VOBIS.—Whether a Supersedeas of Execution without leave of the Court.

Mr. Mellor moved for a rule to show cause why a writ of Ca. sa., and all proceedings thereon, should not be set aside.

The defendant had sued out a writ of error coram vobis; notice of which was served on the plaintiff, who, nevertheless, obtained a judge's order to issue execution, and the defendant was arrested. In Levy v. Price, (a) it was determined that a writ of error coram vobis is a supersedeas of execution from the time of notice and not merely from the time of the allowance of it.

ALDERSON, B.—A writ of this kind is no supersedeas, but it is necessary to apply to the court to engraft upon it the leave to issue execution; it is unreasonable that the plaintiff should have the power to issue execution after a writ of error coram vobis had been sued out, and consequently while a question is depending, by the decision of which his right of action may be destroyed altogether. That is stated by Lord Ellenborough in Birch v. Triste, (b) as the principle on which the practice proceeds.

Whether they may maintain an action for costs where they have not entered the Certificate according to 37 Geo. 3. c. 80. s. 27.

The plaintiff, an attorney, brought his action against the defendant for a bill of costs. The defendant pleaded that as to part of the demand it was for work done before the 16th of November, 1833; and that although during that time the plaintiff was an attorney, duly admitted and enrolled, yet he had not, during any part of that time when the work was done or in progress, obtained or entered the certificate required by law in that behalf, authorizing him to practise as such attorney during any part of that time, pursuant to the statute; and the plaintiff during that time wrongfully and wilfully neglected to take out and obtain, and was without such certificate, and never had obtained or entered the same, contrary to the form of the statute. His replication, that before and during all the time in the plea mentioned, the plaintiff had duly obtained the certificate required by law in that behalf, authorizing the plaintiff to practise as an attorney during the whole of that time, pursuant to the statute, &c. To this was a demurrer, that the replication only stated that the certificate had been obtained, and took no notice of the allegation in the plea that it had not been entered.

ed the 37 Geo. 3, c. 90, s. 27, and contended that therefore the replication was bad.

Mr. Peacock contended that the only effect not entering a certificate is to subject the party a penalty, but does not prevent him suing for fees.

PARKE, B.—The statute expressly says that shall not maintain any action, without obtaining and entering his certificate. The plea is clearly double: it contains two distinct defences, namely, that the plaintiff either has not obtained a certificate at all, or, if he has, that it has not been entered pursuant to the statute.

Mr. Peacock cited Bowler v. Brown. (a)

PARKE, B.—The Court of Queen's Bench decided that case, on the supposition that the words "with the intent to evade the higher duty" overrode the whole clause. That decision however, somewhat doubtful. In declaring a reversion, the nature and existence of the reversion would frequently involve difficult questions of law; yet, in pleading, it is not necessary to state the precise nature of the reversion which the plaintiff had. The question in the case is, whether the omission to enter a certificate in answer to an action for business done at any time during the year to which the certificate applies? Upon these pleadings, we must assume, that if the business was done in one year, between the 15th of November and the 15th of November, there was a certificate duly obtained, and never entered; if in two or more years there were two or more certificates, but each omitted to be entered; and the question is, whether the omission to enter a certificate deprives the plaintiff of his remedy by action for business done in any part of the year. If there be a part of a year, during which the plaintiff might do business in the conduct of suits lawfully, so as to make a legal contract for payment of his services, without having duly entered his certificate, the plea is bad in substance, so far as it relates to the not entering the certificate, inasmuch as it is not aver that the business was not done in any part of the year or years embraced in the general terms of the declaration. And upon a candid review of the statutes on the subject, which raises a question of some nicety, we think that it was not illegal, in this sense, for a certificated attorney to carry on a suit between the 15th of November and the first day of Hilary Term in any year without having entered his certificate; though he would have been liable to a penalty, after having so carried it on during a part, he might not enter his certificate before the expiration of that interval. The first statute requiring a certificate was the 25 Geo. 3, c. 80, which acts, "that every attorney admitted or enrolled in the King's Courts at Westminster, shall, previous to his prosecuting or defending any suit, have a certificate of his admission or enrolment, upon which a stamp duty is to be charged." In order to obtain it, he is to deliver a written paper, stating his place of residence, to the proper officer, named in the 4th section of the statute, which written paper is to be duly stamped, according to his place of residence; and the officer is to enter the name, &c. of each attorney producing such paper, and to subscribe to the paper a certificate that such attorney is duly enrolled. These certificates are to remain in force from the 1st of November to the 1st of November, and be renewed ten days before they expire. By sect. 7, any one who shall sue out any writ, or prosecute or defend an action for reward, without having obtained such certificate, shall forfeit £50.; and is disabled from suing for any fee or reward for prosecuting or defending such action. Under this statute, the entry was of the name and residence, and preceded the certificate; and all practising without a certificate was not merely subject to a penalty, but no remuneration could be recovered for it. The 37 Geo. 3, c. 90, s. 26, completely changes the machinery for obtaining the stamp duty; and requires the certificate to denote the fact of payment of the duties and not of enrolment, and to be given by the commissioners of stamps; and after it has been obtained, makes it necessary that it shall be entered with the officer of the court mentioned in the 25 Geo. 3. The time for taking it out is varied. It is provided, that every attorney, admitted and enrolled, shall, annually, between the 1st of November and the end of Michaelmas Term then next following, during such time as he shall continue to practise, or before such person shall commence, prosecute, or defend any action or suit, obtain a certificate to denote the payment of duties. The certificate, to be issued between those dates, is to bear date on the 2nd of November; and at every other time, on the day when it is issued; and is to determine on the 1st of November. Those days are afterwards, by 54 Geo. 3, c. 144, altered to the 15th of November and 16th of December. The 27th section provides, that every certificate shall be entered within the time thereinbefore prescribed (viz. between the 1st of November and the end of Michaelmas Term), or before such person shall be permitted to practise; and by the stat. 44 Geo. 3, c. 59, s. 3, this part of the 37 Geo. 3, is repealed; and it is provided, that any person who by that act, 37 Geo. 3, is required to obtain such certificate in any year after the first day of November, may enter the same at any time before the commencement of Hilary Term then next following; and the certificate so entered shall be as valid as if it had been entered within the former time. The 30th section imposes the penalties for non-compliance with the previous enactments. If any one shall prosecute or defend without obtaining a certificate, or without entering the same, he shall forfeit £50.; and is made incapable of maintaining any action or suit for fees, &c., for prosecuting or defending any suit, without such certificate as aforesaid. The question in the case depends on the construction of these clauses, the 30th and 27th. The 30th does not use the terms "without having entered his certificate, or without such certificate so entered as aforesaid"; it prohibits the suit for fees, only if there is no certificate. It does not use the language of the 25 Geo. 3, without having obtained a certificate; and probably for this reason, that, under that statute, the certificate was required to be obtained before any business was done. Under this, the business may be done between the 1st of November and the end of Michaelmas Term, and the certificate antedated, so as to render it legal; but it seems, that unless there be a certificate obtained before, or so antedated, the action could not be maintained, in respect even of business done in that interval. It appears to us that this prohibitory clause applies to the want of certificate only. Is the practice, then, rendered illegal by the 27th section, so as to disable the attorney from suing for it? Every practising which is prohibited by penalty at the time it takes place is illegal; but that which is not prohibited at the time it takes place, is not—though the attorney be liable to a penalty for a subsequent neglect or omission. The 27th section inflicts the penalty upon an attorney for not entering, which must be either within the time aforesaid (that is now between the 1st of November and the first day of Hilary Term), or before such attorney shall be permitted to practise. Now, in all cases falling within the second branch of this alternative, by which the practice is prohibited, unless there be not only a certificate but an entry thereof, before it takes place, it is clear that the practice is unlawful without entry, and no action will lie to recover a compensation for it; but in the cases falling within the first branch, it appears that it is enough to make the entry before the end of the limited time. In the meantime the practice is lawful; a contract to pay the price is lawful; the price may be sued for the instant it is due; and the want of the subsequent entry cannot render it illegal by relation; but if at the end of the prescribed time for entry there is no entry, then the attorney is liable to a penalty. It appears to us that the business done between the 15th of November and the first day of Hilary Term falls within the latter alternative; any business done at any other time of the year, within the former.

And the plea is bad, as it does not show that the business was of this description; for it is consistent with every averment in the plea, that the business was done between the 15th of November and the first day of Hilary Term, in one or more years.

PREROGATIVE COURT—JUNE 1.

WILL OF RICHARD HILLIER, DECEASED.

NEW WILL ACT—ATTESTATION CLAUSE.

Mr. Richard Hillier, the deceased, two days before his death, executed a will, which purported to be regularly attested by two witnesses, who professed to have signed their names in the presence of the deceased. Some irregularity on the face of the paper induced the Registrar (in conformity with the order of the court) to require an affidavit of the circumstances, when it appeared that the drawer of the will had taken the will away after it had been signed by the deceased, attested it in his absence, and obtained the signature of the other attesting witness, who never saw the deceased at all, believing (as he stated) that the attestation clause was a mere form.

Upon motion for probate being made,

Sir H. JENNER expressed much surprise at the conduct of the witnesses, which but for a mere accident would have procured probate of a paper that had no validity. He rejected the paper, and regretted that the Court could not punish the drawer of the will by condemning him in the costs.

Probate refused.

INSOLVENT DEBTORS' COURT—May 27.

CASE OF HORATIO HASTINGS.

Insolvent out upon Bail, and not appearing at the day appointed for his hearing.—To what extent the recognisance of the Bail shall be put in force, and in what manner the money may be obtained.

We have before reported this case, (a) which embraced an important question as to the jurisdiction of the Court to issue a distress warrant against the bail of an insolvent, who neglected to appear at the day appointed for his hearing.

The insolvent had been a tailor in High-street, Poplar, and was, on the 18th of April, admitted to bail on a recognisance entered into by Mr. Sunderland, a woollen warehouse-man, and Mr. Bruce, a licensed victualler, in the sum of £100. The insolvent did not make his appearance on the 1st May, and it was soon afterwards ascertained that he had absconded; he was pursued by Mr. Bruce, accompanied by one of the clerks.

(a) Ante, p. 29.

Mr. W. R. Buchanan, of Basinghall-street, attorney for the bail (who had been attorney for the insolvent in the court), into Staffordshire, as he was not discovered, nor had he been heard of by the sureties. The affidavit read on the part of the bail showed the efforts made to capture the insolvent on a warrant issued by the Court for his apprehension, and placed in their hands. An affidavit made by a person named Beason exposed some curious disclosures respecting the arrest and the concealment of property. It was contended that the arrest by the detaining creditor had been collusive, and that the alleged creditor, who had been paid a sum of money, brought the insolvent on one occasion a schedule, which he would initiate him in the art of "schedule making." The Court, in addition to the warrant, granted a rule on the sureties to show cause why the recognisance should not be put in force for the sum stated.

It was contended by Mr. Woodroffe, on the part of the sureties, that the Court would not enforce the recognisance for more than the single amount, as had been the usual practice in the inferior courts. It was also contended that the Court had the power to fix the sum after the recognisance had been taken.

Mr. Cooke, on the part of the assignee, called on the Court to obtain the amount entered into the sureties on the recognisance, and urged that they had no power, under the 38th section, and 2 Vic., c. 110, to alter the amount from the sum fixed at the time bail was given; and, further, that there was no analogy between the case in this and the superior courts, the amount to be recovered being for the benefit of the whole of the creditors in the schedule.

Mr. Commissioner BOWEN thought it would be a gross injustice on the sureties if the Court had not the power to fix the amount to be recovered after the insolvent had disappeared.

The CHIEF COMMISSIONER said, the question in this case was, to what extent the recognisances could be put in force, and in what manner the money should be obtained. The question turned on a part of the 38th section, by which it was provided, that in case any insolvent who had been discharged on sureties should not appear on the day fixed for his hearing (not being prevented by illness, or other lawful impediment), the recognisance entered into should be forfeited, and the amount secured thereby should be recoverable in summary way, by a distress and sale of the goods of the sureties, as the Court should direct. The Court, on consideration, were of opinion, that as the recognisance was declared on the non-appearance of the insolvent to be forfeited, that they had no power to alter the amount, and consequently the sureties in this case must pay the sum of £164 for the benefit of the creditors. The Court would, therefore, order the warrant to be issued for a distress to the amount of £164 (payable by the two sureties), but it should remain some days in the office, as it was understood the money would be paid. The sum to be recovered was £164.

Mr. Commissioner BOWEN remarked, that in his great anxiety to relieve the bail he had, on the argument of the rule, taken a wrong view of the subject. He now concurred in the opinion delivered.

Mr. Cooke applied for costs, and said a good deal of property had been recovered.

Mr. Woodroffe observed that some of the debts in the schedule had been fabricated, and it was believed that a portion of the money to be paid by the bail would be returned after the bond fide creditors had been paid.

The COURT thought the expenses should be allowed, and the assignee had better apply for them on the audit.

The warrant was ordered to issue, but to remain in the office until Friday, 12th June, by which time it was said the bail would pay into court the sum of £164.

THIS COURT IS ADJOURNED until THURSDAY, JUNE 11.

THE ATROCIOUS ATTEMPT TO ASSASSINATE HER MAJESTY. ADDRESS OF BOTH HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.

WE consider it a duty we owe to the SOVEREIGN of these realms to express our horror and indignation at the atrocious and treasonable attempt made on Wednesday last upon the LIFE of HER MAJESTY, as well as upon that of Her MOST TRUSTED CONSORT, which, by the aid of DIVINE PROVIDENCE, was happily frustrated. We sincerely join in the universal expression of congratulation to Her Majesty and to Her Royal Consort that they have escaped the danger intended for them by the assassin.

L. IV.

The following is the Address agreed upon yesterday (we are writing on Friday) by the two Houses of Parliament, and which is now being presented to Her Majesty:—

“We, your Majesty’s most dutiful and loyal subjects, the lords spiritual and temporal in Parliament assembled, beg leave to approach your Majesty’s throne to express our horror and indignation at the late atrocious and treasonable attempt against your Majesty’s sacred person, and our heartfelt congratulations to your Majesty, and to our country, on your Majesty’s happy preservation from so great a danger; to express to your Majesty the deep concern which we feel at there having been found within your Majesty’s dominions a person capable of so flagitious an act; and that we make it our earnest prayer to ALMIGHTY GOD that he will preserve to us the blessings which we enjoy under your Majesty's just and mild government, and continue to watch over a life so justly dear to us."

ESSAY.

ON THE ENGLISH LAW OF BAILMENTS.

WE have closed our observations upon the second class of LORD HOLT'S Bailments—commodatum, or lending gratis, and will now proceed to the third class—Locatio rei, or lending for hire, defined by his Lordship, "Where goods are lent to the bailee to be used by him for hire." This the Roman law called locatio and locatio-conductio,<sup>(a)</sup> which may be thus defined:—Locatio-conductio est contractus quo de re fruendâ vel faciendâ pro certo pretio convenit<sup>(b)</sup>, or as defined by POTHIER, a contract by which one of the contracting parties allows the other to enjoy or use the thing hired during the stipulated period, for a compensation which the other party engages to pay.<sup>(c)</sup> Locatio (letting) and conductio (hiring) are in fact equivalents, distinguishing the relative situation of different parties to the same contract. Locator in the civil law, and locateur louer, or bailleur, in the French law, is defined as being a person who, being owner of a chattel, lets it out to another for hire or compensation. Conductor in the civil law, and conducteur, prenuer, locataire in the French law, is defined as being a person who borrows, and has the use of, the chattel, and pays a compensation for the hire.<sup>(d)</sup>

There is a great nicety in the Latin language in making use of the words locator and conductor, which is particularly noticed by Sir Wm. Jones,<sup>(e)</sup> as well as by Heinecius.<sup>(f)</sup> The employer who gives the reward is called locator operis (the letter of the work); but conductor operarum (the hirer of the labour and services), while the party employed, who receives the pay, is called locator operarum (the letter of the labour and services) but conductor operis (the hirer of the work), and this nicety is felt by the poverty of the English language (tongue),<sup>(g)</sup> though not to any very great extent. There are three things which constitute the essence of this contract,<sup>(h)</sup> viz. :—

Thirdly—A contract possessing a legal obligation.

In this class of bailments LORD HOLT says the bailee is bound to use the utmost care.

Bracton<sup>(i)</sup> says the hirer is to take all imaginable care, and to restore it at the time and he is bound to the utmost diligence, such as the most diligent master of a family uses, which care if he so useth he shall not be bound. Bacon, in observing upon this passage,<sup>(k)</sup> says now the most diligent man liable to be robbed, and therefore I collect that if he be so careful, as according to Bracton's definition, and be robbed, he shall not be liable. The doctrine of Bracton copied from Justinian,<sup>(l)</sup> when speaking of a hirer—"Talis ab eo desideratur custodia qualem diligentissimus paterfamilias in rebus adhibet," which doctrine was, as stated in the Proeme to the Institutes, taken from the Commentaries of GAIUS, who, in treating of the liability of a person employed to transport a column for breakage, says, "Culpa autem abest si omnia facta sint."

diligentissimus quisque observaturus fuisse." (m) SIR WM. JONES urges that the superlative "diligentissimus" is used alone by LAECIUS, on the subject of hiring, other writers using the positive, and he ascribes it to his peculiar style. (n) GOTHOFRED(o) and VINCENTIUS(p) use the word "diligens."

POTHIER says, in every case the hirer is bound to prove that the loss was without any fault on his part, for the law makes no presumption in his favour. And in case of loss by fire, if the fire is in the house of the hirer, he seems to think that that circumstance alone raises a presumption of negligence. (q) The French law throws the burthen of proof upon the hirer of leased property to show that the loss has not been by default: and it makes him responsible for losses occasioned by fire, unless the fire be by inevitable casualty or superior force, communicated by the burning of a neighbouring house. (r)

The Scotch law throws the burthen of proof upon the hirer, where any specific injury has occurred not manifestly accidental. The expression of LORD HOLT that the hirer is bound to use the utmost care is too strong, for it would place a hirer who pays for the use of the goods on the same footing as a borrower; (s) and, indeed, Lord Holt defines it by citing immediately after the passage in Bracton we have before quoted, being copied from Justinian, in whose words Sir Wm. Jones proves that it must have been used to signify not extreme but ordinary diligence. The bailment of hiring (locatio-conductio) being mutually beneficial, it is contrary to principle to require the same extraordinary care as from a borrower, who has the chattel solely for his own benefit. This rule was adopted in Dean v. Keate, (t) where the diligence required from the hirer of a horse was such as a prudent man would have exercised towards his own, and therefore having himself prescribed to it instead of calling in a veterinary surgeon, he was held responsible. (u) The same distinction is laid down by HUBER:—"Contractus vel ineuntur in utriusque commodum vel in alterutrius utilitatem duntaxat. Qui utriusque partis utilitatem continent mediocri diligentia contenti sunt, levemque culpam recipiunt; qui unius saltem commodum spectant, hi vel continent utilitatem ejus qui de damno queritur, vel in ejus gratiam initi fuere qui damnum fecit. Priori casu nil nisi lata culpa præstatum posteriore levissima." (v)

This leads us to enquire upon whom, in England, the burthen of proof of negligence or of repelling it is thrown. We have shewn the rule laid down by POTHIER—the French and the Scotch law. A case occurred in England where an action was brought by a bailor (letter) against a bailee (hirer) for not taking proper care of a hired horse, whereby his knees were broken. (w) The burthen of proof was thrown upon the bailor, to give some positive evidence of negligence. It was held that it was not enough for him to prove that the animal was returned by the hirer with his knees broken, although he had often been let out to hire before without having fallen down.

(w) Cooper v. Barton, 4 Campb. 5, n. The following note is appended to that case: "In Coggs v. Bernard it is laid down by Lord HOLT, that if goods are let out for a reward, the hirer is bound to the utmost diligence, such as the most diligent father of a family uses; and in Bull, N. P. 72, it is said, that the hirer is to take all imaginable care of the goods delivered to hire. According to this doctrine, he would be answerable for slight negligence. But on a review of all the authorities upon the subject, it will be found that this extraordinary care is required only of a borrower, and that from the true construction of the contract of locatio conductio rei, the hirer is required to use no more than that degree of diligence which prudent men, that is the generality of men, use in keeping their own goods. If Caius, therefore, hire a horse, he is bound to ride it as moderately and treat it as carefully as any man of common discretion would ride and treat his own horse. See Jones on Bailm. 86."

According to this it would seem that, with certain exceptions as to innkeepers and carriers (x) in ENGLAND, the burthen of proof of negligence is on the bailor, and proof merely of the loss is not sufficient to put the bailee on his defence. LE BLANC, J. said in the case last quoted, the plaintiff must give some evidence of negligence, and as he had given none he must be nonsuited; and the same rule was held in a case against a depositary for hire, where the goods bailed were stolen by the hirer's servants. (y) There are, however, some discrepancies in the authorities upon this. (z)

PROBLEM VII. VOL. IV.

POSSESSIO FRATRIS. Describe it.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LEGAL GUIDE.

ANSWER TO PROBLEM 25. VOL. 3. BY E. A.

The whole jurisdiction of Courts of Equity in the administration of a deceased person's assets is founded on the principle, that an executor or administrator who has the property in his hands is a trustee, and as such bound to apply that property first in discharge of the debts due and owing from the deceased, and the surplus according to the will, or in the case of intestacy according to the statute of distributions. The sole ground on which Equity proceeds in matters of this kind is the execution of a trust, and the cases on the subject shew that trusts are enforced, not only against those persons who are possessed of trust property, as original trustees, but also against all persons who come into possession of the property bound by the trust with notice of that trust (Adair v. Shaw, 1 Sch. & Lef. 262. Ripley v. Waterworth, 7 Ves. 452. Chambers v. Minchin, 7 Ves. 197).

(x) Bennett v. Mellor, 5 Term Rep. 273.

(z) See Harris v. Puckwood, 3 Taunt. 264. Marsh v. Horne, 5 Barn. & C. 322.

Under this head, I hope it will not be irregular to notice trusts for the separate use of a feme covert, which are peculiarly within the jurisdiction of the courts of equity. In this court a married woman has for more than a century past been considered as capable of possessing to her own use, independent of her husband; such property is called her separate estate, and in respect of it she is considered in this court as a feme sole, enjoying and capable of exercising her right as such. The property may be acquired either by contract with the husband before the marriage, or by gift from him or any stranger, wholly independent of such contract, so far as his legal right as husband may interfere. The court will treat him as a trustee, and property held by or for the wife for her separate use, if unaccompanied by any restraint, is subject to her power of alienation and the other incidents of property held by men or single women (Legal Guide, Vol. 3, 225). The law on this subject has been much disturbed of late, much litigation and expence, and, I may say, needless expence occasioned, for the result of the whole has been to decide what was settled long before and undisputed, viz.:—That it is lawful to give property to the separate use of a woman married or unmarried; and the practice of the profession has been according to this rule, without any variation (Id. 258). I shall neither trouble you nor your readers any further on this all-important subject, but refer to the preceding volumes of this most useful publication, where from experience I can state that the subject is elaborately, clearly, and amply treated of.

The Courts of Equity, when a trust is once created, assumes as it were to itself a power of seeing that it is enforced; for, if trustees either expressly named or merely implied refuse to take the trust upon them, it devolves to the court, and it appoints a proper person to fill the office. This part of equitable jurisdiction gives rise to the maxim "That a trust shall not fail for want of a trustee" (1 Mad. Chy. 459). The general rules of equity in regard to trusts bear very hard upon the trustee, the office is considered an honorary one and cannot be made one of emolument any further than is expressly provided for in the instrument creating the trust (2 Fen. 176). He may carry on the trade of his testator, nothing will be allowed him in return for the time and labour he has bestowed upon it (16 Ves. 170). He is besides liable for any losses justly attributable to his negligence, caprice, or obstinacy. As when trustees lend money upon personal security, which is no security at all, and in such a case as that the court would deal with the trustees as if they had the money in their own pockets (per Sir L. Shadwell, V.C. in Dalton v. Hobhouse and another; 1 Legal Guide, 390; see also Argu- aris, 2 Legal Guide, 308) ; and where persons undertake to be trustees they are not entitled to it with caprice, but if they find the trust property involved in complicated questions which they did not contemplate when they undertook the trust, they have a right to come to the court for relief, and it will judge of the circumstances. Greenwood v. Wakeford, 2 Leg. Guide, 372) at where the trust funds have been misapplied placed in an insecure state through the instrumentality of the cestui que trust the court will afford relief to the trustees (White v. Smith, Id.). On the other hand a trustee is entitled to be reimbursed for all such charges and expences have been fairly incurred in the execution of trusts, and the courts are now less severe than formerly in cases of loss where no dishonest intention is suspected, lest an over severity in such matters should deter men from accepting so useful but at the same time so dangerous and riskless an office. But one trustee shall not be answerable for the acts or defaults of his co-trustee, either a proviso to that effect be inserted in the final settlement or not (see vol. 3, 379). Trusts then are peculiarly within the jurisdiction of Equity. Its vigilance is ever on the watch, and its powers are always available to obtain the full complete execution of the objects of the trust, to secure to those intended to be benefited all the advantages designed for them, and to compel those in whom confidence has been reposed to render an account of their stewardship, as well as to punish those by making them liable for neglect, &c., who have performed the trust undertaken in an unworthy manner.

We have now touched upon the relief to be obtained by bill in Chancery, under the distinct heads of accident, accounts, fraud, infancy, misfeasance, specific performance, and trusts as proposed by introductory observations in the beginning of my answer ; but as you are pleased to admit that the subject is worthy of consideration, and that you will agree with me that it is to be treated as one of great importance, I will, before concluding it, briefly state a few of the subjects which are triable in that court, which I have not reduced to any of those heads. They will be found to consist of fourteen sorts,—the first of which is Lunacy. 2. Charities, over which the Chancellor, as keeper of the King's conscience, has the general superintendence.—In matters of bankruptcy,—for, although by 11 Geo. 2 W. 4, c. 56, a distinct Court of Bankruptcy was erected, yet from that court an appeal lies to the Lord Chancellor on matters of law and equity, or on the refusal or admission of evidence.

4. Partnership and mercantile transactions of merchants, factors, and agents. 5. The Court of Chancery has a concurrent jurisdiction in matters of dower, and will act in aid of an admitted legal title, (Mundy v. Mundy, 2 Ves. Jr. 129). 6. It restrains a defendant from committing waste by felling timber or pulling down buildings, ploughing meadows or ancient pastures, or from obstructing ancient lights, &c.—7. It restrains parties, in whose names stock is standing in the books of the Bank of England from selling out or transferring such stock.—8. Bills are filed to redeem mortgaged estates. 9. Also to foreclose or bar a mortgagor from all equity of redemption. 10. Every bill in Chancery to which an answer is required is in one sense a “ bill of discovery ;” but that which is usually called a bill of discovery is not filed for the purpose of obtaining any relief from the Court of Equity, but merely for a discovery of facts within the knowledge of the other party, or of deeds or writings, or other things in his custody or power, and the discovery is most frequently sought for to enable the party requiring it to prosecute or resist an action at law brought by him against the party from whom the discovery is required, or against him by that party,—the knowledge obtained from a party by a bill of discovery may be read against him in an action of law, (Gray's C.C. Pract. 69.) 11. Where a party is desirous of preserving the evidence of witnesses touching a matter which cannot be immediately investigated in a court of law, or where he is likely to be deprived of the evidence of a material witness by his death, or departure from the realm, before the questions on which it will be material can be investigated, the course is to file a bill in perpetuam rei memoriam, or to perpetuate the testimony of witnesses, (Id. 71). 12. Bills of partition are filed by one joint tenant, co-partner or tenant in common against the other or others, to compel a division of the estate so held by them, in order that each may hold his or her share in severalty. 13. A bill must be filed, before a party having an equitable demand, can obtain a writ, ne exeat regno, against his debtor ; and, 14. Bills called injunction bills, are also frequently filed to restrain a defendant from pirating the plaintiff's copyright or infringing his patent.

I shall close my answer to this problem with a few remarks on the nature, usefulness, and jurisdiction of the Courts of Equity as at present established, for the prevention of fraud, the remedy of injuries, the enforcement of good faith, and for the protection of those who from infancy, the loss of their senses, or any other cause whatsoever, are unable to manage their own concerns.

Equity, then, in its true and genuine meaning, is the soul and spirit of all law. Positive law is construed, and rational law is made by it. In this equity is synonymous to justice, in that to the true sense and sound interpretation of the rule, natural justice is the rule by which, where positive law is either silent, defective, or not clearly defined, the decisions of Courts of Equity are guided, and it is in such cases only, the remedial and just powers, peculiarly confided to these courts, can be interposed where the will of the Legislature has been clearly pronounced with regard to all the circumstances which belong to a case as a general rule. Equity can neither take it up where the law leaves it nor extend the remedy farther than the law allows. Hard, therefore, was the case of bond creditors, whose debtor devised away his real estate; rigorous and unjust the rule by which a devisee was put in a better condition than the heir. Hard was the common law, till very lately subsisting, that land devised or descending to the heir should not be liable to simple contract debts, although the money was laid out in the purchase of the very land. Hard was it also that the father should never immediately succeed as heir to the real estate of his son. The like might be said of the descent of lands when they devolved to a remote relation of the whole blood, or even escheated to the Lord in preference to the owner's half brother. Hard was also the total stop put to all justice by causing the parol to demur when an infant was sued as heir or was party to a real action, and though the justice of modern times has induced the Legislature at length to abolish these instances of hardship and delay of justice, yet a Court of Equity could give no relief. It was not, as hath been erroneously stated, the business of a Court of Equity in England to abate the rigour of the common law; a Court of Equity possessed not the slightest power to interpose. In all such cases of positive law Courts of Equity as well as Courts of Law must say with Ulpian, (Ff. 40, 9, 12), "hoc quidem perquam durum est, sed ita lex scripta est."

But Equity, as well as Law, determines according to the spirit of the rules, and not according to the strictness of the letter, and where cases arise which are out of the letter of a statute, if they are construed to have been contemplated by the Legislature, they are within its equity. These are the cases, then, of which Grotius says, "Lex non exactè definit, sed arbitris boni viri permittat," in order to find out the true sense and meaning of the lawgiver. There is no rule of interpreting laws which is not equally used in both courts; the construction in both is the same, each endeavouring to adopt the true sense of the law in question, cannot vary that sense in a single tittle.

It is true that when a new case comes before the court which there is no preceding decision to decide by, unless the Judge disclaims all jurisdiction in the matter thereof, he must decide it and decide according to the workings of his own conscience. Now, however alarmed we may be disposed to feel at a jurisdiction like this, yet when we consider how various, how refined, and how salutary the checks are, imposable upon, or correctives applicable to hasty decisions, we must admit with pleasure that every opinion, sentiment, and conception of corrupt abuse must vanish. For, though proceedings in Equity were said to be secundum discretionem boni viri, yet when it is asked, Vir bonus est quis? the answer is, "Qui consulta patrum qui leges juraque servat." That discretion which is exercised in Courts of Equity is not an arbitrary discretion; it is a discretion governed by the rules of law and equity. This discretion has in no case the power to contradict the principles of law, as has been sometimes ignorantly imputed to the court: a discretionary power of such a description, is neither in this or any other, even the highest court acting in a judicial capacity, by the constitution entrusted with. (See Western's Com. 168).

Again, neither a Court of Law nor a Court of Equity can, generally speaking, alter men's agreements. Both courts will construe them equitably but neither pretends to have, or assumes to itself, the power to control or change a lawful stipulation or engagement, and where the subject matter is such as requires to be determined secundum æquum et bonum, as generally upon actions of the case the judgments in the Courts of Law are guided by the most liberal equity.

The Courts of Law and Equity principally differ in the modes of administering justice in each in the mode of proof, the mode of trial, and the mode of relief; add to these two other grounds of jurisdiction, in which the narrowness of the decisions of Courts of Law drove the parties to seek relief in Equity, (viz. the true construction of securities for money lent, and the form and effect of a second use), and then we have the main pillars upon which hath been gradually erected that structure of jurisprudence which to this moment prevails in our Courts of Equity, and which is inwardly bottomed upon the same substantial foundations as our legal system, and however it may differ from it in outward form that difference is only attributable to the different taste of the architects. (See the last chapter in 3 B. Com.)

Having claimed your indulgence thus far I detain you no longer, but conclude this answer which I fear I have made unnecessarily long with the words of that able lawyer, Sir E. Sugden, cited in Western's Coms. 168: "As the law of property is now administered in the different forums, allowing for the imperfection of human laws, it exhibits a most splendid and comprehensive code of jurisprudence, and the man will deserve ill of his country who shall ever attempt to confound the rules by which the Courts of Law and Equity are severally guided."

I am, Mr. Editor, your obliged and humble servant,

CHANCERY REFORM.

LETTER FROM COMMISSIONER FANE TO LORD ABINGER.

My Lord,—I observe that in the late debate on Chancery Reform, your Lordship is represented to have spoken of the delays of the Court of Chancery as disgusting. Allow me to lay before your Lordship and the public a case which has lately come under my notice whilst performing my duty as Commissioner of the Court of Bankruptcy, and which seems indeed to justify that strong expression.

In auditing the accounts of a bankrupt's estate, I found that £3000. had remained in the hands of assignees 10 years. Upon inquiry I was informed that the money could not be disposed of till a Chancery suit was decided, which, though instituted in 1828, was still pending. I called for the papers in the cause, and by wading through 500 folios of Chancery verbosity, I learnt the following facts:—

R. B., a London tradesman, died in 1814, leaving a large family, to whom he bequeathed his accumulations, and, as some of his children were under age, he appointed two trustees to manage the property. One of the trustees became bankrupt in 1828, and it then appeared that some of the funds were not forthcoming; upon which a bill was filed in Chancery against the bankrupt trustee and his assignees, and against the solvent trustee, praying that the usual accounts might be taken, and that the solvent trustee might make good the loss. Upon which a bill, as your Lordship well knows, it is of course customary to refer it to a master in Chancery to take the accounts, yet the plaintiffs did not arrive at this ordinary decree until two years and upwards had elapsed. The cause lingered in the Master's office just eight years and one month, and then the Master made his report!

The plaintiffs were dissatisfied, and took 16 deceptions, which now stand for argument; and am told that their turn of hearing will arrive in this year, or early in 1841. If the cause could then be finally settled, this unfortunate family will have undergone only 13 years of misery; if, as I fear, a reference back to the Master should be found necessary, their misery may be prolonged indefinitely. I fear the latter, because I observe that the Master states in his report that he has abstained from taking certain parts of the accounts, because the decree did not authorize him to do so.

Does not this case justify your Lordship's expression? Is it not "disgusting?" But, my Lord, the most "disgusting" part remains to be told. The whole of these proceedings were, for every practical purpose, useless. The only real question between the parties was, whether the non-acting trustee was responsible for the loss; and yet, to get at this question, the Court of Chancery, according to its system, was compelled to direct most voluminous accounts, extending over the period from 1814 to 1830, and the most minute inquiries upon subjects, some of which were in dispute, and the Master was compelled to make a report, which extended to 200 folios and upwards.

Such is the Chancery system, the main characteristics of which are delay, expense, and substantially a denial of justice. What, then, is the remedy?

If a loaded waggon stuck in the mire, what would a rational man do? He might put on more horses, or lighten the load, or do both. If I might venture an opinion, I should say that in dealing with the broad-wheeled Chancery waggon, the Legislature should adopt the last of these alternatives—it should put on more horses and lighten the load. The Lord Chancellor proposes to put on more horses, in other words, to have two new judges; but will this suffice? Will not such reform be mere delusion? What would have been the effect of such reform upon the case above referred to? Had the two new judges been in existence in 1830, would they have prevented the cause from lingering eight years and a month in the Master's office?

The first great object should be to get rid of writing, when writing could by possibility be dispensed with; and with this view, the legislature should provide that in all cases where an account was required of a trust fund, not exceeding £1000. the business should begin and end in the Master's office, subject of course to appeal; for this purpose the Master should be made a judge, and should be armed with all necessary powers.

To some, this will no doubt appear a startling proposal, yet in proposing it, I propose nothing which is not of every-day occurrence in bankruptcy. There, if the trust fund, in other words, the bankrupt's estate, amount, not to £1000. but even to £10,000. or £100,000., and even if it consists of the most complicated interests in real estate, the whole administration is entrusted, if in London, to certain salaried officers called commissioners; if in the country, to three or four attornies of some neighbouring town; and the whole business is conducted from beginning to end without the interference of any other jurisdiction. Why should not the same course be pursued in Chancery? It is curious to observe how differently the law provides for that judicial interference which becomes necessary upon a death or a bankruptcy. If a man die in Northumberland, and disputes arise about his assets, those disputes are brought before the greatest court in the kingdom, a court which sits in the metropolis; everything is done in writing; the matter originates with the court itself; the court makes its first decree in about two years; that decree tells the Master, in endless detail, what he is to do (just as if he required being taught the simplest matters); the decree is drawn up, not by the judge, who might be thought wiser than the Master, but by some deputy-registrar, who, in teaching the Master, frequently omits some material direction; the matter goes to the Master; in eight years the Master makes his report, tells the court what he has found, and what he would have found, if the deputy-registrar had authorized him; and at last the court either acts or sends the matter back to the Master with new directions. Meanwhile, as Lord Bacon observes, "though the Chancery pace be slow, the suitor's pulse beats quick." If, however, instead of dying, the man happens to be an insolvent trader and bankrupt, then the suitor, instead of going 300 or 400 miles to London to find relief, finds it at Alnwick; instead of obtaining relief from the first law officer of the Crown, the Lord Chancellor, he obtains it from three or four attornies of his neighbourhood; instead of the Chancellor referring the suitor at the end of two years to the Master, with long detailed instructions, he refers him at once to the attorney-commissioners, with no other instructions than such as would correspond with the usual mercantile instructions, "do the needful;" instead of everything being done in writing, scarcely anything is done in writing; and instead of the Master doing nothing and reporting everything, the commissioners do everything and report nothing. And what is the result of these different systems? In Chancery, it is delay, expense, misery to the suitors, and disgrace to the court; in Bankruptcy (at least, within that district to which reform has extended), it is speedy justice, moderate expense, and universal satisfaction amongst those most interested, namely, creditors.

And why should a Master in Chancery be distrusted, and a Commissioner of the Court of Bankruptcy be trusted; the salary of a Master in Chancery is £2500. a year, that of a Commissioner is only £1500.; why then should not the office of a Master be filled with persons as competent to carry out a decree for an account and direct the distribution of the assets, subject to appeal, as a Commissioner of the Court of Bankruptcy is supposed to be? why should the Master be instructed in all the details of his duty, just as if he were not endowed with common sense, and why should the Commissioner be trusted to do his duty, without any instructions at all, except such as his own common sense and knowledge of his profession will furnish him? No man can answer these questions satisfactorily, or justify such gross anomalies.

But of course, there are many cases in Chancery where writing is indispensable, and cannot something be done to diminish the length of Chancery papers? Must the law continue to encourage lengthiness by making the fee for drawing a legal document depend upon the length of the document when drawn? This mode of remuneration, it is true, has been in existence from time immemorial, but it has been condemned by all who have thought on law reform, by Lord Bacon 200 years ago, and, as I well remember, by your Lordship a few years since. Under it the fee of the Chancery barrister increases as the bill or answer which he draws lengthens, so also does the charge of the solicitor, so does that of the registrar, who draws the decree, and so also does or did the remuneration of the Master in Chancery and all his clerks. Is it surprising that, under such a system, law papers have lengthened, until the searching for the sense of them is like looking for a needle in a bottle of hay—for a grain of wheat in a bushel of chaff.

The Legislature should reform this, and should so arrange, as that lawyers should gain by speed and brevity, not by delay and prolixity. Probably the best mode of effecting the object would be, to issue a commission to certain solicitors of London (selecting such as were of opinion that a plan of remuneration better than the present could be devised), authorising them to prepare a plan. It is impossible that they could prepare one more mischievous than the present.

Another main principle of reform would be, to revise the law of parties to suits in Chancery, and make it somewhat more conformable to the dictates of common sense. Under the present system, Chancery now swallows a camel, now strains at a gnat. To-day the court shall be asked to direct an account of the personal estate of a deceased person, and, if any one were to say that the person entitled to the residue of the deceased ought to be present at the taking of the account, as they were so deeply interested in the result, the court would say, "No, the personal representative represents and protects every one, creditors, legatees, and the parties entitled to the residue." Here the court swallows the camel. To-morrow it shall be asked to make a decree involving an account and distribution of the real estate of a deceased person, and then, although crowds of devisees are parties to the suit, so many that there cannot be the slightest fear but that the accounting parties will be carefully watched in the Master's office; yet, if it shall appear that an infant has been just born who will be entitled to any portion of the proceeds of the real estate, the court will order the cause to stand over, in order that he may be made a party to the suit! Here the court strains at the gnat. The rule is the same death or marriage create any new interest, so that, unless there be neither births, deaths, or marriages amongst such a crowd of parties during ten years, which is the average duration of a Chancery suit, there is an endless succession of bills, called bills of reversion and supplement to bring new parties before the court. The Legislature should reform this; and, as the personal representative represents all interested in the personal estate, as assignees in the bankruptcy represent all persons connected in the bankrupt's estate, as the governing power in a corporation represents all persons interested in corporate property, as the officers of a joint stock company represent all persons interested in a joint stock company, and as in an endless number of other cases such a number of the parties interested as will suffice to ensure a fair and honest discussion of the points in debate, being present, are permitted to represent the absent, so in the case of a suit for the administration of a real estate, some one or a few of the parties principally interested, should be permitted to represent all.

Many other essential principles of reform might be suggested, but the length of this paper warns me to stop, and I shall, therefore, conclude with expressing a hope, that neither your Lordship nor any other member of the Legislature will be led into the delusion, that so feeble an effort of reform as the multiplication of judges or courts will ever abate the Chancery nuisance, I beg to subscribe myself, with great respect, Your Lordship's obedient servant,

C. FANE.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—June 2.

REAL CASE FROM THE COURT OF CHANCERY IN IRELAND.

USES for LIVES.—Whether, from the circumstance of repeated renewals, a covenant for perpetual renewal shall be implied.

SMITH v. NANGLE.

This was an appeal from an order of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland. The question in dispute between the parties was, whether a lease executed in 1672 contained a covenant for a perpetual renewal.

In the year 1672, Henry Pakenham, of Tully, in the county of Westmeath, Esq., granted a lease for three lives to Bartholomew Cooper, his heirs and assigns, of certain lands of Tully and Fiermore, at a small yearly rent, payable half-yearly. It appeared that the lessees' names of the lease was many years ago accidentally destroyed by fire, which precluded the respondents from producing it, or even a copy; but it was admitted by the appellants, that there was an endorsement on the lease in these words:—

“And it is hereby agreed between the parties aforesaid, that upon the renewing or inserting of any life or lives, there shall be paid by the said Bartholomew Cooper, the father, his heirs or assigns, unto the said Henry Pakenham, his heirs or assigns, the full sum of £16. 16s. 4d., current and lawful money of England;” which endorsement, the respondents submitted, was made on the lease in consequence of some inaccuracy or uncertainty in the statement of the amount of the renewal fine in the body of the lease, or to supply some defect or omission in the covenant for perpetual renewal. The lease has, since it was first executed, been renewed seven times, the last renewal having been occasioned by the death of his late Majesty George III., one of the lives in the preceding renewal, dated 1768. In the month of October, 1830, the lessor's interest in the fee and inheritance of the lands of Maine became vested in the appellant, who suffered a common recovery, and notice was served upon Christopher Nangle, one of the cestui qui vires, the father of the respondent, J. H. Nangle, demanding possession. On the death of Christopher Nangle, which took place in June 1836, an application was made on behalf of his son, requiring a renewal of the lease, which, after some correspondence, was declined by the appellant, the Rev. Thomas Smith, who alleged, among other matters, that Mr. Nangle held too much land. A bill in the Irish Court of Chancery was accordingly filed by the respondent, praying that the Court would decree that the lease contained a covenant for perpetual renewal, and that directions should be issued by the court to oblige the appellant to renew the lease. When the cause was heard, the Lord Chancellor directed two issues to be tried by a special jury of the county; first, whether the lease was renewable for ever; and secondly, whether, independent of the endorsement upon the lease as to the payment of £16. 16s. 4d. on the renewal or inserting of any lives, it contained “any clause, covenant, or agreement relating to the renewal of the said lease, to the said lessee, his heirs and assigns.” Against this order of the court the appellant brought the present appeal.

It was contended on behalf of the respondents that the order of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland was consistent with equity and justice, and ought not to be disturbed.

The LORD CHANCELLOR gave judgment.—Decree of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland reversed, and the bill ordered to be dismissed.

COURT OF CHANCERY.—June 8.

APPEAL FROM THE VICE-CHANCELLOR,
April 16.

IBBOTSON v. IBBOTSON.

DEVISE where void when the REMAINDER is too REMOTE.

This case was heard by the Vice-Chancellor on the 16th April last. In 1814 Sir Henry Carr Ibbotson made his will. At that time, by virtue of a settlement on his marriage, his mansion-house at Denton-park stood settled to the use of himself for life, with remainder to the use of trustees to preserve contingent remainders, with remainder to the use of his first and other sons, severally and successively in tail male, with remainder to the use of Sir Henry Carr Ibbotson in fee. By his will Sir Henry Carr Ibbotson devised the reversion in fee of his mansion-house to the use of his brother, the late Sir Charles Ibbotson, for his life, with remainder to the use of trustees, to preserve contingent remainders, with remainder to the use of the first and other sons of the said Sir Charles Ibbotson, severally and successively in tail male, with remainder to the use of his brother, John Thomas Ibbotson, in like manner in strict settlement, with remainder to the use of his own daughters severally and successively in tail male, with several remainders for life and in tail, with remainders to his own right heirs. He then gave in the words following—"I give and bequeath unto William Charlton and Matthew Wilson, their executors, administrators, and assigns, all my plate, pictures, books, and household furniture in and about my said mansion-house at Denton-park, upon trust, to permit the same to be used and enjoyed by the person and persons who for the time being shall be entitled in possession to my said mansion-house under or by virtue of the settlement made upon my marriage, or of the limitations contained in this my will, until a tenant in tail of the age of 21 years shall be in the possession of my said mansion-house; and then the said plate, pictures, books, and household furniture, are to go and belong to such tenant in tail. I give and bequeath all the rest and residue of my personal estate and effects, after payment of my just debts and funeral and testamentary expenses and legacies, and subject thereto, unto the person who, at my decease, will be beneficially entitled in possession to my said mansion-house of Denton-park, and I constitute and appoint my said brother, Charles Ibbotson, executor of this my will." He died without issue. In September, 1825, the will was proved by Sir Charles Ibbotson, who, on the testator's decease became beneficially entitled in possession to the mansion-house, and consequently was his residuary legatee. He had died lately. Before the testator's death, the present Sir Henry Charles Ibbotson, the eldest son of Sir Charles Ibbotson, was born, and has now attained the age of 21. The question is, who became entitled to the subjects of the specific gift?

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said, the words in this case are singular, and unlike the words in any other case. The gift is in the form of a simple declaration of trust, not requiring any settlement to be executed. It has no such qualifying words as are found in the case of Gore v. Grosvenor, (a) and other cases, namely, "as far as they can by law," or "as far as the rule of law or equity will permit." The gift referring to the limitations in the settlement and in the will of the mansion-house meant to pass the chattels in succession; but the trust is so expressed that if it were literally carried into effect it might have happened, to use the expression of LORD ELDON in Ware v. Polhill (b) that no tenant in tail of the age of 21 years might have been in the possession of the mansion-house for two centuries, and consequently the absolute interest in the plate and other articles would not have vested during that time. In Marshall v. Holloway (c) the same great authority says, "The trust in this case for accumulation I think bad, because it may last for ages." And under the will of Sir Henry Carr Ibbotson the suspension of the vesting of the chattels might have endured for ages. The fact that a tenant in tail of the age of 13 years has become possessed of the mansion-house within the space of 21 years from the death of the testator is immaterial, for the validity of the gift must be determined by considering how it stood at the death of the testator, and unless it was then such as that, if it ever took effect at all, it must of necessity have vested the absolute interest in some one within the period allowed by law, it was bad then, and must be so now. For, as Sir W. Grant said in Lord Southampton v. Marquis of Hertford (d), an executory devise exceeding the allowed limits is bad in law; and in Tollemache v. Earl of Coventry (e) LORD BROUGHAM says, "to argue from the fact that the person was in esse at the date of the will who became Lord Vere is to rely upon an accident. The event might have been otherwise. He would not ex necessitate answer the description within the allowed period; the estate must be certain, so as within the time to vest in the person described." And upon the fullest consideration I am of opinion, that so far as the gift s framed to take effect after the death of Sir Charles Ibbotson, it was void. Whether it was as a gift to him for life only, and void as a remainder after his death, or whether it might be construed as a gift absolutely to Sir Charles Ibbotson, according to what seems to have been the opinion of Lord Brougham upon the gift in Lord Vere's will to the third Lord Vere, it is not necessary to decide, because Sir Charles Ibbotson was residuary legatee. Upon the whole, I think that under the will of Sir Henry Carr Ibbotson, Sir Charles Ibbotson took absolutely the subjects of the specific gift.

From this decision the present APPEAL was brought.

For the appellant the following cases were cited: Tollemache v. Earl of Coventry (ante) Werner v. Grosvenor, (ante) Lord Southampton the Marquis of Hertford.

Against the appeal Proctor v. the Bishop of Bath and Wells, 2 Hen. Blacks. 358. and cases were cited.

The LORD CHANCELLOR found great fault with the form of the suit. His Lordship said, the estate of Sir Henry had not been administered, nor debts paid, and here were persons contending about a residue, when it might turn out that no residue at all existed. This attempt to get decisions on points in a case not ripe for hearing, added much to the delays in the administration of justice, and although he would decide this case, because it was heard below, yet in every future case he would refuse to hear, until the cause came on in a proper form.

ROLLS' COURT, June 3.

RAYNER v. GREEN.

SENDOR and PURCHASER.—Right to specific performance—LACHES—LAPSE of TIME—Bar to relief.

The bill in this cause was filed by the plaintiff, S. Rayner, to compel the specific performance of an agreement which he had entered into, in 1818, with John Smith, deceased, for the purchase of certain small cottages, gardens, and orchards, situate at Knave's Beech, near Chipping Wycombe, in the County of Bucks, subject to the life interest of the said John Smith and Sarah his wife. The price agreed upon was £50, thirty of which was paid on the execution of the agreement, but no legal assurance was made. John Smith died on the 4th of November, 1823, and, as he was desirous that his wife should know nothing of the sale, he made his will, by which he gave the property to her, and appointed Messrs. Green and Ponsford, the latter of whom alone proved, executors of his will.

Mrs. Smith, by her will, gave the premises to various persons, who in the course of the argument it appeared were not before the court, and died on the 16th of July, 1824. Upon the decease of Mrs. Smith, some negotiation took place respecting the estate, and in 1826 a draft of an assignment was prepared, but was never executed. John Ponsford shortly after died, and it was alleged that Mr. Green took upon himself the management of the property, and entered into the receipt of the rents. The business, however, was thus suffered to rest till the present bill was filed. It was now objected by the defendants that the plaintiff had no right to the performance of the agreement which had been made, in consequence of the lapse of time which had been suffered to pass, but this formed no obstacle, as the last tenant for life did not die till 1824, and two years and upwards were allowed to pass in negotiation. Mr. Green, however, denied that he acted as executor of the will of John Smith; but it was proved that he had been in receipt of the rents, and had acted as the lessor of the premises.

Mr. Pemberton, for the defendant Green, insisted that the neglect to enforce the agreement till 1834 was a bar to relief; there were, however, not proper parties before the court. The property sold was described as freehold. Upon the first hearing, the devisees of Sarah Smith were ordered to be brought before the court. The plaintiff, however, insisted that the premises were leasehold, and had filed a supplemental bill and had brought a limited administrator before the court. In this state, therefore, if the suit was allowed to proceed, no decree could be made, and that more especially as the very evidence of the plaintiffs showed that a part of the property had been taken by the parish officers of Chipping Wycombe, and had been sold by them for the maintenance of one of the devisees of Sarah Smith.

Lord LANGDALE, stopping Mr. Pemberton, said it was clear no decree could be made for the plaintiff, for upon his own evidence it appeared that a part of the estate had been sold and delivered to somebody else. The only thing to consider was, whether the plaintiff ought to have the further indulgence of bringing other parties before the court. The agreement made was to have been carried into effect immediately. The conveyance might have been made, and the purchase-money paid, but nothing was done during the lives either of John Smith, or Sarah, his wife. After their deaths an assignment was prepared, and Green was to have proved the will for the purpose of executing the deed; this, however, went off, and he never became the legal personal representative of John Smith, being nothing more than a formal party, and not beneficially interested. It did not appear to him (Lord Langdale) that, if further parties were added, there was any probability of success by the plaintiff, and therefore he considered that he ought to dismiss the suit with costs.

Mr. Parker, sen. said he appeared for Mrs. Ponsford. She was made a party merely because some of the deeds had come into her hands; he trusted, therefore, that his client would be considered entitled to her costs.

Lord LANGDALE thought that she was entitled, and that they ought to be paid.

LORD CAMOYS v. SCUR.

BAILMENTS—Whether where a person obtains a horse for trial, employs an experienced person to make the trial, and the horse runs away and is killed, the borrower is responsible for the value of the horse.

We fully reported this case in our last week's number, (a) which was an action in which the plaintiff alleged that he was possessed of a mare of great value, and that the defendant had her in his care and custody for the purpose of trying her, and that he did not take proper care of her, in consequence of which she died. The defendant did not try her himself, but placed upon her back an experienced groom, who was thrown, and the mare was killed. The question put to the jury by the learned judge who tried the cause (COLERIDGE, J.) was, whether the defendant was right in allowing the groom to ride the mare? The plaintiff was non-suited.

Mr. Kelly moved for a rule to show cause why the non-suit should not be set aside and a new trial granted, on the ground that the defendant had only the plaintiff's permission to try the mare himself, and had, therefore, no right to allow another person to ride her without leave of the plaintiff.

Lord DENMAN said that, according to this argument, if a gentleman wished to purchase a horse for his groom to ride, and said, "Get upon it, and see if you like it," that was to be considered a conversion. This could not for a moment be supposed. The defendant has not abused the leave given to him, and was justified in deputing an experienced person to ride the mare for the bond fide purpose of trying her paces, in order that he might determine whether or no he would purchase her.

PARKER v. MITCHELL.

This was an action of trespass, to which the defendant pleaded a justification, under the statute 2 and 3 W. 4, c. 71, s. 2, and set up a usage for 20 years and 40 years, by two of his Pleas. It was tried at York before Coleridge, J. who was of opinion that the pleas were not made out, by reason of the evidence not showing user for the last 4 or 5 years, and the plaintiff therefore had a verdict.

Mr. Alexander now moved for a rule to shew cause why that verdict should not be set aside, and a new trial granted on the ground of misdirection, and cited Payne v. Shedden, (a) where a plea of 20 years' right of way was held not to be defeated by proof an agreed alteration in the line of way, nor by a temporary non-user under an agreement.

Lord DENMAN, C.J.—Your argument would give you a right if at the distance of 20 years you could shew a user for one year, though there was then a non-user for 19 years; and thus a non-user for 19 years would in fact establish the claim.

PATTERSON, J.—Payne v. Shedden depended on an agreement, and the non-user was accounted for by that agreement. That is not so here.

COLERIDGE, J.—In a case like that, you need not ask the jury to make any presumption, for the agreement would prove every thing. There is no necessity to prove a user up to the very time of action brought. You might as well argue if you traced back a user for 19 years, you might ask for the presumption of another year's user to be made in your favour; yet it has been decided that that cannot be done.

Lord DENMAN.—User up to the very day of action brought is not required, but user up to a reasonable time must be shewn; and certainly three or four or five years' user cannot be presumed in order to support a plea of this kind.

THOMSON v. FARDEN AND OTHERS.

REPLEVIN.—JURISDICTION of the SHERIFFS of LONDON.—Whether it is competent for one of them personally to execute the duties of the office, there being two Sheriffs.

This was an action on a replevin bond, in which the declaration alleged that the defendant was a tenant of the plaintiff, who had distrained him; and that thereupon the defendant went to Sir Moses Montefiore, one of the Sheriffs of London, and obtained a replevin upon the usual terms. The case now came before the court on a demurrer to the declaration, on the ground that Sir Moses Montefiore, as one of the Sheriffs, had singly no jurisdiction to grant a replevin.

Mr. Serjeant Goulburn, for the demurrer, asked the question to be, whether, there being two Sheriffs of London, it was competent for one of them to execute personally the duties of the office of both. He cited the statute of Marlborough, 52 Hen. 3. c. 21. and 11 Geo. 2. c. 19. § 3. which gave the Sheriffs their power, and contended that according to the provisions of those statutes there was no power given for one of the Sheriffs to grant a replevin bond.

Mr. Peacock, for the plaintiff, cited Rich v. Thomas Pleyer, (a) by which it appeared that the Sheriffs were to be considered as distinct individuals, and set up a custom for the Sheriffs of London to grant replevins separately.

INDAL, C. J.—The shrievalty of London is different from that of Middlesex, for the same two persons who are the sheriffs of the former, constitute the office of the sheriff of the latter; and the question is, whether one of them is so far a distinct officer from the other in the city of London, that for the purpose of granting this inam remedium, he may give a replevin. If he can, there is an end of the case, because the statute of Geo. 2. says, and means to point to the conclusion, that the bond may be taken by the officer who grants replevin. Then is the question done by one sheriff a valid act. That the two sheriffs are considered as separate officers for some purposes, appears from the authorities before the court. (b) I think, therefore, that the allegations in this declaration are sufficient, and that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment.

MAULE, J.—Here there are two sheriffs, and the name of each of them would satisfy the precise term of that statute. The statute of the 1 & 2 William & Mary, c. 12, provides that sheriffs of shires may grant power under certain conditions to certain persons in their shires also to grant replevins; but that does not apply to cases like this, where the sheriff is sheriff of a city which is made a shire. The object of the provision clearly was to extend the means of securing speedy remedy, and no doubt the reason why it was not made applicable to sheriffs of cities was that in such cases there were two sheriffs to apply to, each of whom might grant replevin, in the same way as each of the agents of a sheriff of a shire might. The statute of Geo. 2, provides that all sheriffs granting replevins may assign the bonds under their hands and seals, and that provision assumes that the assignment and replevin are to be made by one officer. In London the office of sheriff is performed by two persons, but I cannot say that the assignment must be by both of them. I think the case of Wilson v. Hobday (c) very material, if not decisive on this point; and this case certainly falls within the line of reasoning upon which that decision was arrived at. I conceive that judgment must be given for the plaintiff.

The other judges concurred.

LAMONT v. CROOK.

SUBPŒNA DUCES TECUM.—Whether, to support an action against an absentee witness, it is necessary that he should have been called upon his subpoena in court.

This action was brought to recover damages for not obeying a subpoena, and on the trial before Lord Abinger, at Westminster, his Lordship directed a nonsuit, on the ground that it had not been proved that the defendant had been called upon his subpœna, at the time the cause came on to be tried.

The defendant, it appeared, had been subpoenaed to appear and give evidence on the trial of this action for the plaintiff, but when the cause was called on the plaintiff was obliged to withdraw the record in consequence, as it was alleged, of the absence of the defendant, whom he considered to be an essential witness. A rule nisi had been obtained for a new trial, and cause was now shown against it by

Mr. Crowder, who contended that the law was consonant with the universal practice, and that there was no obligation cast upon the defendant to appear in court till he had been called by the act of the court. This was an action on an alleged breach of duty, and the question was, what that duty was? This it was urged was to appear when called, and, as the defendant had not been called, it would follow that no right of action accrued to the plaintiff, as no breach of duty had been committed.

Mr. Thesiger, for the rule, argued that the ceremony of calling a witness was not more than evidence of the breach of duty, and not that it constituted the very essence of the matter. The law cast an obligation on witnesses to appear, in order to testify de die in diem, until the cause should be called on in its regular course, and if, as was the case here, the witness was not in fact in or near the court, the calling was wholly useless and an idle ceremony. The question was, was he there ready to give evidence? and if not, as his absence had caused the plaintiff to withdraw his record, he was bound by law to reimburse the plaintiff the costs of that delay.

The COURT was of opinion that an action was maintainable against an absenting witness, though he might not have been called upon his subpœna, if it were proved that he had absented himself in such a way that, even if he were called to appear in court, he could not possibly do so.

COURT OF REVIEW.—June 6.

FIAT against — GREEN.

SUPERSEDEAS—Right of a Bankrupt to Supersedeas without payment of Fees.

In this case the bankrupt had compounded with his creditors by a payment of 5s. in the pound, and had obtained the consent of all of them to a supersedeas: a difficulty however arose upon the application made by the bankrupt for the writ, the Commissioners having refused to certify, because the bankrupt had not paid the fees required by the statute.

Mr. Anderton now again applied to the Court on the subject on behalf of the bankrupt and prayed the writ.

Sir J. Cross.—By a general order, issued in the year 1818, a bankrupt, having obtained the consent of all his creditors, is declared entitled to a supersedeas, and the same rule requires commissioners to adjourn the choice of assignees in order to allow time for such an application. In the present case the commissioner has adjourned the proceedings for that express purpose. The rule does not require the certificate of the commissioner; but, in practice, and for facility, the Court has been accustomed to require it as the best proof of the consent of creditors. Here the commissioner refuses to certify, not because he is unable to do so, but because certain fees are not paid. A right to have a supersedeas is a right belonging to the bankrupt, and if all that is required has been done, it is not in the power of the commissioner to say whether or not the right shall be conceded. I cannot think the bankrupt bound to pay these fees in question, which the Act of Parliament says are to be paid by the assignees out of the estate, and which, therefore, until funds accrue, cannot be paid. It is not justifiable to refuse to supersede because the commissioner has refused to certify; and I am therefore of opinion, having well weighed the matter, and given it my most attentive consideration, that the petitioner is entitled to have the fiat superseded.

Order for supersedeas, as prayed, allowed.

PREROGATIVE COURT—May 9.

WILL OF ALEXANDER ELLIS, Esq. deceased.

New Will Act—Attestation clause.

The deceased died on the 21st of April last. Previous to his decease he dictated his will to uncle, by which he gave £1000 to each of three sisters, and made his brother, William, residuary legatee. The deceased signed this paper in the presence of his uncle, and informed latter that the execution required to be attested by two witnesses. These persons, unfortunately, did not sign their names in the room in which the deceased was, but carried the paper into an adjoining room, separated only by a passage, with both doors being open. They could hear the deceased breathe, but they could not see him, nor he them.

Mr. Nicholl applied for probate, but admitted his fear that the application was hopeless.

Sir H. JENNER said the Court unfortunately has no discretion, but is bound by the terms of the Act of Parliament, and as the witnesses at the time of attestation were not either actually or constructively in the presence of the deceased, I must reject the motion for probate, though it is a very hard case.

Probate refused.

REVIEW OF NEW BOOKS.

REPORT of the BRAINTREE CHURCH-RATE CASE.

(Seeley and Joslin v. Burder) to which is appended Gaudern v. Silby. Second edition, by CUTHBERT WILLIAM JOHNSON, Esq. of Gray's Inn, one of the Counsel in the cause. London, RICHARDS and Co. 194, Fleet Street, 1840.

We cannot do better in noticing this book than to borrow the opinion of LORD DENMAN. It is "a very able pamphlet," and is written upon a very important subject now in agitation throughout the kingdom. We observe by the advertisement, that the first part of the Report is written by Mr. GEORGE WM. JOHNSON, one of the Supreme Court at Calcutta, and the opinions are printed chiefly from Mr. Gurney's notes, and contain the arguments on the Defendant's side, and the judgment in full given by LORD DENMAN, in the Court of Queen's Bench, on the 1st of the last month. The case came before the Court upon a demurrer to a declaration in prohibition, directed to the Judge of the Consistory Court of the Bishop of London, requiring him to proceed no further against the plaintiff for the recovery of a supposed Church-rate laid on the parishioners of Braintree by the Churchwardens alone, notwithstanding the Vote of a Vestry by which the rate was refused. The Consistory Court decided against this defence; and thus raised the question, Whether the Churchwardens have power to impose a Church-rate against the declared will of the inhabitants in Vestry assembled?

The work before us gives a very full and able report of the judgment pronounced by LORD DENMAN, from which we select the following extracts.

In debating this question at the bar, the ancient doctrine that by the custom of England, the inhabitants are bound to repair the body of the church, and to enclose the churchyard was not disputed, a doctrine fully stated by Holt, C. J. as quoted by the Queen's Advocate, in arguing the present case in the Consistory Court. "By the civil and canon law the parson is obliged to repair the whole church, and so it is in all Christian Kingdoms but in England, for it is by the peculiar law of this nation that the parishioners are charged with the repairs of the body of the church." (a)

This is undoubtedly a legal truth, as old as any in our books. Lord Coke in his Commentary on the statute or writ of circumspecte agatis (2 Inst. 489), and that on the articuli cleri (ib. 653), and in numerous other places, distinctly lays it down, and all the authorities are the same way; and though the period of the earliest Church-rate does not appear to be ascertained, we may safely assume that the expence required for this purpose was always defrayed by means of a rate levied on the parishioners, neither was that proposition denied on the part of the plaintiff, or that a Church-rate is matter of Ecclesiastical cognizance, or that the Churchwardens are entrusted with the expenditure of the rate so levied, or liable to spiritual censures for neglect of their duty therein. But, the question is, whether in case of refusal by the parishioners, the Churchwardens are empowered to impose a rate for that purpose, and indeed compellable by spiritual censures so to tax their fellow parishioners.

The plaintiff in this present suit, has the right to cast the burden of proof on his adversaries.

(a) Hastings v. Rous. Carters, 360.

The law requires clear demonstration that a tax is lawfully imposed. No Act of Parliament vests in the parish officers such a power as these have exercised, nor recites that such a power exists, by common law or custom. No book of reports affirms it; no such usage in fact prevails in the land; an opposite usage prevails, the Church-rate is constantly imposed by the inhabitants in vestry assembled.

In Gibson's Codex 220, it is said, "Rates for reparation of the church are to be made by the Churchwardens, together with the parishioners assembled, upon notice given in the church. And the major part of them that appear shall bind the parish, or if none appear, the Churchwardens alone may make the rate. because they, and not the parishioners, are to be cited and punished in defect of repairs."

Such is the form of the rate in all the books of practice.

On the hearing of the present case before Dr. Lushington, that learned Judge interposing, pointed out many apparent incongruities in the statement of facts, in Gaudern v. Silby, saying that it teemed with eccentricity. It is tolerably clear that it was that case alone which induced him to decide the present case as he did. Sitting in the Consistory Court, he felt himself constrained by the decision of the Court of Arches, being a court of superior authority, to hold the present Church-rate legal and binding.

An able pamphlet has been published since these remarks were made, reporting that case, and containing a statement of facts which appears to remove much of the uncertainty alluded to by Dr. Lushington. (b)

But the great fundamental objection remains in its full force. However binding on the Consistory Court, and however respectable in itself, an insulated decision by the Court of Arches is not binding in Westminster Hall.

The conclusion at which we arrive is, that the Court Christian was wrong in over-ruling the defensive allegation of the parishioners, that the rate was made against the wishes of the majority in vestry assembled, on the ground that this supposed Church-rate was a nullity, as having been made by persons who had no authority to make one in defiance of the declared dissent of the vestry, and that the court decided erroneously in proceeding to give judgment for enforcing it.

(b) Lord Denman here referred to the 1st Edition of this Report.

ESSAY.

ON THE ENGLISH LAW OF BAILMENTS.

WE have shown that in England the burthen of proof of negligence is on the bailor, and that proof merely of the loss, is sufficient to put the bailee on his defence. But this is, with certain exceptions, to innkeepers and carriers, and to which we will now direct attention.

If we turn to the Roman law, we find the actores declared that Ship Masters, Innkeepers and Stable-keepers, if they did not restore what they had received to keep safe, judgment should be given against them. Autæ caupones stabularii, quod cujusque rem fore reciperint, nisi restituent, in eos actionem dabo." (a) GAIUS says, that although neither ship masters, nor innkeepers, nor stable-keepers receive a compensation for mere custody; but ship masters for carriage of goods; and innkeepers for entertainment of their guests; and stable-keepers for the keeping of cattle; yet that they were bound for custody of the thing, in like manner as a fuller and tailor are bound for custody of the thing, ex locato, although they receive their compensation, not strictly for custody, but for the exercise of their art. (b)

In regard to INNKEEPERS, LORD KENYON thus described their duties—they are bound by law to receive guests who come to their inns, and are also bound to protect the property of those guests. They have no option either to receive or reject guests, and as they cannot refuse to receive guests, so neither can they impose unreasonable terms on them. (c) An Innkeeper, by the common law is liable to answer for all goods lodged in his inn by his guest; he is responsible for the acts of his servants, and also for the acts of his guests; or, according to the Register Brevium, by the custom of the realm, he is bound to keep the goods and chattels of his guests which are within his inn, without subtraction or loss, day and night, so that no damage shall come to them, from his negligence or that of his servants. He cannot discharge himself from his liability by alleging that he left the goods under the special care of the guest, by delivering to him the key of the chamber in which they were locked; and it is not necessary to prove negligence in the innkeeper, in order to charge him for the loss of goods in the inn; but he must discharge himself by shewing negligence or fraud in the guest. (d) Where, however, a guest had a private room in an inn, chosen by himself for the purpose of exhibiting his goods for sale, and the host at the same time that he granted the use of it, told him that there was a key, and that he might lock the door, which he neglected to do, it was determined that the host was not liable for the loss of these goods. (e) The custody of goods in an inn may be considered as accessory to the principal contract: and the money paid for the apartments as extending to the care of the box or portmanteau, (f) and the protection is not confined to the goods of persons going to and continuing in the inn as guests; for if a person carry a horse to an inn, and leave him there, the innkeeper is liable to make good any loss. (g)

In Bennett v. Mellor the plaintiff's servant came to an inn, and desired to have the liberty of leaving his master's goods, which he could not dispose of in the market, until the next week; that proposal was rejected by the innkeeper, and the servant sat down in the inn, had some liquor, and put the goods behind him, when he got up the goods were missing. ASHURST, J., held, that although this request was not complied with, he was entitled to protection for his goods during the time he continued in the inn as a guest; and BULLER, J., said, although the defendant refused to take charge of the goods until the next week, the circumstances of this case distinguish it from that cited (h) where the innkeeper said his house was full, and refused to take in the guest—that, if true, is a good excuse, and if false the inn-keeper is liable to an action for refusing to take in the guest. But here the request was merely to take care of the plaintiff's goods until the next week: if the defendant had taken the goods upon that request he could only have been liable as a bailee: but that proposal was not accepted, and then this case stands on general grounds. It is clear that the goods need not be in the special keeping of the inn-keeper in order to make him liable; if they be in the inn that is sufficient to charge him. In Cayle's case it is said, “although the guest doth not deliver his goods to the inn-holder to keep nor acquaints him with them, yet if they be carried away or stolen, the inn-keeper shall be charged; and therewith agrees ‘42 Ed. 3, 11. a.’” There it is said that on the word of the writ the inn-keeper is answerable for every thing in his inn, but not for a horse which the owner orders to be put out to pasture. One of the passages cited from Can Dig. (vol. 1, 229,) cannot be supported, taken in a general sense; for all the authorities agree that it is not necessary to prove negligence in the inn-keeper. GROSS, J. observed that Cayle's case is a good comment on the writ which gives this action without quoting. If indeed the inn-keeper had refused to take in the plaintiff's servant as guest, and he had, notwithstanding, gone into the inn, the plaintiff could not have charged the defendant with the loss of his goods: in such a case the inn-keeper refuses at his peril, and if it be without reason, an action lies for the refusal: but in this case there was no refusal of the person; the defendant merely refused to take care of the goods until the next week. And when the plaintiff's servant was sitting in the inn with the consent of the inn-keeper, (for the latter did not object to refuse him) he was in the same situation as any other guest, and entitled to the same protection for his goods.

This decision is founded upon the rule laid down in Cayle's case. It is not necessary that the goods should be in the special keeping of the inn-keeper; it is generally sufficient that they are in the inn. SIR WM. JONES says, "that rigorous as this rule may seem, and hard as it may actually be in one or two particular instances, it is founded on the great principle of public utility, to which all private considerations ought to yield.—For travellers, who must be numerous in a rich and commercial country, are obliged to rely almost implicitly on the good faith of inn-holders, whose education and morals are one of the best, and who might have frequent opportunities of associating with ruffians and pilferers, while the injured guest could seldom or never obtain legal proof of such combinations, or even of their negligence, if no actual fraud had been committed by them." (i)

This responsibility is said to be founded on the custom of the realm, (k) but it may be traced to the civil law.

POTHIER shows (l) the doctrine of the civil law to be that the inn-keeper is not only bound for good faith, as in the case of ordinary deposits, but also for exact care (unless exact) and that consequently he is responsible for ordinary neglect (de la faut le- gere,) he is liable for losses by theft of his domestics and of his guests, and of persons coming and going to and from the inn. The theft is imputed to his negligence if the goods are put into his custody; but if the goods are not put into his custody he is responsible only in case the theft is proved to have been by his domestics or other persons in his service, and not by other guests or travellers.—And the burthen of proof in such case is on the guest whose goods are stolen. If the guest chooses to keep the goods in his own custody, or if he confides them to another person not authorised by the inn-keeper to receive them, the latter is discharged from all responsibility, and this doctrine of the civil law has been adopted all over Europe. It is the law of France, (m) of Spain, (n) and of Scotland. (o)

ANSWER TO PROBLEM 2. VOL. 4.

LANDLORD AND TENANT—RE-ENTRY.

What are the necessary formalities required by the Common Law to enable a lessor to re enter for breach of the proviso, for re-entry on non-payment of rent? Suppose the condition to be that if the rent shall be in arrear for 21 days after any of the specified days of payment.

The formalities required are as follows: 1st. A demand must be made of the rent; but it may be made by an agent, having sufficient authority, which authority he is not bound to show unless required to do so, Doe dcm West v. Davis, 7 East. 363, and a demand of rent due from the lessee to the lessor, though made of a stranger, if made upon the land, is a sufficient demand, and need not be general to sustain ejectment, for a forfeiture on non-payment of rent being lawfully demanded, Doe d. Brooks v. Brydges, 2 Dowl. & Ryl. 29.

2nd. The demand must be of the precise rent due; for if a penny more or less be demanded, it will be ill. What remains payable after the land tax or a ground rent, demanded of and paid by the tenant, or any other part of the rent agreed upon, has been lawfully deducted by the tenant, will of course constitute the rent due. Sapsford v. Fletcher, 4 T. R. 511. In ejectment to recover demised premises for non-payment of rent, under the usual proviso for re-entry on non-payment for 21 days, it appeared that the rent was payable quarterly, and that a demand of more than one-quarter's rent was made on the 21st day at one o'clock; held that only one-quarter's rent should have been demanded, and that at sunset. Doe d. Wheeldan v. Paul, 3 Carr & Payne, 613.

(o) Brak. Inst. B. 3. tit. 1. L. 26.

3rd. It must be made precisely on the day on which the rent is due, and payable by the lease, to save the forfeiture.

4th. It must be made a convenient time before sunset.

5th. It must be made upon the land, and at the most notorious place of it; therefore, if there be a dwelling-house upon the land, the demand must be made at the front or fore door, though it is not necessary to enter the house; but if the tenant meet the lessor, either on or off the land, at any time of the last day of payment, and tender the rent, it is sufficient to save a forfeiture.

6th. Where a place is appointed, where rent is payable, the demand must be at such place and no other.

7th. A demand of rent must be made in fact, and be averred in pleading, although there should be no person on the land ready to pay it.

If after these requisites have been performed by the reversioner, the tenant neglect or refuse to pay the rent, then the reversioner is entitled to re-enter. See Mr. Serjeant Williams's note in 1 Saund. 287. n. 16.

A demand of rent is requisite, both by common law and the statute, as a clause of re-entry will never be allowed to operate further than as a security for rent. Ludwell v. Newman, 6 T. R. 458.

A material difference subsists between a remedy by re-entry and a remedy by distress, for the non-payment of rent. Where the remedy is by way of re-entry for non-payment, an actual demand must be made previous to the entry, otherwise it is tortious, and trespass will lie, because a condition of re-entry is no derogation of the grant, and the estate at law being once defeated, is not to be restored by any subsequent payment; but a notice of distress is of itself a demand. Shep. Touch. 148. n. 1.

Where a lease contained a proviso, that if the rent should be in arrear 21 days next after the day of payment being lawfully demanded, the lessor might re-enter; it was held that five-quarters being in arrear, the lessor might enter without a demand, no sufficient distress being on the premises. Doe d. Scholefield v. Alexander, 3 Camp. 516. R. J. T.

BAIL COURT.

re CECILIA MARIA COCHRANE, wife of ALEXANDER COCHRANE, Esq.

Mrs. Cochrane had obtained a Writ of Habeas corpus, directed to her husband, to bring into court his wife, detained (as was said in his custody), that she might be dealt with as the court should direct. The writ is dated 28th May last. It appeared from the affidavits, in support of the Habeas, that on the 17th Oct. 1833, in contemplation of marriage, a settlement was executed between Mr. Cochrane and his wife (then Miss MacDonnell), by which certain property of Miss MacDonnell was vested in trustees, upon trust for her separate use for her life; after her death, upon trust for her husband for life, with remainder to the children of the marriage. After marriage, Mrs. Cochrane, in consequence of treatment which she had received from her husband, went to reside, and had from that time till within about a week since, resided with her mother, separate and apart from her husband. A short time since, a party representing himself to be a Mr. Warwick, residing at No. 11, Great Castle-street, Regent-street, stated to her and her mother, that he had just come from America, that his father having been indebted to Mrs. Cochrane's father, he had been deputed to pay the amount; that the money was to be paid partly by herself and partly to her mother: but that he had to have a security against a bond given to his father, before the money was paid, and that she would have to sign such security it was necessary he should see her marriage settlement, which was in the possession of Messrs. Few, Hamilton, and Few, her solicitors, to see whether she was capable of entering into the security. Placing reliance in this statement, she came from Dublin to England, called upon her solicitors on the 21st May, and requested them to produce her settlement to Mr. Warwick when he should call to see it. She then went to the residence of the supposed Mr. Warwick, and found there her husband who detained her. She contrived to address a letter to a Mr. Woodward on the 22nd of May, informing him that the business relative to Mr. Warwick was all a fabrication, from beginning to end, made up by her husband to entrap her, and that she was then in custody of her husband, who was about to have her imprisoned in Whitecross-street prison for contempt of court, and requesting Mr. Woodward to mention this to her solicitors. A clerk of Messrs. Few and Co. in consequence of this statement on the 23rd May, went to the lodgings of Mr. Cochrane for the purpose of ascertaining whether Mrs. Cochrane was under duress or kept in confinement by her husband. On the door being opened, he enquired if he could see her; and he was desired by the servant to give his name, which he did, that the servant then went up stairs, and returned saying, that Mr. Cochrane wished any communication he had to make should be by letter; he then wrote a note desiring to see Mrs. Cochrane, which was taken up by the master of the house, who returned with a written evasive answer from Mr. Cochrane. The landlord of the house stated, that when he took the note the room door was locked, and was unlocked to take in the note, and that whilst he was waiting for an answer the room door was kept locked, and he could hear Mrs. Cochrane crying in the bedroom, and he believed that she was then kept confined by her husband against her will. On the 27th May, the same clerk again called at the lodgings of Mr. Cochrane, and on asking to see him he was shewn to his room, he did not deny that he was detaining his wife against her will; but stated, that he was keeping her until he could put her into prison, that she had run away from him, and he knew she would again if she could, but that he would take care she did not: that he (the clerk), asked to see her, stating that as Mr. Cochrane was taking legal proceedings against her, he surely would not deprive her of the assistance of her solicitors? Mr. Cochrane replied he would not allow him (the clerk), to see her until she gave him a copy of some letter she had the previous morning received from a relation, in order that he might send such copy to his solicitor, and which letter he admitted having read. Mrs. Cochrane hearing the clerk talking with her husband in the sitting room, knocked at the bedroom door from the inside, (the door having been locked by Mr. Cochrane as soon as the clerk entered), and begged of Mr. Cochrane to let her out, that she might speak with him, saying, he had promised her he would do so when he (the clerk) called; this Mr. Cochrane refused to do, when Mrs. Cochrane stated from the bed-room, speaking so that the clerk could hear through the door, that she had been kept confined by her husband ever since she had last seen him; that Mr. Cochrane had nailed down the window of her bed-room to prevent her escape, and kept the room doors locked: Mr. Cochrane who was present, did not deny the statement of his wife, and on the clerk asking Mrs. Cochrane whether she wished him to take any steps for her release, she said he had her full authority to take any steps for her release he might consider necessary for that purpose, and that she wished him to do so; that the clerk had frequently requested Mr. Cochrane to allow him to communicate with his wife, in order that he might consult with her upon the course to be taken, but Mr. Cochrane wholly refused to allow him to see Mrs. Cochrane or to communicate with her, and finding that Mr. Cochrane would not allow the clerk to do so, he (her solicitor) had been unable to procure any affidavit from her. Mr. Cochrane's pretence for confining her was that he had a writ against her, (a) and that he had fabricated the tale to bring her within the jurisdiction of the court, and that he should detain her.

Sir Wm. Follett appeared to support the habeas, and said, this is an extremely hard case on the part of Mrs. Cochrane, who is a young and interesting lady, highly accomplished, and well connected, who was compelled to leave her husband by his ill treatment, and has for the last 4 years lived separate from him, residing with her mother in Ireland. There is one child of the marriage which is with the mother, and the object of the husband in getting possession of the wife is believed to be for the sole purpose of living upon her and her mother, as the latter cannot live separate from her daughter and the husband has no means of supporting himself. Immediately after the separation, he sued his wife for a restoration of conjugal rights, and obtained a decree against her in the Ecclesiastical Court, suing in that court in forma pauperis, the proceedings upon the contempt have expired, and he is now trying to revive them, that he may commit his wife to prison if she refuses to live with him, but it is considered that the proceedings have expired, and that he will not be able to revive them so as to obtain a warrant to commit her for contempt. The court, on the wife being brought up, will discharge her we trust from the confinement in which her husband is now keeping her in, and leave her liberty to go where she pleases, which is all we fear that can be asked.

Mr. Ball appeared for the husband, and shewed cause against the writ.

COLERIDGE, J. observed, that the question for decision upon the rule was, whether, by the common law of this country, a husband has the right, for the purpose of preventing his wife from eloping, to confine her to his dwelling-house, and restrain her from her liberty for an indefinite period, there being no charge against him of using unnecessary cruelty or imposing any hardship or any unnecessary restraint, and it not being alleged that any part of the lady's past conduct was such as to afford any reason to believe that she would avail herself of her absence from her husband's control to pursue any course of conduct which could injure his property or honour. His Lordship went on to observe that it appeared from the return to the writ of habeas corpus that the parties had lived together for three years immediately after their marriage upon terms of apparent affection, and had two children, and that the lady had quitted her husband and removed the children and herself from under his protection, without any imputation upon him of immorality, coldness, or cruelty, and had resided away from him for nearly four years; during all or the greater part of which time her place of residence, in Ireland or France, was unknown to him. It further appeared that she had been induced to return to this country and placed in his power by a stratagem only, and that she has repeatedly asserted, and still avows the same intention, "that whenever she has it in her power she will again run away, and that he shall never see or hear of her again." His Lordship proceeded to say, it is but justice to add on the other side that Mrs. Cochrane left her husband either in the actual company of her mother, a widow, who had been residing with her daughter and son-in-law, or that Mrs. Cochrane joined her mother soon after her departure from her husband; that she had resided under her mother's roof since that time; and that there is nothing in the return which justifies the slightest imputation upon her honour. I have not been able to meet in the books with any case which was circumstanced like the present. There can be no doubt of the general dominion which the law of England attributes to the husband over the wife. In Bacon's Abridgment, "Baron and Feme," letter B., it is thus stated:—"The husband hath by law power and dominion over his wife."

(a) We are informed by Messrs. Few, Hamilton, and Few, that the writ de contumace capiendo, had expired, and Mr. Cochrane had neglected to get it returned, and keep it alive under the statute of 5 Eliz. and the LORD CHANCELLOR refused to revive it, on the same day that Mrs. Cochrane was brought up under the habeas.—ED.

and may keep her by force within the bounds of civility, and may beat her, but not in a violent or cruel manner; for in such case, or if he but threaten to beat her outrageously, or use her barbarously, she may bind him to the peace by giving a writ of supplicavit out of Chancery, or may apply to the Spiritual Court for a divorce propter sevitiā. But the husband hath by law a right to the custody of his wife, and may, if he think fit, confine, but not imprison her." Now, although by our ancient law the wife was entitled in case of violence inflicted, or only threatened, to sue out her writ of supplicavit, the writ in such cases contained an express reservation of the lawful power of the husband. She was to be bound "Quod ipse prefatum A. (the wife) bene et honeste tractabit et gubernabit dampna et malam aliquid de corpore suo aliter quam ad virum suum ex causa regiminis et castimonis uxoris subicite, et rationabiliter pertinet a faciet nec fieri procurabit" (a). On the other hand, there are numerous authorities to show that the Court will interpose their protection whenever the husband attempts to abuse his marital power for any improper purpose, or by wanton or excessive exercise of it. The King v. Leyster (b) was a case of the former kind, where the defendant, between whom and his wife a deed of separation had been executed, by which some part of her fortune had been made over to him, and the rest settled upon her for her separate use, had seized on her by force, and carried her to a remote place, where he kept her under a guard, and he had declared that he took her into his power in order to prevail with her to part with some of her separate maintenance. The Court discharged the lady from her imprisonment, and intimated to the defendant that he would bear a heavy hand over him if for the future he should act contrary to their declared opinion, that his confining her was entirely unlawful. And in Gregory's case (c) was an instance of the latter kind, where the wife had been very ill-used by her husband, and had upon fled from him to her mother and uncle for security and protection. The husband had been brought up by writ of habeas corpus, but the Court would not deliver her to him, but told her she was at liberty to go where she thought proper, and at her request gave her a tipstaff to protect her from any insult in her return to her father. The case of Mrs. Wilkes (d), under the name of the "King v. Mary Read," may be added to that. The Court in that case refused to compel a wife to return to her husband, where articles of agreement for a separation had been executed between them, and he had covenanted to let her live separate from him, and not to molest her, and she was accordingly living with her mother. But Lord Mansfield put this upon the ground of a voluntary renunciation by the husband of his marital rights, and at the same time strongly asserted the general rule. "The husband," said he, "has, in consequence of his marriage, a right to the custody of his wife, and whoever detains her from him violates that right, and he has a right to seize her wherever he finds her." In the present case it cannot be pretended that Mr. Cochrane has forfeited his rights or renounced them. It is not insinuated that he has abused or will abuse them. But in the argument before me at Chambers reliance was placed upon the expressions of the Court in "The King v. Leyster," "That where the wife will make an undue use of her liberty, either by squandering away the husband's estate, or going into lewd company, it is lawful for the husband in order to preserve his honour and estate to lay such a wife under a restraint, but where nothing of that kind appears he cannot justify the depriving her of her liberty. The present case was urged to be one in which the wife had not made, nor would make an undue use of her liberty, and therefore that she was entitled to her discharge. It appears to me that the words which I have cited from "the King v. Leyster," must be understood with reference to the case then before the Court, in which violence and actual imprisonment in the popular sense of the term had been used for an unlawful purpose. If they could be fairly extended to such a case as the present, they would deny the general right of the husband to the control and custody of his wife, and restrain it to those cases, comparatively few in number, in which his misconduct made it palpably unsafe to allow her to be at large. This, however, would be inconsistent with the doctrine clearly laid down by the older authorities. The general rule would then be that the wife, as to her residence and manner of passing her time, would be independent of her husband, and the case in which the right of control arose, would only be exceptions to the general rule. But our law has not so limited the husband's rights, nor placed them upon so narrow a foundation. Although expressed in terms which are plain almost to rudeness, the principle upon which it proceeds is broad and comprehensive. It has respect to the terms of the marriage contract and the infirmity of the sex. For the honour and happiness of both parties, it places the wife under the guardianship of the husband, and entitles him for the sake of both to protect her from the danger of unrestrained intercourse with the world, by enforcing co-habitation and a common residence.—

d) Bengal 279, and reported in 2 Burr.

Mrs. Cochrane has lived apart from her husband for four years, without any imputation upon her character. But she must allow him to say, that her husband, with the highest opinion of her virtue, might yet be excused, even by her, if he felt uneasy when he learned, as stated in the return, that she had gone to masked balls at Paris, with persons whom he did not know. He may well be desirous, and he has a right, to restrain her from the power to frequent such amusements unprotected by his presence, and without his permission. She too, though she might feel secure, was not therefore the more safe at such places, and at any rate she has not the right to bring his honour or her own into possible or even imaginary danger. It is urged that by refusing to discharge her, I am sentencing her to perpetual imprisonment. Cases of hardship must arise under any general rule, and so long as there are unfortunately ill-assorted unions there will be cases in which wives will find it hard to be compelled to reside with their husbands. But our law, for the wisest reasons, allows of no divorce upon such grounds, and I cannot doubt that a greater amount of human happiness is produced in the married state, from the mutual concession and forbearance which a sense of the indissolubility of these unions tends to produce, than would be enjoyed in the carelessness and want of self-government which would be the inevitable consequence of rendering the matrimonial tie less firm and permanent. I express here very imperfectly what has been so wisely and eloquently said by a great master in this branch of the law, and the passage has such a direct, and, I hope, so useful a bearing on this subject, that I cannot deny myself the pleasure of reading it. The learned judge then proceeded to read the following passage from the judgment of Sir W. Scott (afterwards Lord Stowell) in the case of "Evans v. Evans." (e) "The law has said that married persons shall not be legally separated upon the mere disinclination of one or both to cohabit together. The disinclination must be founded upon reasons which the law approves. To vindicate the policy of the law is no necessary part of the duty of a judge, but if it were, it would not be difficult to show that the law in this respect has acted with its usual wisdom and humanity, with that true wisdom and that real humanity which regard the general interests of mankind. For though in particular cases the repugnance of the law to dissolve the obligations of matrimonial cohabitation may operate with great severity upon individuals, yet it must be carefully remembered, that the general happiness of the married life is secured by its indissolubility. When people understand that they must live together except for a very few reasons known to the law, they learn to soften by mutual accommodation that yoke which they know that they cannot shake off; they become good husbands and good wives, from the necessity of remaining husbands and wives, for necessity is a powerful master in teaching the duties which it imposes. If it were once understood that upon mutual disgust married persons might be legally separated, many couples that now pass through the world with mutual comfort, with attention to their common offspring, and to the moral order of society, might have been at this moment living in a state of mutual unkindness—in a state of estrangement from their common offspring—and in a state of the most unrestrained and licentious immorality. In this case as in many others the happiness of some individuals must be sacrificed to the greater and more general good." But, if there be any thing painful to Mrs. Cochrane in the present state of things, she cannot properly complain of it; for it arises from her own breach of duty, and she may end it when she pleases by cheerfully and frankly performing the contract into which she has entered. The moment that she makes restraint of her person to be unnecessary for keeping in the path of duty, the restraint will become illegal, and nothing which I have said to-day will prevent her from again coming to this Court for protection. I am of opinion, therefore, that she must be restored to her husband; but as it was intimated to me yesterday that her mother was ill, and that she was anxious to go and see her, I should hope that Mr. Cochrane will be ready to gratify so proper and reasonable a wish, if she on her part will give a satisfactory pledge that she will return to him at some specified period—a pledge which she ought not to hesitate to give nor omit to keep faithfully. For the present she must be restored to her husband.

KIRK v. DOLBY.

WRITS AND COPIES—ALTERATION OF, AFTER SERVICE—PRACTICE.—Whether a Judge has power to Order the Amendment of a Writ under the General Rules agreed upon by the Judges of all the Courts after tested by mistake after Service.

Mr. Martin had obtained a rule nisi in the case to show cause why an order made by GRANEY, B. on the 23rd May last at Chambers that the writ of summons issued herein and served be amended by altering the teste to the 4th May, on payment of costs, the defending 5 days time to plead after amendment and ment of costs should not be rescinded.

It appeared by the affidavit of the plaintiff's k, who prepared and issued the writ, that he, some mistake, tested the writ and the copy the 4th April instead of the 4th May, but the Precipe for the writ was properly dated 4th May, and the writ was sued out on the r day, and the copy was served upon the ndant on the 6th May.

The action was upon a Bill of Exchange, of ch the defendant was the acceptor, which be- e due on the 1st May. The plaintiff declared, the defendant applied for leave to plead ral matters, amongst which was one, that bill was not due at the time of the com- cement of the action. This was correct in tion to the date of the writ and copy served, esequently, without the amendment the plea ld be an answer to the action.

Mr. Humphrey now showed cause against rule, upon the ground that the precipe was d correctly, and that the teste of the writ a mere clerical error, and which the Court ht to allow under the General Rules agreed n by the Judges of all the Courts in pur- ice of the statute 2 W. 4. c. 39. s. 14. haelmas Term, 3 W. 4. s. 10. (a) which treats matters omitted by mere mistake. He cited Field v. Street, 2 Dowl. Rep. 740. which rmined that the Court had the power to nd the writ but not the copy, which is the of the party over which the Court has no rol; and contended that the Court had the er to amend the writ in this case by making rrespond with the precipe.

Mr. Martin called the attention of the Court everal cases on the subject of amendments, h went to show that since the Uniformity of ress Act, such amendments had been dis- tenanced by all the Courts.

Lord ABINGER said, that as it was very rable there should be a common understanding upon this subject between all the Courts, the case should stand over, in order that the result might be arrived at by the general body of the Judges.

June 16.

Mr. Humphrey again brought this question before the Court.—Rule discharged.

The plaintiff to be at liberty to change the venue, and the defendant to have time till Tues- day next to plead.—Writ to be amended.

SHAW v. SCARISBRICK.

SUBPŒNA duces tecum — ATTACHMENT against a Sheriff for disobedience of this writ in not producing his warrant at the trial of an action for escape.

An action was brought against the Sheriff of Lancashire for an escape, and was tried before Mr. JUSTICE COLBRIDGE at Liverpool, at the last assizes, when, in consequence of the non- production of the warrant at the trial by the witness who was subpoenaed for that purpose, who was the sheriff's officer, the plaintiff was nonsuited. A rule nisi had been obtained by the plaintiff to set aside the nonsuit, on the ground that the plaintiff had been misled by the warrant at the time of the service of the subpoena. A rule nisi had also been obtained for an at- tachment against the witness for disobedience of the subpœna duces tecum, in not producing the warrant, and the two rules came on for argument together.

Mr. Cresswell, in showing cause, relied on the affidavits in answer, which, he submitted, dis- tinctly negatived the allegation that the plaintiff had been misled by any representation of the witness that he had possession of the warrant at the time of the service of the subpoena. That witness in his affidavit denied that he made any such statement. He contended that the plaintiff had not exercised the necessary diligence, or taken the obviously necessary precautions before going to trial. The warrant had been deposited in the sheriff's office to enable him to make his return to the writ of capias, and if the plaintiff had gone to the office he might have found it there.

Mr. Sergeant Atcherley, in support of the rule, said it was necessary, in an action against a sheriff, to produce the warrant, in order to con- nect the sheriff with the acts of his officer (who was the real defendant). If the manœuvre which had been practised in this case by the witness, were allowed, a sheriff, against whom an action his rule has been holden to be compulsory on the tiff, and it applies to process issued under the . 4. c. 39. against attorneys. It has also been rmined on this rule that a motion to set aside the ce of a writ of distringas on the ground of an ularity in the indorsements thereon, &c. must be e within a reasonable time after the service of; and that eighteen days is an unreasonable y in this respect, provided the defendant might come earlier (*Wright v. had been brought, had only to place the warrant in the hands of some person five minutes before the trial, and then he could at once defeat the action.

ALDERSON, B.—He would be liable to an attachment for that.

Mr. Sergeant Atcherley admitted this, but an attachment was not always a competent remedy. The plaintiff did not want an attachment. He had brought his action against the sheriff, and he wanted to recover damages against the sheriff. He denied that the plaintiff ought to have gone to the sheriff's office; it was the duty of the officer to keep the warrant in his possession, so as to be enabled to produce it when called upon to do so.

PARKE, B.—No, no. He may do what he likes with it; only it is usual for the officer to keep it for his own protection.

ALDERSON, B. asked whether the plaintiff would agree to pay the costs of the last trial?

Mr. Sergeant Atcherley asked whether his lordship thought he ought to pay the costs?

PARKE, B. said it was clear the plaintiff was out of court upon the affidavits. The rule was obtained on the ground that the plaintiff had been misled by a representation of the witness that he had possession of the warrant at the time of the subpoena; but this allegation was distinctly denied by the affidavit of the witness himself. The plaintiff might, if he thought proper, bring an action against the witness for disobeying the subpoena, and no doubt he would recover damages.

ALDERSON, B. said the fact was, the plaintiff had not taken even ordinary precaution before going to trial; and he thought, therefore, that if the court granted a new trial it must be on the terms of paying the costs of the last trial, and then the plaintiff might go if he thought fit and see if he could do better another time.

The Court said they thought that the allegation in the affidavits, upon which the rule was obtained, had been fully and satisfactorily answered by the affidavits on the other side. The charge of misleading the plaintiff by a representation that the witness had possession of the warrant at the time of the service of the subpoena was negatived, and, therefore, if the plaintiff was to have a new trial it must be on the terms of paying the costs of the former trial. As to the rule for an attachment against the witness there were no grounds whatever for sustaining it, and it must, therefore, be discharged with costs.

Rule for a new trial made absolute upon payment of costs.

Rule for an attachment discharged with costs.

PREROGATIVE COURT—May 1.

WILL OF HUGH DONALDSON, DECEASED.

Whether a Surgeon on board one of His Majesty's Ships belonging to the service of the East India Company, in charge of recruits for the Queen's service, shall be considered "a Soldier in actual Military Service," to come within the exception of the Statute sec. 11.

The deceased, Dr. Donaldson, was an assistant surgeon in the military service of the East India Company, and had embarked to join his regiment in India, on board a ship in which recruits, also going to India in the Queen's service, and they were placed under his medical superintendence. While on board this ship, he made a will that was not attested, and he died soon after he joined his regiment; and upon application being made for probate, a question arose whether the will came within the exception of the 11th sec. of the New Will Act, he being "a soldier in actual military service."

Sir H. JENNER, said, the deceased could not be held a surgeon in Her Majesty's service, though temporarily in charge of Her Majesty's lieutenants, because he still remained in the service of the East India Company. It has been held in relation to mariners that the 11th section of the act extends to the Merchant service, and by parity of reasoning, it would seem that soldiers in the East India Company's service should also be included. There is nothing in the clause which can be construed to limit the exception to soldiers in Her Majesty's service. The deceased was in actual military service at the time he made his will, and I am of opinion that, according to the decisions already made respecting commissioned officers, (a) as distinguished from persons not commissioned, (a) the deceased was at the time of making his will, "a soldier in actual military service," and comes within the exception contemplated by sec. 11 of the Statute. The will does not appoint any executor or residuary legatee.

Administration granted, with the will annexed, to the mother of the deceased.

SOLVENT DEBTORS' COURT—June.

CASE OF FRANCIS FORSYTH.

Power acquired property—Power of the Court to order judgment to be entered upon the Insolvent's Warrant of Attorney.

The insolvent was discharged in March, 1837, and he gave up his life interest in some property which he possessed by the will of his father, under which will he had the power of appointment in regard to other property. He died in 1833, and by his will directed that his debts contracted since January 1831 should be paid, and none others. In 1836, a suit was commenced in the Court of Chancery, to which the persons now before this court were parties, and the Lord Chancellor had directed an account of assets to be taken from the 13th January, 1827, on which day the insolvent had petitioned the court, with a view of payment. The question respecting the creditors in the schedule was sent to this court for their opinion.

THE COURT was of opinion that execution on a warrant of attorney should issue for 515*l* for the creditors in the schedule (being a share of the property), but not to be enforced without the sanction of the court. The court had no power to interfere with the judgment entered upon the warrant of attorney.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT—June 15.

The proceedings of this court re-commenced this day. The Recorder has been seriously indisposed for several weeks, and was prevented from attending the court.

The extraordinary character of several of the cases that have been sent for investigation at the present sessions has occasioned greater interest to be attached to it than has been felt respecting any other since the establishment of the court, and there was an appearance of anxiety and excitement exhibited yesterday of a quite unusual character.

The COMMON SERGEANT delivered the following CHARGE to the GRAND JURY, upon the CASES in the Calendar—for HIGH TREASON, in compassing or imagining the Death of THE QUEEN, (Oxford's); for MURDER, (Courvoisier's), and for BURGLARY, (Gould's).

"Gentlemen of the Grand Jury,—Your duty on the present occasion will oblige you to consider cases of almost every description of crime in law books. The calendar sometimes contains a greater number of prisoners, but a more serious catalogue of offences seldom has been submitted to the consideration of a grand inquest.

"The first cause to which I shall call your attention is that of Robert Oxford, who is charged with high treason—the highest crime against human society—bringing with it the most fatal consequences, not only to her Majesty herself, but to the Government, and the peace and happiness of the nation. Every attempt levelled at the person of the Sovereign is levelled at public tranquillity. The offence is the most serious known to the law—it has ever been received as of the deepest dye, and calling for the most severe punishment.

"The statute 26 Edward I., is the first that declares it to be treason 'to compass or imagine the death of our Lord the King,' within which designation a Queen regnant is included. A subsequent statute in the reign of George III, enacts, 'That if any person shall compass, imagine, design, or intend death or destruction, or any bodily harm, TENDING to death or destruction, or to maim or wound, the person of the King, being convicted thereof, he shall be declared and adjudged a traitor.'

"Gentlemen, the first question for your consideration will be to refer to the evidence which will be laid before you as to the prisoner's 'compassing, imagining, and intending the death of her Majesty the Queen,' and also to inquire into the overt act by which such intention may be manifested. Everything wilfully done or attempted, whereby the Queen's life is endangered, is, in law, an overt act of compassing her death.

"It will be proved by several witnesses that they saw the prisoner fire or discharge two shots at the carriage in which her Majesty was sitting; that they observed him take deliberate aim and point the pistol at the Queen and her consort Prince Albert.

"Gentlemen, you will necessarily inquire as to whether the pistols were loaded, and this perhaps may be proved in different ways. If, for instance, it should appear that there are marks in the wall of a ball or bullet in the direction in which the pistol was fired, it will be natural for you to inquire as to the time when those marks were first seen; or if a piece of lead should be produced, apparently having been of the size of a pistol ball (though now quite flattened, as if by concussion against a wall.)

"Formerly, it was always necessary under numerous acts of Parliament made for the benefit of the party accused, that two lawful witnesses should be called to prove the treason, and other preliminary circumstances required that this rule should be extended to the finding of a bill by the grand jury, as well as to the trial in open court; but it was enacted by the 39th and 40th Geo. III., cap. 93 (A.D. 1800), that in such cases this was unnecessary. (Vide the statute.)

"It is true that this statute goes on to negative the acts of Wm. III. and Queen Anne, touching the trials of treason; notwithstanding it is clear that, under the provisions of the 39th and 40th Geo. III., two witnesses are not now necessary to prove treason in any direct attempt against the person or life of her Majesty; and the question is settled by the provisions of a subsequent act—viz., 57th Geo. III., cap. 6, sec. 4.

"Gentlemen, as there are several witnesses in this case, you will have no difficulty, as the equity and justice of our criminal law are here manifest—as there is no more evidence necessary to prove a direct attack upon the person of her Majesty than is required to prove an attempt on the life of either of her subjects, even be he the humblest individual in the land.

"The next case, gentlemen, to which I call your attention, is that of Francis Benjamin Courvoisier, who stands charged with the murder of Lord William Russell, on the night between Tuesday the 5th and Wednesday the 6th of May, on which morning the noble lord was found dead in his bed, when a wound was found from the top of his right shoulder to the right side of his throat, of the depth of four inches.

"It cannot be doubted but that this wound was the cause of his lordship's death, and could only have been inflicted by the hand of another, according to the evidence of medical men, who made a post mortem examination; but also from the fact, that no instrument was found in his lordship's bed-room.

"Gentlemen, the case will rest principally on circumstantial or presumptive evidence—this is, on the fair and reasonable inferences that may be drawn by your calm judgment, be drawn from the existence of all the facts and circumstances connected with the transaction.

"This species of evidence is that which is the peculiar province of a jury to deal with; and the question is, whether there be or not circumstances amply satisfactory to induce you to send the case for the investigation of a court and jury.

"In considering this investigation you will, first, probably, inquire whether there is any appearance of any forcible entry having been made from without the premises, or whether the acts of violence have not been made within. This circumstance will then probably induce you to consider whether this murder could have been committed by a stranger, without the aid or assistance of some person or persons within the house, or some of the family of Lord William Russell.

"Gentlemen, the motives and objects of the murderer will naturally next present themselves for your consideration, and you will inquire respecting the property of the deceased—whether, and what, was missing; and, if missing, where, any, and what, and where it was found. Our experience teaches us that when men commit crimes of this character, and take valuable property from the parties whom they attack—that such property is generally carried off the premises—at all events, such portions of it as are visible, and likely to create the suspicion, will cite the attention of the police.

"It will be proved, gentlemen, that a 10l. note and a gold clasped purse, five rings, and several coins, were found behind the skirting board in the prisoner's pantry; a gold seal and a sealing ring behind a pipe in the scullery; a gold locket, which had been missed before, under the hearth; and between the board and the leading of the stairs which had been removed from the prisoner's room was also found a gold watch—all the property of the late Lord William Russell, and property which does not appear to have been missed or taken from his lordship before the night of the murder.

"Again, in the portmanteau of the prisoner two pocket handkerchiefs are found, each containing slight spots of blood, and in his shirt are found a pair of gloves marked with spots of blood; and in considering this part of the case, dates may be immaterial, and, gentlemen, let not the dates of the 6th, 10th, and 13th of May, escape your collection.

[The COMMON SERGEANT here alluded to the fact of the locket having been missed before the time of the murder, and concealed in the same way as the other property subsequently missed.]

"These circumstances (continued his lordship), connected with the places where the property was found, and the appearances from the marks of violence on the door from within, necessarily draw suspicion, to say the least, and deserve inquiry, on those resident within the house.

"The observations and conduct of the party accused, before and immediately after the transaction, in all cases, whether of murder or felony, are always important. On entering on this investigation, gentlemen, you will be good enough to dismiss from your minds anything you may have read or heard before, and draw such inferences as reasonable men may reasonably deduce, remembering that you are not to try the prisoner, but to ascertain whether there is presumptive evidence sufficient to justify you putting the prisoner on his trial.

"Gentlemen, the next case we have to advert to is that of Richard Gould, who is charged with the crime of burglary. Burglary is the breaking and entering the mansion-house of another, between the hours of nine in the evening and six in the morning, with the intent to kill some reasonable creature, or to commit a felony. Unfastening and opening a window, pulling down the sash of a window, the removal of a piece of paper affixed to glass, and thereby opening a window, are sufficient proofs of breaking and entering a mansion or dwelling-house.

"On Monday, March 16, Mr. Templeman, who lived in a cottage at Islington, received 19 half-crowns about half-past three in the afternoon.

"On Tuesday, the 17th, he was found murdered, and it appeared that a piece of glass had been taken from a window, by which a button might be turned, and a person enter. A mahogany box appeared to have been opened, as if with a chisel, and the place was found in a state of disorder. On the premises were left two flash notes of the 'Bank of Elegance,' one for 50*l.*, the other for 5*l.*

"On Thursday, the 12th of March, the prisoner stated to a witness, who would be called, that he was pinched for money, but he knew of an old gentleman had who got some."

"On Friday, the 13th, he applied to two witnesses for a screw and darkey (that is a crow-bar and a dark-lantern,) declaring, at the same time, that he must have money, and that he was going to an old gentleman, in a lonely cottage, not far off.

"On Monday night, (March 16), the prisoner was at the Rainbow public-house playing at skittles, when he had only 1½*d.* in his possession. He won 2*d.* and out of the money he purchased a rushlight, and he did not quit the Rainbow till a quarter to twelve o'clock.

"On Tuesday morning, the 17th, the prisoner returned to Wilson's cottage (about 500 yards from Mr. Templeman's), about two or three o'clock. He went to bed, and got up at half-past seven, and went into the wash-house and water-closet, where he remained about ten minutes in each of those places. He appears to have asked for a towel, and to have done something to his trousers. He left the cottage about eight in the morning, and returned in the evening, when he had a new pair of shoes.

"On Wednesday (the next day), between the tiles and the ceiling of the water-closet, was found a stocking containing 19 half-crowns, 48 shillings and 7 sixpences, making 4*l.* 19*s.* The stocking was identified by the landlady as having belonged to the prisoner. If the prisoner committed the burglary, it must have been done between one and three o'clock in the morning.

"In addition to this evidence confession has been made by the prisoner to an officer, but before he did so it appears clear that some one had informed him that 200*l.* reward had been offered. It appears most material to the ends of justice that this matter should be fully inquired into.

"If the confession was made under the fallacy of hope, it comes in a questionable shape, and may not be admissible in evidence, the rule of law being that if a prisoner is influenced by any promise the confession cannot be received.

"On the other hand, the law and the practice is, that it is admissible for a witness to say he received a communication from the prisoner—that in consequence of such communication he went to a certain place, and in that place found the goods or property specified and described. A witness will state that he went in consequence of a statement made to a field, and in a pond there he found a chisel and a lantern, with part of a rushlight in it, and he will tell you that the chisel corresponds with the marks on Mr. Templeman's box.

"Gentlemen, these are circumstances which will come before you, and I am sure will be thoroughly and properly investigated."

LAW OF MARRIAGE.—We beg to call the attention of our readers to an advertisement in another part of our paper relating to restraints on marriage, which we hope to see shortly placed upon some certain basis, consistent with sound reason and good sense.

REVIEW OF NEW BOOKS.

A LAW GRAMMAR, or RUDIMENTS of the LAW. By GILES JACOB, Author of the LAW DICTIONARY. Eighth edition, greatly enlarged and carefully revised, by JOHN HARGRAVE, Esq. of the Inner Temple. London: WILLIAM CROFTS, 19, Chancery Lane. 1840.

This work, having already passed through seven editions, speaks for itself that it merits attention. The present edition embraces the important alterations which have been made in the Criminal Law, as also in that relating to real property; but the editor has not interfered with those branches of learning which, being now altered by modern enactment, still require to be understood by the student, such as the law relating to Fines and Recoveries. The editor has also made an alteration of great utility, viz. the arrangement, under proper chapters, of the various divisions of the law, and he expresses his object to be to prepare a correct epitome of the existing law, and in such a form as will most benefit the younger branches of the profession. The editor concludes his Preface by quoting a passage from Mr. Preston's work, upon Abstracts of Title. "Any work which is calculated to abridge the labour of the student, by bringing the points together under each head into one view, and under an arrangement enabling him to find that of which he is in search with the least possible delay, is of more value than can be conceived by any but those whose practical experience has taught them its importance."

A Table of Descents, as altered by 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 106., is prefixed to the work.

ESSAY.

ON THE ENGLISH LAW OF BAILMENTS.

WE will now turn attention to COMMON CARRIERS for hire. Locatio operis indendi, the 5th class of LORD HOLT's Bailments, who says, the law charges this person entrusted to carry goods, against all risks, but acts of God, and of the enemies of the King; for though the force be never so great, as if an irresistible multitude of robbers should rob him, nevertheless he is responsible. And this is a politic establishment contrived by the policy of the Law for the safety of all persons the necessity of whose affairs oblige them to trust these sorts of persons, that they may be safe in their business of dealing. Sir William Jones, in observing upon this doctrine, says the ground of this resolution is not the reward of the carrier, upon which Sir Edward Coke lays much stress; but the public employment exercised by the carrier, and the danger of his combining with robbers, to the infinite injury of commerce and extreme inconvenience to society, he is treated as an insurer against all but the excepted perils, upon that distrust, which an ancient writer has called the sinew of wisdom; (b) or as described by LORD MANSFIELD, "A carrier is in the nature of an insurer. It is laid down that he is liable for every accident, except by the Act of God, or the King's enemies." (c) A carrier differs in this from a bailee, the latter only engages to

tit. 5.; Vinn. Com. in Just. Inst. lib. 3. tit. 27. text 11 n. 2.; but the COMMON LAW of England imposes much greater responsibility upon carriers than the CIVIL LAW.

(c) Forward v. Pittard, 1 Term. Rep. 33.

K

take care of goods as his own, and is not answerable for a robbery, but a carrier insures. (d) So BEST, C.J., in Riley v. Horne, (e) observed, when goods are delivered to a carrier, they are usually no longer under the eye of the owner; he seldom follows or sends any servant with them to the place of their destination. If they should be lost or injured by the grossest negligence of the carrier or his servants, or stolen by them, or by thieves in collusion with them, the owner would be unable to prove either of these causes of loss; his witnesses must be the carrier's servants, and they, knowing that they could not be contradicted, would excuse their masters and themselves.

To give due security to property, the law has added to that responsibility of a carrier, which immediately rises out of his contract, to carry for a reward, namely, that of taking all reasonable care of it, the responsibility of an insurer.

From his liability as an insurer, the carrier is only to be relieved by two things, both so well known to all the country when they happen, that no person would be so rash as to attempt to prove, that they had happened when they had not—namely, the act of God and the King's enemies.

COMMON CARRIERS are of two kinds.

1. Carriers by land.
2. Carriers by water.

The law relating to both is the same. (f)

Of the first class are the proprietors of stage coaches, trucks, teams, waggons, carts, and other persons who undertake to transport from place to place by land, for hire.

Of the second class are the proprietors of ships, steam-boats, barges, canal boats, and other persons who in like manner undertake to carry goods from place to place, by water, for hire.

The proprietors of stage coaches who only carry passengers for hire, as hackney coachmen, cab-men, and such like, are not deemed common carriers, and consequently are not held responsible for the goods of passengers, except where goods are carried as well as passengers. (g)

Nor is the proprietor of a stage coach liable for goods lost by the coachman, unless he is paid for the carriage. This was determined by Lord Holt in Middleton v. Forster, where the plaintiff took a place in the defendant's coach, and delivered his trunk to the coachman, which was lost on the road. The Chief Justice said, that a stage coachman was not within the custom of a carrier is, unless such as take a distinct price for carriage of goods, as well as persons, as waggons with coaches; and though money be given to the driver, yet that is gratuity, and cannot bring the master within the custom; for no master is chargeable with the acts of his servant, but when he acts in execution of the authority given to his master, and then the act of the servant is the act of the master (h); but this does not apply to proprietors of stage coaches who receive the baggage of their passengers without compensation, the custody of the baggage being, as in the case of an innkeeper, accessory to the principal contract, and they may be considered in regard to such baggage as common carriers (i), it appears to be the present doctrine. Common carriers are also responsible for all persons in their employ. Lord Mansfield, in Gibson v. Payton, which was an action against a stage coachman for not delivering money sent, said, a common carrier, in respect of the premium he is to receive, runs the and must make good the loss, though it happen without any fault in him, the reward making him answerable for the safe delivery<sup>(k)</sup>. The breaking down of a stage coach is prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the proprietor and his servants to make the former liable for damages and loss<sup>(l)</sup>.

If a vendee of goods orders them to be sent by a particular carrier, a delivery to him or his servant, vests the property in the vendee, who may bring trover against a stranger that detains, or takes them away; or if they are damaged or lost, the vendee must stand to the loss, and the action against the carrier can only be brought in his name. Where a tradesman ordered goods to be sent to him, and in his letter added, "pray be expeditious in sending them, and instead of letting them go by the way of Bristol, where many things you have sent me, have been detained, send them by land carriage," the goods were delivered to the book-keeper of the Birmingham carrier, to be sent from thence by way of Coventry to the vendee, who lived at Carmarthen; and it appeared there was no other mode of conveyance by land carriage. The goods being lost, the vendor brought an action against the vendee for the price, insisting that the delivery to the carrier was a delivery to the defendant; but the learned Judge who tried the cause being of a different opinion, nonsuited the plaintiff. However, the Court of King's Bench held that, as there was no other mode of sending the goods by land carriage, it amounted to the same thing as if the defendant had ordered the goods to be sent by the Birmingham carrier, particularly by name; and therefore the delivery being made according to the order of the defendant was a delivery to, and vested the property in, the defendant; and the nonsuit was set aside. Vale v. Bayle, Cowp. 294. So where a tradesman in the country gave an order for goods from London, and directed them to be sent by a particular carrier, to whom they were accordingly delivered by the vendor, who had them booked, and paid for it: the goods being lost, the vendor brought an action against the carrier, but was nonsuited, and the nonsuit confirmed by the Court, who held that, by the delivery to a particular carrier according to the vendee's direction, the property vested in him, and of course he must stand to the risk; that the money for booking was paid by the vendor as agent of the vendee, and therefore the action could not be maintained by the vendor, but ought to have been brought by the vendee.<sup>(m)</sup> Delivery of goods by the vendor on behalf of the vendee, to a carrier not named by the vendee, is a delivery to the vendee.<sup>(n)</sup> It was said by counsel in argument, and assented to by LORD CHANCELLOR KING, that if a tradesman in London send goods by order to a tradesman in the country by a carrier not appointed by the country trader, if the carrier embezzles the goods, the trader in the country must stand to the loss.<sup>(o)</sup> And this seems to be confirmed by Lord Hardwicke, in Snee v. Prescott,<sup>(p)</sup> who says that if goods are delivered to a carrier or hoyman to be delivered to A., and the goods are lost, A. can only bring the action, which shews the property to be in him. But if the vendor agrees with the carrier to pay him for the carriage, the vendor may bring an action against the carrier, because the vendor stands in the character of an insurer to the vendee, for the safe arrival of the goods, and it is no part of the question to inquire in whom the property vests.<sup>(q)</sup> Lord Mansfield, in Vale v. Bayle, observes, that if the vendor takes upon himself actually to deliver the goods to the vendee, he stands to all risks;

but if the vendee order a particular mode of conveyance, the vendor is excused. (r) 256. See 2 Saund. Rep. by Williams, 47b. The extraordinary liabilities of a carrier are thus imposed upon him, in consequence of the public nature of his employment, which renders his good conduct a matter of importance to the whole community. He is bound to convey the goods of any person offering to pay his hire, unless his carriage be already full, or the risk sought to be imposed upon him extraordinary, or unless the goods be of a sort which he cannot convey, or is not in the habit of conveying. ## PROBLEM IX.—VOL. IV.

PRIVATE NUISANCES.

What Acts amount to Private Nuisances?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LEGAL GUIDE.

ANSWER TO PROBLEM 8. VOL. 2. LIGHTS.

What is the law that governs the free access of light over another's land, and what are the remedies for injuries to lights?

The importance and interest of this problem will, I trust, be a sufficient excuse for my taking up so much of your valuable GUIDE with an answer, in which I shall endeavour to explain—

1. What are Ancient Lights?
2. Right to free access of light?
  - 1st. How acquired.
  - 2ndly. How lost or suspended.
3. Of injuries to lights.
4. The remedies for such injuries.
  - 1st. At law.
  - 2ndly. In equity.
5. By and against whom may such remedies be enforced.
6. The law governing the free access of light as affected by the custom of London.

First—What are Ancient Lights?

They are a right which the owner or occupier of premises having ancient windows has to the exclusive enjoyment and free access of light over the adjoining land. This right may have its commencement either in consequence of agreement between the owners of the adjoining premises, or from occupancy—uninterrupted for a period of twenty years, and cannot be obstructed or injured without subjecting the wrong doer to an action.

“If I have an ancient window overlooking my neighbour's ground, he may not erect any blind to obstruct the light; but if I build my house close to his wall, which darkens it, I cannot compel him to demolish his wall; for there the first occupancy is rather in him than in me.” 2 Blac. Comm. 402. Unless the windows be ancient the right does not exist, and consequently no injury is done.

The right only exists so far as the lights originally extended, and not for an increase of light by enlarging the windows recently. 2 Wm. Saund. 115. In the recent case of Blanchard v. Bridges, 4 Ad. & Ell. 176. it was so determined. There E., being owner of a house, enlarged it, and inserted a window at one end, in the part added, and at another end, carried out the side walls, between which two windows formerly stood in a straight line, five feet, converting this end into a bow, and inserting two bow windows in the same direction, but not in the same situation as the two former. And the Court, per PATTESON, J., who delivered judgment, held, that whatever privilege against the obstruction of light, the windows of the original house possessed, this privilege did not apply to the three new windows.

Secondly—Right to free access of light.

1st. How acquired.

The enjoyment of light for a period of twenty years with the acquiescence of the party who ought to have impeded or contradicted the same was, even before the stat. 2 & 3 Wm. 4. c. 71. strong presumptive evidence of a right thereto. by some agreement between the parties or otherwise. Darwin v. Upton, cited Yard v. Ford. 2 Saund. by Williams and Patteson, 175; and Cross v. Lewis, 2 Barn. & Cress. 689. But where lights have been enjoyed without interruption, for above twenty years, during the occupation of the adjoining land by a tenant only, it will not conclude the landlord of such adjoining premises without evidence of his knowledge of the fact, which is the foundation of presuming a grant against him; and, consequently, it will not conclude a succeeding tenant, who was in possession under such landlord from building; up against such lights. Daniel v. North, 11 East 372.

(r) Cowp. 256. See 2 Saund. Rep. by Williams, 47b.

And, now, by the third section of the before-mentioned Act, it is enacted, that when the access and use of light from any dwelling-house, workshop, or other building, shall have been actually enjoyed therewith, for the full period of twenty years, without interruption, the right thereto shall be deemed absolute and indefeasible, any local usage or custom to the contrary, notwithstanding, unless it shall appear that the same was enjoyed under some consent or agreement, expressly made or given for that purpose by deed or writing.

The right given by this section is absolute, as the 8th section, providing for possession during particular estates does not apply to lights.

Where a party has a house and land adjoining it, and he sells the house, the purchaser thereof has the same right to a free access of light, although the lights be new, as his vendor had before the sale. In Canham v. Fisk, 2 Crompt. & Jerv. 128, BAYLEY, J. says, "If I build a house, and having land surrounding it, sell the house, I cannot afterwards stop the lights of that house by building or otherwise. By selling the house I sell the easement also." And the principle of this rule is, as laid down by FENWICK and WYNDHAM, JJ. in Palmer v. Fletcher, 1 Lev. 122. "That no man shall derogate from his own grant." See also 1 Vent. 237; 6 Mod. 116; 1 Price 27.

In the case of Swansborough v. Coventry, 9 Bing. 305, where the plaintiff purchased a house of A., and the defendant at the same time purchased of A the adjoining ground upon which an erection of one story high had formerly stood; and in the conveyance to the plaintiff, his house was described as bounded by building ground belonging to defendant. It was nevertheless held, that the defendant was not entitled to build to a greater height than one story, if by so doing he obstructed the plaintiff's lights.

2ndly. How lost or suspended.

If a party having the privilege of light, shuts up the windows through which such light is admitted, with bricks and mortar, for twenty years, he thereby loses his right. Laurence v. Obee, 1 Camp. 514. On the contrary, the raising and enlargement of a window does not destroy the right for so much light as passed through the window before enlargement, and the owner of the adjoining land cannot lawfully obstruct the passage of light and air to any part of the place occupied by the ancient window, although a greater portion be admitted than was anciently enjoyed. Chandler v. Thompson, 3 Camp. 80.

The right to the enjoyment of light and air may be lost by non-user, even for a less period than twenty years, unless an intention of resuming the right in a reasonable time be shewn when it was ceased to be used—ex. gra.: If a party build upon the same site, and place windows in the same spot as that upon which a former house stood, or does any other act which manifests that he did not intend to convert the land to a different purpose, in such cases the right would not be lost by a temporary non-user. Moore v. Rawson, 3 B. & C. 336; Garret v. Sharp, 3 A. & E. 325; Martin v. Goble, 1 Camp. 322; Chandler v. Thompson, supra; Roberts v. Macord, 1 M. & Rob. 330; Coutts v. Gorham, M. & M. 396; Riviere v. Bowes, Ry. & Mo. 24. And see Astlett v. Ellis, 9 B. & C. 683.

The right to the free access of light may be suspended by an unity of possession, and afterwards revived upon a division of such unity. A unity of possession of land a quâ, and of land in quâ, an easement exists, does not extinguish, but only suspends the easement, where a person is seized in fee of one parcel, and possessed of the residue of a term of the other. Thomas v. Thomas, 2 C. M. & R. 34; Bright v. Walker, 1 C. M. & R. 219; If there had been a unity of seizen it would have been otherwise, per ALDERSON in Thomas v. Thomas. See further on this point Burton v. Barclay, 7 Bing. 758 and 1 Rep. 146 b. 144. a.; and per BAILLY, J., in Boyle v. Tamlyn, 6 B. & C. 337; Com. Dig. Suspension; Bracebridge v. Cook, Plowd. 418; Large v. Pitt, Pea. Add. Ca. 152 et notis.

Thirdly—Of injuries to lights.

The stoppage of lights in a house is a nuisance and actionable; but the mere obstruction of a prospect is not, although its effect is to diminish the value of the property, it being only matter of delight; not of necessity. 1 Mod. 55.

In order to sustain an action for such nuisance, it is not necessary to show a total privation of light, for if the plaintiff can prove that by the obstruction he ceases to enjoy the light in so free and ample a manner as he did before, such proof will be sufficient. 4 Esp. 69. But the diminution of light, as a ground of action, must be such as makes the premises to a sensible degree less fit for the purposes of business or occupation. Parker v. Smith, 5 Carr & Pay, 438, in which case the plaintiff's witnesses stated that, in their opinion, the quantity of sunlight and air was diminished, and the jury gave only nominal damages, which, per TINDAL, C. J., had no other effect than that of a notice to the defendants that they must pull down the building of which the plaintiff complains.

An action for a nuisance cannot be maintained for that which would have been no nuisance but for the plaintiff's having opened a new window in his house, and which becomes a nuisance only by the act of the plaintiff himself. Laurence v. Obee, ante; and see 1 Moody & R. 230.

Fourthly—What are the remedies?

1st. At law.

2ndly. In equity.

First—At law, a person may either maintain an action on the case against the occupier of the adjoining premises for the damage sustained by the nuisance, or he may stand on his own ground and abate it. Aldred's case, 9 Rep. 58; 1 Mod. 54. If, notwithstanding the penalty inflicted on the neighbour in the way of damages, the obstruction be continued, a new action may be maintained, and the former recovery would be no bar. Shadwell v. Hutchinson, 4 C. & P. 333.

The evidence in actions for the obstruction of light must shew that the plaintiff has possession of the house, land, &c. affected by the nuisance, the continuance or erection of the building causing the privation of light by the defendant, as the circumstances of the case may require, and also the injury sustained. Selwyn's N.P. 1131; Starkie Ev. tit. windows. And if the possession of such house has been during the occupation of the adjoining premises by a tenant, knowledge by the landlord must be shewn. Daniel v. North, 11 East, 372.

The most summary mode of proceeding is to destroy the thing constituting the nuisance, but it is not advisable, for an excess would subject the party thus taking the law into his own hands to an action of trespass. In Rex v. Papineau, 1 Strange, 688, which was a case of an indictment for a nuisance, RAYMOND, C. J., said, "You cannot destroy the whole, but only so much of a thing as makes it a nuisance. Suppose a man builds his house up so high as to be a nuisance to his neighbour, by obstructing his lights, or in any other respect arising from its excess, you must not destroy the whole house, but only so much of it as by its excess above what is allowable constitutes the nuisance." And in this opinion FOSTER, J. coincided.

Secondly—In equity an injunction will be granted ex parte, to restrain the owner of a house from making any erection or improvement, so as to darken or obstruct the ancient lights or windows of an adjoining house. Back v. Stacey, 2 Russ. 121. But if the nature of the obstruction do not require preventive interposition before a trial at law could be obtained, or the legal right be doubtful, the Court of Chancery will send the parties to law. Winstanley v. Lee, 2 Swan. 333.

The foundation of the jurisdiction to interfere by injunction in these cases is such material injury to the comfort of those who dwell in the neighbouring house as to require the interposition and application of a power to prevent, as well as to remedy an evil, for which damages, more or less, would be given at law. Attorney-General v. Nichol, Jun. 16 Ves. 333.

Fifthly—By and against whom may such remedies be enforced?

If the nuisance be of a permanent nature, and injurious to the reversion, the party entitled in reversion, as well as the tenant in possession, may each of them recover his respective loss. Leader v. Moxton and others, 3 Wils. 461.

A devisee may have an action for a nuisance continued after the death of his testator. Some v. Barwish, Cro. Jac. 231.

The remedy is not confined to the action against the party who erected the obstruction, but extends also, after request made to abate it, against his alienee. Winsmore v. Greenbank, Willes 583. And where a tenant for years erects a nuisance to the injury of the plaintiff's lights, and then makes an underlease, the plaintiff may have an action against either. Roswell v. Prior, 2 Salk. 460.

Sixthly—The law as to free access of light as affected by the custom of London.

The custom of the city of London permits houses to be raised upon ancient foundations to any height, notwithstanding such additional elevation may obscure and darken the windows of other ancient buildings, unless there is some agreement restraining such right. See the custom set forth in Winstanley v. Lee, supra.

However, in the case of Shadwell v. Hutchinson, 3 C. & P. 315, Lord TENTERDEN held, that the custom ought to be confined to buildings on ancient foundations where all the four walls belonged to the party; and that no one would be justified by the custom in raising an obstruction by means of those walls of his, so as to darken the lights in a fourth wall belonging to his neighbour.

By the Prescription Act 2 & 3 W. 4. c. 71. s. 3. twenty years enjoyment of light, gives an absolute right, any local usage or custom to the contrary, notwithstanding; so that it effects the custom of London since the passing of this act is taken away as to the right of building to any height the owner pleases, on ancient foundations, if by so doing he injures his neighbour's lights.

* There is a very serious case of murder to be tried there, in which a young woman, named Maria Brice, is to be tried for poisoning her husband, and which has stood over from the Spring Assizes, in consequence of the female, who is only twenty-one years of age, being delivered in the gael of an infant on the night before the commencement of the assizes, and being, consequently, prevented from taking her trial.

COURT OF CHANCERY.—May 29.

APPEAL FROM THE VICE-CHANCELLOR,
MAUGHAM v. VINCENT.

ULTIMATE LIMITATION in marriage Articles to such persons as under the Statute of Distributions, would have become entitled to the personal estate of the woman, "IN CASE SHE HAD DIED INTESTATE AND UNMARRIED," and she dies leaving children. CONSTRUCTION of the term "UNMARRIED" in such a case—Whether the CHILDREN are NEXT OF KIN to their MOTHER, so as to come within the Limitation.

This was a suit instituted by Caroline

Maugham and others, infants, by George Maugham, their next friend, against James Vincent and others.

By an indenture made previous to the marriage of Richard Maugham and Sally, otherwise Sarah Vincent, dated the 24th March, 1819, between Richard Maugham, of the first part, Ann Vincent, widow, and Sally, otherwise Sarah Vincent, then an infant, of the second part, and Thomas Wilson of the third part, after reciting that a marriage had been agreed upon between the said Richard Maugham and Sally, otherwise Sarah Vincent, and that all the estate to which she was, or at any time during the coverture, should become entitled should be settled and assured to her separate use, independent of her intended husband, the said Richard Maugham, and also the said Sally, otherwise Sarah Vincent, as far as she lawfully might or could, and with the privity and approbation of her mother, the said Ann Vincent, did covenant with Mr. Wilson that as soon as Miss Vincent should obtain the age of 21 years, and become entitled to the real and personal estate therein agreed to be settled they would convey, settle, and assure all and singular the real and personal estate and effects of or to which the said Sarah Vincent, or Richard Maugham, in her right, should or might during the intended coverture, become seised of or entitled to by descent, transmission, devise, bequest, gift, donation, representation, or otherwise, to HOLD the same unto the said Thomas Wilson, or some other person to be nominated as a trustee by and for the said Sarah Vincent, her heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, respectively, upon trust for such person or persons, and for such estates and interests, and to and for such ends, intents and purposes, and with, under and subject to such powers, provisos, agreements and declarations as the said Sarah Vincent should, notwithstanding her said intended coverture, by any deed or deeds, instrument or instruments in writing, with or without power of revocation and new appointment, to be sealed and delivered in the pre-be of and attested by two or more credible witnesses, or by her last will and testament in writing, or any codicil or codicils thereto, to be her signed and published in the presence of and attested by three or more credible witnesses, direct, limit or appoint the same or any part or parts thereof, and in default of, and until such direction, limitation or appointment, and so as no such direction, limitation or appointment should extend, upon trust, during the joint lives of the said Richard Maugham and Sarah Vincent, to pay, apply and dispose of the rent, issues and profits, interest, dividends and annual produce of the said trust premises, to such person or persons as should be appointed by the said Sarah Vincent, and for such intents and purposes only as should be appointed by the said Sarah Vincent, notwithstanding her said intended coverture, and as if she were sole and unmarried, (a) should from time to time, by any writing or writings signed by her with her own hand, direct or appoint; and in default of such direction or appointment into the proper hands of the said Sarah Vincent, to the end and intent that the said trust premises might be sold, disposed of, settled, given away, devised and bequeathed by the said Sarah Vincent during her said intended coverture, in such and the same manner as if she were sole and unmarried; that, in the mean time, the rents, issues, profits, interest, dividends and annual produce thereof might be for the sole and separate use and enjoyment of the said Sarah Vincent; and that neither the said trust premises, or the rents, issues and profits, interest, dividends, and annual produce thereof might be subject to the debts, contracts, or interference of the said Richard Maugham; and that purpose that the receipts in writing of the said Sarah Vincent, or of her appointees, signed by her or them, should from time to time be sufficient and effectual discharges for the money for which the said trust premises should or might be sold or disposed of, and for the rents, issues, profits, interest, dividends and annual produce thereof. And from and after the decease of either one of them, the said Richard Maugham or the said Sarah Vincent, as should first depart this life, upon trust, if the said Sarah Vincent should happen to survive the said Richard Maugham, for the said Sarah Vincent her heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, respectively, according to the several natures and qualities of the said several trust premises; but if the said Richard Vincent should happen to die in the lifetime of the said Richard Maugham, then as to that part of the said premises as should consist of freehold or copyhold estate, upon trust, for the right heirs of the said Sarah Vincent; and as to such part thereof as should consist of personal estate, upon trust, for such person or persons as under or by virtue of the statute for the distribution of the effects of intestates, would have become entitled to the personal estate of the said Sarah Vincent, in case she had died intestate and unmarried, and such persons, if more than one, to take in the shares to which they would have become entitled to such personal estate. The marriage took place—She died on the 6th of May, 1834, wholly intestate, leaving her husband and eight children (the plaintiffs) her surviving, who, according to the statute of distributions, were her next of kin. She also left a brother, James Vincent, and a sister, Mary Anne Ramsden; also, several nieces and nephews her surviving—but she made no appointment, devise, or testamentary disposition, under the deed of 24th March, 1819. If she had died unmarried, then the defendants (her relations) would have been her only next of kin, according to the statute of distributions.

Mr. Wilson, the trustee, died on the 9th of August, 1833, without having acted in or accepted the trusts, and no settlement was ever made in pursuance of the articles.

During the coverture Mrs. Maugham became entitled as one of the next of kin of her brother, Richard George Vincent, to a share of his personal estate, which was administered to by her brother, the defendant, James Vincent, and who had refused in her lifetime to pay her share, because there was no duly constituted trustee of the marriage articles, who, he contended, could only give him a proper discharge; he refused to concur in proper measures to procure the appointment of a new trustee, and alleged that the plaintiffs (the infant children of Mrs. Maugham) were not her next of kin, according to the marriage articles, but that the share of Mrs. Maugham in her deceased brother's property devolved upon the defendants, who would have been her next of kin if she had died unmarried. The present bill was therefore filed by the children, in which they charged that they were the persons entitled, or must so be presumed to be under the ultimate limitation in the marriage articles, and that such limitation was made by mistake or through inattention, and that they were entitled to have the settlement rectified so as to include them in terms in such ultimate limitation. The bill prayed that the marriage articles might be carried into effect, and that a proper settlement might be made in conformity therewith, and that if necessary the trusts might be rectified in the aforesaid particulars, and that the settlement to be made in execution thereof might be so framed as to limit to the plaintiffs, as the children of Mrs. Maugham, the property therein settled, and that her share of her deceased brother's personal estate might be transferred, and paid to the plaintiffs or to the trustee, to be appointed, of the settlement for the benefit of the plaintiffs, as the parties beneficially entitled under it, and that the defendant, James Vincent, might be restrained by injunction from otherwise disposing of such share. The defendants, by their answer, admitted all the facts, and denied that the plaintiffs were entitled, but submitted that they (the defendants) were under the limitation in the settlement entitled as answering the description of persons, who, by virtue of the statute of distributions, would have become entitled to Mrs. Maugham's personal estate, in case she had died intestate and unmarried, and that the limitation was inserted purposely, and not by mistake, in order to enable Mrs. Maugham and her husband to defeat the apparent intention of the articles, and to obtain the unrestricted possession of her property, and that a proper trustee thereof might be appointed.

The cause was heard before the VICE-CHANCELLOR, on the 9th of August, 1839, when the plaintiffs abandoned their charge, that the limitations in the settlement were framed by mistake, and the question turned entirely on the construction, to be placed upon the ultimate limitations in the articles. The VICE-CHANCELLOR decreed that the plaintiffs (the children of Mrs. Maugham) were not under the limitation in the settlement her next of kin, so as to be entitled to the funds; but that they belonged to the person or persons who would have been entitled, under the statute of distribution, to the personal estate of Mrs. Maugham, at the time of her death, in case she had died intestate, and without having been married. His Honour considered that the word "unmarried" in the ultimate limitation meant "never having been married," so that the children of the marriage could not take, and upon the construction to be placed upon that word the question rested. Against this decision the present appeal was brought, after the Vice-Chancellor had at the request of the plaintiffs re-considered his judgment, and declared that he had no power to alter the settlement(b)

Mr. J. Wigram and Mr. Ellis for the plaintiffs.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said, the question was between the children of Mrs. Maugham and her next of kin, supposing that she had left no children. His lordship, after reading the limitation in the settlement, said, the Vice-Chancellor was of opinion that the word "unmarried" should be construed as never having been married, and consequently the children of the marriage would be excluded, and those persons would be their mother's next of kin, and at her death would take the personal property. Nothing short of necessity could compel the court to adopt such a construction in this case. The matter therefore for consideration was whether the word "unmarried" was so fixed and inflexible that the court must put that construction on it. If unmarried necessarily means not having been married—it never could have been intended that the property should go to strangers. The correct meaning of the word would appear to be "not being then married." The word received a judicial meaning in the case of Doe, dem. Bawling and Wife v. Rawding and Wife, in which it was shown to be a flexible word used according to the circumstances of the case. There are other cases in which the court held that "unmarried" meant "never being married;" but they were not authorised in putting that construction on the word in the way it was used in these articles. It is quite competent to this court to adopt the construction put on the word in the case mentioned. There was ample authority to hold this to be a flexible term, and to explain it in the sense in which it was to be used. The articles were executory, and the court had to look to the intention of the parties. In an instrument executed by a husband, the court must look to the meaning of the words in marriage articles to the intention of the parties. If it had been the intention of the parties to the articles to exclude the children of the marriage, they might have been excluded in terms. The testator had two objects in view, one was that the next of kin should take in equal shares, as under the statute; the second was to exclude the husband from all share in the property. He could scarcely have a doubt in the construction to be put on the words, but as the Vice-Chancellor held otherwise, he had considered the case, and the conclusion he came to was that, as this was a flexible term, he could not adopt that construction of it which would exclude the children. The word was used in other passages of the articles, making provision for the wife as if she were sole and "unmarried," and giving her power to sell, dispose of, and give away, devise and bequeath the trust property during the coverture in the same manner as if she were sole and unmarried or discovert. The object being clearly to exclude the husband from his marital rights, the right construction of the word accorded with that intention. I must construe "unmarried" to mean "discovert."

DECREE of the VICE-CHANCELLOR reversed.

DECLARATION of the Court, that the children are the only parties entitled.

Reference to the Master to inquire who are the children of Mr. and Mrs. Maugham.

Costs of all parties in the cause to be paid out of the funds.

(c) Barn. and Ald. 441. S.C.—That case was argued at Sergeants' Inn. William Wells by his will devised certain lands to his wife for life, and a decease he devised them to his daughter, Mary Wells, and any other children he might have at decease in fee; but in case his daughter should die under the age of 21 years unmarried, and without lawful issue, then over. The daughter married and died under 21, and without issue, the question in this case turned upon the limitation over. AMOR, J. said, the words are, "in case my said daughter Mary Wells, and such other children as aforesaid, shall die under the age of 21 years, unmarried, and without lawful issue, then, in that case, I give and be the entirety of my said lands, &c. unto my daughter." The testator, in fact, had no other issue than the daughter mentioned in his will; that daughter died under the age of 21 years, without leaving lawful issue; she did not die unmarried, and I am of opinion the fee remained in her at the time of her death, and passes to her heir at law. According to the plain obvious meaning of the words, "under the age of 21 years, unmarried, and without lawful issue," the will provides for a single event consisting of three, namely, dying during her minority, dying unmarried, and dying without children: that is the plain obvious meaning of the words. It has been argued, however, that it could not have been the intention of the testator that the fee should remain in his daughter, if she died under 21, and without issue; because, in that case, the estate would confer no benefit on her. An instance, has, however, been put by my brother BAYLEY, in which she would derive a benefit from the fee remaining in her, by enabling her to take the estate upon her husband. It is true, that a writ of privy seal is not frequently resorted to at the present day: but it still is a mode by which the daughter might have been enabled to make a provision for her husband. In order, however, to put the construction upon the will which the defendant has pleaded for, the word unmarried must be wholly rejected. I cannot, however, reject from a will any word, unless I see that the meaning to be given to that word is contrary to some intention plainly expressed in other parts of the will. Now, I cannot collect from anything in this will, that it is contrary to the intention of the testator that the fee should remain in the daughter if she married; and that being so, the word unmarried, in my judgment, cannot be rejected. I am, therefore, of opinion, that the event upon which the devise over was to take effect, namely, the death of Mary Wells, unmarried, under the age of 21, has not occurred; and therefore that the fee passes to her at law.

BAYLEY, J. expressed himself to be of the same opinion, and observed: it has been said that the testator could only use the word unmarried in one sense, as expressive of the idea of Mary Wells never having been married at all; and that then, as far as the intention of the testator is concerned, that event is sufficiently provided for by the words "without lawful issue," because she could have no lawful issue if not having been married. I apprehend, however, that the word unmarried may either mean never having been married at all, or without having at the husband or wife. It is used in the latter sense by the legislature, in the statute of 3d and 4th Wm. IV. c. 11, which enacts, that if any unmarried person, not having a child, shall be lawfully hired into domestic service for one year, such service shall give a settlement. A widower has been held to be an unmarried person within the meaning of this statute. In this case, too, was this word considered by the Court of King's Bench, in the case of Doe v. Cooke, (7 East, 413) where the words of the devise over were precisely the same as the present; and I am very desirous to rely upon that authority here, as it will enable me to give effect to every word in the will. That was indeed the case of a will of personal property, and the husband, under the statute of distribution, would be entitled to the personal property of his wife, and it is said that that makes a material distinction between the two cases, for here the husband could derive no benefit if he survived the wife. That, however, in strictness, is not correct; for the property may have been made beneficial to the husband in the event of his surviving his wife, either by an application to the legislature, or by a writ of privy seal. The latter mode, at the present day, is rarely resorted to, being superseded by the modern practice of applying for an Act of Parliament. See 10 Rep. 49, a Cro. Eliz. 471; 1 Ld. Raym. 113; and Sir John St. Alban's case, Salk, 567, and 5 Cruise's Dig. tit. recovery, 431. It is still, however, part of the law of the land; and the course of proceeding was for the crown, upon the petition of the infant and her guardian, to grant letters, under the privy seal, to the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas, directing them to permit the infant to levy a fine or suffer a recovery.

It is, then, in the discretion of the Court to permit the thing to be done or not, according to the circumstances. The husband, therefore, in this case, might have derived a benefit if he had survived his wife; and Mary Wells, the daughter, would be materially benefited by being enabled to make a provision for her husband before marriage. It may, therefore, have been the intention of the testator so to have benefited the daughter by preventing the devise over from taking effect, in the event of her marrying before 21; and it must be recollected that we are bound to construe this will as if it was the will of the ablest lawyer in Westminster Hall. It appears to me, therefore, that this may have been the intention of the testator:—If my daughter dies under 21, but leaves a child, then the estate shall go to the child; if she dies under 21, without a child, but leaves a husband, it shall go in such a way as she may settle it for the benefit of that husband, thus giving her a power which would enable her to advance herself in marriage, and confer upon her a material benefit. But if she died under 21, leaving no issue, and without leaving a husband, for whom it might be the intention of the testator to enable her to provide, in those three events the widow was to take; but she is to take it only subject to these three events. That is the construction put upon words precisely similar to the present, by this Court, in the case of Doe v. Cooke; and I think that that construction ought to prevail here. I am, therefore, of opinion that the devise over does not take effect, because the event upon which it was made to depend has not occurred.

ROLLS' COURT—June 10.

GRAY v. FOOT.

PRACTICE—PENALTY upon SOLICITORS for not delivering papers in a Cause down for hearing, to the Judge.

In this case the plaintiff's solicitor had neglected to deliver any papers to his Lordship, in consequence of which he refused to allow it to proceed, and intimated that if none were furnished previous to the rising of the Court, he would, upon an affidavit of service, strike the cause out of the paper. Just before the rising of the Court.

Mr. Tinney intimated that the order of the Court had been complied with, but at the same time observed, that he did not know whether his Lordship had laid it down as a rule, that where no papers were furnished the cause would be struck out of the paper. It had been laid down in "Turner's Chancery Practice," that in such a case the cause would be ordered to stand over, and the solicitor would be ordered to pay the costs of the day. He cited "Grinstead v. Grinstead," (Idem)

Lord LANGDALE said it was not now necessary to decide. The course he usually adopted was that followed to-day, which was to strike the cause out of the paper, at the same time giving leave to have it restored if application was made in the course of the day, and this had been usually found effective.

BROWNE v. KEATINGE.

PRACTICE—EXCEPTIONS to ANSWER—how far they must correspond with the INTERROGATORIES.

The hearing of this cause involved a point of practice in the Master's office of considerable importance. The answer of the defendant had been excepted to for insufficiency by the plaintiff, and the Master disallowed the exceptions upon the ground that they differed from the interrogatories put by the plaintiff in his bill. The variation was only by substituting the word "recollection" for the word "remembrance," which latter word the plaintiff had used in the interrogatory in his bill, although he now used the word "recollection" in his exceptions to the defendant's answer to his bill. This the Master, acting according to the uniform practice of all the Master's offices, considered to be fatal, and so reported. To that report the plaintiff excepted.

Lord LANGDALE said, that until corrected by a higher authority, he would never hold that such a variation should be fatal, and allowed the plaintiff's exception to the Master's report.

FRIEND v. BATTERFIELD.

COAL ACT—PLEADING—ACTION FOR PENALTIES.
FORM OF DECLARATION.

This was an action to recover ten penalties for alleged deficiency in certain sacks of coals sold by the defendant to one Teague. The declaration was framed on the statute of 1 and 2 William IV., c. 76, s. 57, the statute regulating the sale of coals by weight in the cities of London and Westminster. It alleged that the coals sold to Teague were delivered in Chancery-lane "and within 25 miles of the General Post Office;" that the sacks were weighed and found deficient, by reason of which a penalty of 50 per sack was incurred. To this declaration the defendant demurred, on the ground that it did not state that the coals were delivered "from any ship, lighter, barge, craft, or warehouse in London or Westminster, or within 25 miles of the General Post Office."

Mr. Martin, for the demurrer, contended that by the statute it was not sufficient, in order to render a party liable to the penalty, that the coals were sold and delivered within the distance mentioned, but it was necessary that they should have come "from" a ship, &c. within that distance.

The COURT were of opinion that the view taken by Mr. Martin was the correct one. Judgment for the defendant.

BAYLIS v. LAWRENCE.

LIBEL.—Whether it is the duty of the JURY to tell the Jury whether the publication is Libel or no Libel; or whether it is the province of the JURY alone.

This was an action for libel tried before Lord ABINGER, when the jury found for the defendant. The alleged libel was published in a letter written by the defendant to a Mr. Jones, in which he stated that of late there had been a great scarcity of hares in his neighbourhood, as well as on his own premises, and that heretofore he had been in the habit throughout the season of shooting as many as nine or ten hares in the course of a week, whilst now he was not able to meet with even one. The letter then went on to say that a vast number of hares dead had some time been found on the defendant's ground, having round their necks wires belonging to the plaintiff. The defendant, in answer to the charge, pleaded a justification, that the allegations in his letter were true. A rule to set aside the verdict for the defendant, on the ground of a misdirection on the part of the learned Judge, was subsequently obtained. In leaving the case to the jury, the Judge had said, "Gentlemen, I cannot tell whether this is a libel or not, can you assist me?" whereupon the jury returned a verdict for the defendant. At the time the rule was set aside that verdict was obtained, it was contended that the Judge ought to have explained to the jury that the publication was a libel, and then have left it to them to say to what extent it was a libel.

the plaintiff had been injured by the publication, and so to have governed the amount of damages to be awarded to the party.

Lord DENMAN said, that when the rule had been moved for, it had been contended that that Court had said it was the duty of a judge, in cases of the publication of an alleged libel, to tell the jury whether it was a libel or not. Now, with regard to that argument, as to its being the duty of a judge to say whether or not a publication was a libel, he had always taken the same view of the question as Lord Abinger had done in the present case. The jury alone were to say, on all the circumstances of the case, whether the publication complained of was or was not a libel. That was the law as laid down by the 32d of George III. It was very true, however, that that statute was of itself applicable solely to criminal libels, but where there was a rule peremptorily laid down for libels of one class, it afforded a principle for the guidance of the Court with respect to others; so that in fact the rule as to criminal and civil libels was the same. The learned judge, therefore, in this case had been correct in the course he had pursued, in so far as that it was not compulsory on him to tell the jury whether the publication was or was not a libel.

The other judges concurred.—Rule discharged.

PHILLIPS v. MAY.

BILL OF EXCHANGE.—PLEADING, where the holder of the Bill is a person unknown to the Payee—NEW PLEA—Proper REPLICATION.

This was an action on a bill of exchange, to which the defendant pleaded that before the commencement of the suit the bill in question was endorsed by the plaintiff to some person unknown to the defendant, who was the holder of the bill at the time the plaintiff sued the defendant.

Replication by the plaintiff—that the bill had been endorsed by him to one Robert Knapp-ton, by whom it was presented to the defendant for payment thereof, but that, being dishonoured, it had been returned to the plaintiff, who became again the holder of the same, and as such was entitled to sue upon it, concluding with a special traverse, that a person unknown to the defendant was the holder of the bill, as alleged by the defendant in his plea.

The defendant demurred to this replication, as offering a traverse of an immaterial circumstance.

Mr. Humfrey, for the plaintiff, urged that the plea was a new one, framed for the express purpose of delay, and as such would not receive much mercy at the hands of the Court. Though such was its character, it was still very difficult for the pleader to reply to it safely; it was, however, submitted that the traverse of the plaintiff was not a bad one.

The COURT, however, was clearly of opinion that the replication was bad, on the ground alleged by the defendant. It was perfectly immaterial whether the person was unknown to the defendant, who was the holder of the bill at the time the action was brought; and the proper answer to such a plea would have been to reply, that the said person in the said plea mentioned was not the holder of the said bill modo et forma, by which a good and sufficient issue would have been raised by the plaintiff. Leave, however, might be had to amend, on payment of costs.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

PREROGATIVE COURT—June 13.

WILL OF EDWARD STEPHENS, DECEASED.

NEW WILL ACT.—CANCELLATION.—Whether a Will shall be considered as REVOKED under the Statute by the Testator drawing a Pen across his name, and also through the attesting clause, which, under the old Law, would have been deemed a CANCELLATION.

The testator had duly executed a will and codicil, but subsequently drew his pen through his own signature, through those of the two witnesses, and also through the attesting clause. By this paper he had bequeathed property to a large amount, and probate was now prayed for and opposed upon the ground that the testator had revoked his will.

Sir H. JENNER said, as "cancelling" is not contained in the new Will Act, though it was in the old law, as well as in the Statute of Frauds, the question was raised whether the will, as propounded, had been revoked by the testator. By the new Will Act it is provided that a will can only be revoked by "burning, tearing, or otherwise destroying;" by another paper executed according to the provisions of the act; or by the fact of marriage. The Court said there could be no doubt that the deceased had drawn his pen through the names on the paper, as it was found immediately after his death in his own repository. The next point was, would this act amount to a revocation. He adverted to the recommendations of the real property commissioners, on which the new Will Act was partly founded, from which it was pretty clear that the word "cancelling" was advisedly left out of the new Will Act by the legislature. The new act abolished all implied or presumptive revocations. Could the Court hold that those papers had been cancelled animo revocandi. The intention of the legislature must, in introducing the words "burning, tearing, or otherwise destroying," have meant "or otherwise destroying," to be de ejusdem generis with the two modes first set forth for revoking a will. The word "cancelling," by no means an unequivocal word, had been left out of the act; and though under the Roman law many ways existed for revoking wills, the new act had limited the modes of operation. The legislature having advisedly left out the word "cancelling," and it having prescribed the mode by which wills might be revoked, he must hold that the drawing a pen by the testator through his name, did not amount to a revocation. If, therefore, the facts pleaded in the allegation now before the Court were proved, it must hold the will valid.—Allegation ordered to be admitted to proof.

ON THE ENGLISH LAW OF BAILMENTS.

WE will now turn attention to the doctrine of NOTICE as applied to CARRIERS, the first recognition of which was made in 1555. (a) It was formerly a question of considerable doubt how far common carriers could by contract limit their responsibility, upon the ground, that exercising a public employment they were bound to carry a reasonable compensation, and had no right to change their common law rights and duties, but these special contracts are now fully recognised; (b) and in order to put an end to nice questions of liability and lay down a broad rule of dealing between carriers and owners of property which should be suited to the changed circumstances of modern society, the statute, 11 Geo. IV. and 1 W. IV. c. 68, was passed, entitled, "An act for the more effectual protection of mail contractors, stage coach proprietors, and other common carriers for hire against the loss of or injury to parcels or packages delivered to them for conveyance, or custody, the value and contents of which shall not be declared to them by the owners thereof." statute, and the effect of it is to limit the responsibility of mail contractors, stage coach proprietors, and other common carriers by land for hire to £10. in case any of the property specified in sec. 1, should be lost, unless its nature has been declared and a proportionately increased rate of charge paid, or a satisfactory engagement given for payment, and which shall be accepted by the person receiving the package. The statute directs a notice of such increased charges to be affixed in legible character in some public and conspicuous part of the office, warehouse, or other receiving house where the packages are received; and all persons sending parcels containing such valuable articles are made bound by such notice without further proof of the same having come to their knowledge; (c) and when the value has been declared and an increased charge paid or an engagement to pay it accepted, the carriers are to give receipts for the package acknowledging it to have been insured, and are to lose the benefit of the act if they do not give such receipt or affix the notice required; (d) but nothing in the act is to be deemed to protect carriers from liability to answer for loss or injury to any articles arising from the felonious acts of any servant in the employ of a carrier, or to protect such servant from liability for any loss or injury occasioned by his personal neglect or misconduct. (e) This leaves gross negligence by the carrier or his servant still open to the common law. Carriers cannot by any special notice exempt themselves from all responsibility in cases of gross negligence or fraud; nor can they by demanding an exorbitant price compel the owner of the package to yield to unjust and oppressive limitations of their rights, and they will be made liable for the fraud or negligence of their servants. (f)

the law as it stood before the passing of the statute, with the volume of cases that supported it. At that time unless there was strong proof of the limitation by the carrier of his common law liability having come to the knowledge of the party sending the parcel, or of sufficient efforts having been made by the carrier to bring it to the knowledge of the former, he was liable for the loss or injury of the property sent. The difficulties in this way at that time arose in fixing the plainness of the notice with knowledge of the limitation by the carrier; and what were sufficient efforts to bring it to his knowledge was a question for jury. (g) These difficulties are now at an end if the provisions of sec. 2 of the statute be observed. But "for the loss or injury to any articles and goods in respect whereof they may not be entitled to the benefit of this act," (h) they are declared to be "liability as at the common law, any public notice or declaration by them made and given contrary thereto or in anywise limiting such liability notwithstanding." Carriers by land can now limit their liability in the carriage of any property to a less sum than £10. In a case (i) was brought before the Court of Exchequer in 1834, (after the statute,) where a looking-glass of above £10. value, marked on the outside, "plate glass, keep this up," was delivered at the office of a common carrier in London and booked there to go by his waggon to Lymington: the booking was paid for, its value was neither asked nor declared, nor was any increased charge or engagement to pay accepted by the carrier. It was of large size and weighed 5 lbs. The carrier had a notice in his office directed by the statute. When the package arrived at Lymington, the glass was found to be broken. The jury found negligence.

and gave the plaintiff a verdict for the value of the glass. A point was, however, reserved upon the statute, the value and nature of the package not having been declared by the person delivering it, and no increased charge or engagement to pay having been accepted. The point was argued upon a rule to enter a nonsuit, and BAILEY, B., in delivering the judgment of the court said,

We entertain no doubt that this case is within this act. The article carried falls within the words used in the first section, so that unless we see something there restraining its operation to particular descriptions of glass, and excluding it from this particular one, the act applies. Now it has been argued for the plaintiff that the section does not apply to the glass article in question, because it was of considerable size and weight; and it appears from the preamble to section that increased risk had arisen to carriers from the practice of sending by public conveyances by land for hire packages containing money, bills, notes, jewellery, and other articles of great value, in small compass, without such notice to them of their nature and value as would enable them by due diligence to protect themselves against loss by predation. But is the enacting part controlled by those words of the preamble, "articles of great value in small compass?" If it had been the intention of the Legislature to confine the provisions of section 1. to the articles of small size but great value there enumerated, they would have been found not only in the preamble, but in the enacting part of that section. The terms of section 1. are, however, general, and include everything. Among the articles which it enumerates is glass, the value of which increases with its size; but it also mentions plated articles, the value of which at least, as compared with plate, is not in any degree commensurate with the size of the article. The terms of the section are general, and there seems no reason why it should not be applied to any glass article if exceeding £10. in value. The carriage of glass requires particular attention, and imposes peculiar risk on the carrier, from the brittle nature of the commodity; and the term "glass" in the act being unlimited, we should not be justified in saying that it applies to small glasses only, and not to glass of every description. The object of the Legislature was to enable the carrier to provide against the common accidents of a journey, and not merely against theft. Then there is a stipulation applicable to this particular article of glass, that the carrier shall not be liable unless the nature and value of the article be declared, and an increased charge or an engagement to pay it be accepted by the person receiving the package. That had a twofold object, viz. the apprising the carrier of the nature of the article, in order to his giving it the greatest degree of protection on the road, and the giving him increased compensation for his greater risk and liability. But in this case he was only paid according to the rate for an ordinary risk, though notice was fixed in the office of the terms on which glass would be carried. I think that this case is within the act, and that, therefore, the plaintiff cannot recover for the loss sustained; no wrongful conduct or gross negligence amounting to a misfeasance (k) having been established to take the case out of the protection intended by the statute. Gross negligence has in many cases been held to affix a liability on a carrier to which he would not have otherwise been subject. Thus had the defendant dashed the glass on the ground, that wrongful act would have made him liable. In one case where the carrier was held liable, as for gross negligence he delivered the article to a wrong person, (l) in others a mode of conveyance different from that agreed for was substituted, (m) and in another the article was carried to a point beyond the right one, or as in Smith v. Horne (n) it was left unprotected in a cart in a street in London. In all those cases misfeazance had taken place; whereas here there is no misfeazance or gross degree of negligence throwing the responsibility on the carrier notwithstanding the act. The supposed negligence here imputed is that of carrying a package containing glass on a truck for a mile, along a hard smooth road. But if that mode of carriage was not the safest, still, had the carrier been informed of the value, he might have used a greater caution, amounting to extraordinary diligence.

VAUGHAN, B., said,—On the plain construction of this act, in order to make the carrier liable, the consignor is bound to make a declaration to him of the nature and value of the goods to be conveyed, when they are of any of the kinds enumerated in sec. 1, and that so doing is a condition precedent to any right to sue the carrier. Had gross negligence appeared, the carrier would have been liable, notwithstanding the act, and the rule for the nonsuit was made absolute. (o)

ANSWER TO PROBLEM 7. VOL. 4.

POSSESSIO FRATRIS—Describe it.

Possessio fratris, is where a man hath a son and a daughter by one woman, and a son by another woman, and dies; if the first son enter upon the estate of the father and die seised without issue, the daughter shall have the land as heir to the brother, although the son by the second woman is heir to his father; for possessio fratris de feodo simplici facit sororem esse heredem; but if the eldest son die without issue, not having made an actual entry and seisin, the younger brother by the second wife, as heir to the father, shall enjoy the land, and not the sister. Sir Edward Coke, in vol. i. p. 15, of his Commentary upon Littleton, says concerning possessio fratris de feodo simplici facit sororem esse heredem, four things must be observed:—1stly. That the brother be in actual possession. 2ndly. De feodo simplici exclude estates tail. 3rdly. Facit sororem esse heredem. So as soror est hæres facta, and therefore some act must be done to make her heir; and the younger son is the heir born (hæres natus) if no act be done to the contrary. And although the words be facit sororem esse heredem, yet this extends to the issue of the sister, who will consequently inherit before the brother by the second wife. 4thly. Of dignity no possession of the brother will make the sister inherit; but the younger brother being heir to the father will inherit the dignity inherent to the blood, as heir to him that was first created noble. Possessio fratris does not take place where land is purchased by the Crown, for there the younger brother will, in preference to the daughter, inherit the lands so purchased; nor is the half blood an impediment to the descent of land belonging to the Crown. TO THE EDITOR OF THE LEGAL GUIDE.

The following investigation of the Prescription Act, and the points in the Act, which doubts have arisen, and cases decided they are offered for insertion in the LEGAL GUIDE.—Temple, June, 1840.

A DISCUSSION of the PRESCRIPTION ACT (2 & 3 W. IV. c. 71,) and of the cases decided thereon, with a few preliminary remarks on customs and prescriptions. LORD COKE, in his Institutes, gives

(1) See Cro. Car. 347. 601.; Benson & B. Britton, c. 119.; Fleta, b. 6. c. 1.—Ed.

following definition of these two classes of rights:—

“J. S. seised of the manor of D. in fee prescribeth thus, that J. S. his ancestors, and all those whose estate he hath in the said manor time out of mind of man had and used to have common of pasture in such place, &c. being the land of some other, &c. as pertaining to the said manor; this properly, we call a prescription.”

“A custom is in this manner:—a copyholder of the manor of D. doth plead that within the said manor there is and hath been such a custom time out of mind of man used that all the copyholders of the said manor have had and used to have common of pasture, &c. in such a waste of the Lord parcel of the manor, &c.”

The claim by custom is much larger than that by prescription; the latter claims the right as being attached to one particular state, of which the party claiming is the proprietor for the time being: the former claims it as appertaining to a whole manor or district in which the party claiming is a copyholder or inhabitant. Thus in Gateward's case (a) it is said, “Another difference was taken and agreed between a prescription which is always alleged in the person, and a custom which always ought to be alleged in the land.”

It follows from this difference that a prescription can be released, whereas a custom, attached to the land, cannot. A prescription can confer a more extensive privilege than a custom can. See Gateward's case. A custom can only give an easement in alieno solo, (1) and not a profit a prendre, while a prescription can give either.

Thus in Blewett v. Treggoning, (b) PATTERSON, J. says: “It is clear that there cannot be a custom to take a profit in alieno solo.” And in Grimstead v. Marlowe, (c) it was held that a custom for the inhabitants of a particular place to claim a profit in alieno solo is bad, and a right to take such a profit is claimable by prescription only.

This rule appears to be at variance with the definition of a custom quoted above from Coke's Inst., where he clearly states as a custom the privilege of copyholders to common in the Lord's waste, an undoubted case of a profit a prendre.

This apparent contradiction is accounted for in Gateward's case, where it was resolved, “that copyholders in fee or for life may by custom of the manor have common in the demesnes of the Lord of the manor, &c. For a copyholder hath a customary interest in the house, &c. and therefore he may have a customary common in the Lord's wastes. And in such case he cannot prescribe in the name of the Lord, for the Lord cannot claim common in his own soil, and therefore of necessity such custom ought to be alleged.”

And in Grimstead v. Marlowe, BULLER, J. says: “Where a profit is to be claimed out of another man's soil, it must be alleged by way of prescription, and not by custom, unless in the case of a copyhold tenant against his Lord, or where the party pleading is a stranger to the title.” (2)

It may be useful to give a case in which there has been a question as to what are and what are not profits a prendre. In Blewett v. Treggoning, (where most of the cases on the point are collected in the arguments of Counsel,) a right to take sand which drifted from the sea-shore on the adjoining lands was held to be a right of this description.

In Manning v. Wasdale, (d) the privilege of washing and watering cattle at a pond,

(2) As in Starr v. Rookesby, Salk, 335 case, for that he was possessed of a close, adjoining to the defendants, and the tenants and occupiers of the defendant's close had time out of time used to repair the fences, &c. and held good, because it was impossible for the plaintiff, who was a stranger, to set forth the particular estate, interest, and title of the defendant.—EDITOR. and of taking and using the water for culinary and other domestic purposes was held to be a mere easement.

On this point it seems only necessary to add, that a prescriptive right must originate in a real or supposed grant; but a customary right is gained by the unmolested repetition of the exercise of the right—either class of rights must have existed for a certain number of years; this number has been regulated by the 2d & 3d W. IV. c. 71, and will now be discussed.

The difference in the nature and origin of a custom and a prescription having been briefly touched upon, it is proposed now to discuss the Act of Parliament (2 & 3 W. IV. c. 71,) which regulates the number of years which must have elapsed before such rights can be considered complete and pleadable in bar of any action brought against any person on account of his exercise of them. Section 1, (reciting in the preamble the inconvenience and injustice arising from the former rule, that time immemorial should be considered to denote the whole period of time from the reign of Richard I. inclusive,) enacts, “that no claim which may be lawfully made at the common law, by custom, prescription, or grant, to any right of common or other profit or benefit to be enjoyed or taken from or upon any land, &c. (except such matters as are herein specially provided for, and except tithes, rents, and services,) shall where such right, profit, or benefit shall have been actually taken and enjoyed by any person claiming right thereto without interruption for the full period of 30 years, be defeated or destroyed by showing only that such right, profit, or benefit was first taken and enjoyed at any time prior to such period of 30 years; but, nevertheless, such claim may be defeated in any way in which the same is now liable to be defeated. And when such right, profit, or benefit shall have been so taken and enjoyed as aforesaid for the full period of 60 years, the right thereto shall be deemed absolute and indefeasible unless it shall appear that the same was taken and enjoyed by some consent or agreement expressly made for that purpose by deed or writing.” (3)

Several sentences in this section require remark.

First—“Enjoyed by some person claiming right thereto.” These words will be best explained when section 5 is discussed, as they are closely connected in meaning with that section.

Secondly—“Such claim may be defeated in any way in which the same is now liable to be defeated.”

In Bright v. Walker, (c) PARKE, B. explains these words:—“It (the right claimed) may be answered by proof of a grant, or of a license given, or parol for a limited period, comprising the whole or part of the 20 years, or of the absence or ignorance of the parties interested in opposing the claim or their agents during the whole time that it was exercised.”

Thirdly—“The right shall be deemed absolute and indefeasible, unless it shall appear that the same was taken and enjoyed by some consent or agreement expressly made for that purpose by deed or in writing.”

These words have been construed to mean that an enjoyment by a person claiming right thereto without interruption for 60 years becomes absolute, and they depend therefore on the meaning of the words, “enjoyment by a person claiming right thereto,” which, as before remarked, will be explained when section 5 is discussed.

Section 2 is expressed in the same terms, and refers to rights of way and other easements, or to any water-course, or the use of any water; but the respective periods are 20 and 40 years.

(3) Evidence of an enjoyment of a right of pasture for 28 years is not sufficient for a jury to presume an enjoyment for 30 years, as stated in a plea under the statute, Appleyard v. Bayley, 8 Adol. and Ell. 101. — EDITOR. (c) 1 Cro. Misc. & R. 219.

The explanations necessary for the clear understanding of section 1, will apply with equal force to section 2. In fact most of the cases have arisen on the latter section.(4)

Section 3 differs from the two previous sections,—it relates to the use of light, and enacts that when the access and use of light shall have been actually enjoyed for 20 years it becomes absolute, unless it shall appear that the same was enjoyed by some consent or agreement expressly made or given for that purpose by deed or writing.

The words, “by any person claiming right hereto,” which are inserted in the first and second sections, are omitted in the third. Hence the actual use of light, although by parol license, &c. for 20 years, makes the right absolute.

Section 4 regulates the time during which the respective periods of years are to be considered to run, and defines what kind of interruption is necessary to stop the right.

“That each of the respective periods of years herein before mentioned, shall be deemed and taken to be the period, next before some suit or action, wherein the claim or matter to which such period may relate shall have been or shall be brought into question; and that no act or other matter shall be deemed to be an interruption, within the meaning of this statute, unless the same shall have been or shall be submitted to or acquiesced in for one year after the party interrupted shall have had or shall have notice hereof, and of the person making or authorising the same to be made.”

“The period next before the commencement of some suit, &c.” A question has been raised as to the form of a plea, drawn upon this clause. In Wright v. Williams, (f) the form of the plea was, “for 40 years next before the commencement of this suit.” The plea was demurred to, because the time was not alleged to have run before the act complained of. It was contended, in support of the demurrer, that if the time was to run before the commencement of the suit, this absurdity would follow that the character of the act complained of, whether it be rightful or wrongful cannot be known at the time by the party doing it, but depends upon a subsequent event.

The Court, however, decided that the time runs before the commencement of the suit, and therefore that the plea was rightly expressed.

The same averment was made in the plea in the case of the Monmouthshire Canal Company v. Harford. (g)

In Jones v. Price, (h) the averment in the plea was “for 30 years before the commencement of the suit,” the word next being omitted, for which omission there was a special demurrer, which was overruled. TINDAL, C. J., says—“It seems to me that the 4th section of the statute is nothing but an exposition of the proof required to establish the right. It is a mere question of evidence; and if the plaintiff joins in the issue now offered, the defendant will not be able to get out of the proof of enjoyment of the right for thirty years next before the action.”

Lastly, in Richards v. Fry, (i) the point was again raised, and the Court of Queen's Bench adhered to the decision of Wright v. Williams. In their judgment the Court observe:—“We do not feel that the case of Jones v. Price at all militates. Against this decision that case merely establishes that the averment ‘of 30 years before the commencement of the suit,’ means ‘30 years next before the commencement of the suit;’ in other words, that the omission of the word ‘next,’ does not alter the sense.”

(4) In order for a person to maintain the benefit of sec. 2, he must prove the enjoyment of the easement as such, and as of right, for a continuous period of 20 years, and therefore unity of possession; for part of that time will destroy the right, see Onley v. Gardiner, 1 Mee and Wels. 496. The statute only applies to such rights as would, before the Act, have been acquired by the presumption of a grant from long use. Arkwright v. Gull, 5 id. 233.—EDITOR.

(f) 1 Mee & W. 97.

(h) 3 Bing. N. C. 52.

(g) 1 Cro. Mee & R.

(i) 7 Adol. & Ell. 698.

From these cases, therefore, it is clear, that the averment in the plea must be either "for — years next before the commencement of the suit," or "for — years before the commencement of the suit," omitting "next," and that the averment, "for years next before the said time in which, &c." is demurrable. The Court, in the case of Richards v. Fry, say—"We cannot think, as was suggested at the bar, that both modes of averment are correct, and either may be adopted at the option of the pleader. The periods in the two averments are certainly quite different, and the evidence necessary to support them manifestly not the same. We shall not attempt to obviate the difficulties which have been suggested, but adhering to the express words of the statute and the decision in Wright v. Williams, with which we fully agree, we hold that the only correct averment is, 'next before the commencement of this (or possibly some other) suit.'"

The Court, by the words, "or possibly some other suit," seem to suggest that a plea stating that the right has been enjoyed for years before the commencement of some other suit in which the question had been decided in favour of the defendant, would be a good plea in a subsequent action on the same right.

ATTORNEY GENERAL v. CLEEVE.

PRACTICE.—ISSUES when they shall be taken pro confesso.

An issue was directed in this case in 1826 by the Vice-Chancellor, and the order directing it was appealed from and affirmed by the Lord Chancellor in 1831, but by some accident the issue had not been tried. An application was now made for an extension of the time for trial to the next spring assizes, which was resisted.

The Lord CHANCELLOR observed, that it was extraordinary that in 1840 a party was not prepared to go to trial of an issue directed so many years ago. There were yet near three months before the next assizes, and that was quite sufficient time for preparation; and, if the party should not then go to trial, the issue should be taken pro confesso. And he wished it to be understood that all issues directed for the future should be taken pro confesso against the party who declined to go to trial at the assizes for which it was appointed.

ENGLAND v. DOWNS.

HUSBAND and WIFE.—FRAUDULENT SETTLEMENT.—What shall be considered acquiescence to prevent relief.

This was a suit instituted by the plaintiff, Sarah, the wife of Alfred England, to carry into execution the trusts of a marriage settlement made by her late mother, previous to her marriage with the defendant, John Thiery Broad.

It appeared that Joan Mason was the widow of William Mason, formerly of the city of Bristol, victualler; and he by his will, dated the 16th of September, 1815, gave the whole of his property, both real and personal, to his wife, whom he made his sole executrix. The testator died on the 9th of December, 1816, leaving his wife, who, on the 3d of January, 1817, proved the will in the Episcopal Court of Bristol, and Sarah, Jane, and Eliza, his three daughters, surviving. The widow continued to carry on the business of her late husband, and by indentures dated the 4th and 5th of August, 1818, she conveyed the property which had been given to her by the will of her late husband to Messrs. Downs and Alexander, as to a freehold piece of arable land, situate near Magdalen Chapel, in the parish of Saint Paul's, upon trust for such persons as she should appoint, and subject thereto for herself for life, with a remainder to her in fee; and as to a freehold house in Bath-street, and certain leasehold premises in Thomas-street, Bristol, and in Tower-lane, in the parish of Christchurch, upon trust for her separate use for life, independent of any husband she might marry; and after her decease, as to the house in Bath-street, for her daughter, the plaintiff, Sarah the wife of Alfred England, for life, with a remainder for her children; and as to the houses in Thomas-street and Tower-lane, as to one moiety thereof for her daughter Jane, the wife of Adam Barton; and as to the other moiety, for Eliza, the wife of Cyrus Davis. The trustees also were to stand possessed of the furniture, stock in trade, brewing utensils, and other effects, for the separate use of Joan Mason for life; and after her death upon trust to sell the same, and divide the purchase-money equally between her daughters. At the time of executing this deed, it was alleged that Mrs. Mason was admitting the addresses of John Thiery Broad: the marriage, however, took place on the 26th of October, 1818, and immediately afterwards Mr. Broad came to reside at the house, and continued to carry on the business of a victualler till 1822, when he sold the business, stock in trade, &c., and out of the proceeds paid various debts. Among them a mortgage upon a part of the real estate for £200, created by the testator in 1807. Mrs. Broad, in pursuance of the power in the deed of settlement, mortgaged the piece of valuable land to Mr. Strickland, but afterwards sold the same, and kept the purchase-money. On the 14th of March, 1833, Mrs. Broad died, leaving her three daughters by her former husband, and her husband Broad her surviving.

The present bill was filed by Mrs. England in January 1836, praying that the trusts of the settlement might be carried into execution, and for an account against the trustees, and charged the defendant Broad that he was fully aware of the settlement before his marriage, and gave his assent to it. Broad by his answer denied this charge, and insisted that the settlement was a fraud upon his marital rights, and void against him; that he knew nothing about it until some time after his marriage, when he first learned that his wife had secretly and without his knowledge, privity, or consent, executed the settlement, and that he had never recognised it.

The Trustees by their answer admitted having executed the settlement, but denied acting in the trusts thereof.

It was proved by Mr. Davies, the solicitor who prepared the settlement, that he did not think it was prepared with the privity of Mr. Broad, nor did he think that its existence was communicated to him before the marriage, and that it was Mrs. Mason's directions that it should be prepared and executed without his knowledge. That after the marriage, Mr. Broad took possession of the business, stock in trade, &c. and carried it on as the absolute owner; that he was made acquainted with the existence of the settlement soon after the marriage, for that in Nov. 1818 himself and his wife laid a case before counsel as to the possibility of revoking it, but he never took any steps for that purpose, and Mrs. Broad afterwards dealt with the settled property uncontrolled by her husband in the manner before stated.

Mr. Cooper stated the case, and asked that the deed of settlement might be established, and that the trustees, and also John Thiery Broad, might account for the personal estate, and also for the rents and profits of the freehold and leasehold premises, and that new trustees might be appointed.

Mr. Kindersley, for Mr. Broad.—It had been said that the simple concealment of facts which took place during the courtship did not constitute fraud, but it was proved that the professional gentleman who prepared the deed was requested not to communicate the facts; it had also been said that it was a moral duty upon the parent to provide for her children by the first marriage; but the deed which had been executed went much further—it was in effect a settlement upon herself to the exclusion of all interference on the part of any person whom she might marry. The bill charged that Mr. Broad was aware of the settlement at the time of the marriage, but this was inconsistent with his acts, since after the marriage he had dealt with the property as his own, selling and buying stock, and ultimately disposing of the business, stock in trade, &c. and receiving the purchase-money. In this the trustees did not interfere, and the purchaser had actually employed Samuel Alexander to make the valuations. A part of this purchase-money, it was true, had been employed in payment of the mortgage which had been made by the testator in 1807, but the surplus had been retained by him. It was now asked that he should refund this money, that it might be divided among the daughters. But when a man pays his addresses to a woman it must be taken that he knew she had property, and if she was bound by one moral duty she was equally bound by another, and he was entitled to the information that she intended to provide for her daughters, who had no right to receive the benefit which had been derived from his labour in carrying on the business. In 1831, however, when Mrs. Broad sold some part of the real estate, her husband had been made a party; he refused to execute the deed. It had, however, been carried into effect, and she had received the purchase-money. Upon the whole he submitted that the bill must be dismissed with costs. He cited Weeks v. Maillardet, 14 East, 568.

Mr. Tinney, for Messrs. Downs and Alexander, denied that they knew anything of the marriage, or the duties imposed upon them by the trusts. Mrs. Broad, however, was a femme sole with respect to the property, yet, because there had been a sale, the court was asked to presume that it was made by them. He denied, therefore, that the trustees were answerable.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply, said that in the opening it was supposed that the evidence taken on behalf of J. T. Broad would have been gone into. It had, however, been withheld. At law the settlement was good, and so it was in equity, unless the husband could say it was a fraud. This it rested with him to prove incontestably, and show that there had been a misrepresentation or suppression of the truth, or an allegation of untruth. It was through the marriage only he could become entitled to the property; and he must establish the fact of his having inquired and ascertained his reason for believing that Mrs. Mason had property, and that it was the foundation upon which he contracted the marriage. If he had been content to take the woman without fortune, he could not afterwards complain of the deed previously executed. That, however, could not apply to the real estate; the only right he could have possessed was for her life, or as tenant by the courtesy. But when the deed was executed there was no evidence to show that Mrs. Mason had any marriage in contemplation; it was not even proved that Mr. Broad knew the woman. Ingenious arguments had been used, confusing the words courtship and contract: but he denied that any acquaintance existed with Mr. Broad; and it must be recollected that the strictest evidence was necessary to set aside a solemn deed, and no equities growing out of the contract could arise until that contract had been established. Indeed, it was not till after the marriage that Mr. Broad had discovered the property of his wife; and it was not till then that he insisted that it was in fraud of his marital rights. The learned gentleman then said that Mr. Broad had become aware of the settlement immediately after the marriage, the provisions of which he had acquiesced in without having taken a single step to set them aside; and with regard to the trustees, he did not think they could be heard to say that the deed was a nullity. They were bound to protect the property. They had accepted the trusts, and were bound to communicate them to Mr. Broad. The decree, therefore, he asked, was to inquire of what the property consisted, and for an account. He cited Goddard v. Snow, (1 Russ. 485,) and St. George v. Wake, (1 Myl. and K. 623.)

LORD LANGDALE, after observing that it was material to know when Mr. Broad first knew of the settlement, and also in what manner he had dealt with the property, took time to consider his judgment.

June 5.

LORD LANGDALE, after observing that there were cases in which settlements made by a woman upon the children of a former marriage, previous to a second intended marriage, had been held not to be a fraud upon the marital right of the intended husband, said, that in the present case the settlement had been made two months before the marriage; and it had been proved by William Davis, that Mrs. Mason told him she was about to be married, and that she did not wish the fact of her having made the settlement to be communicated to her intended husband. It had been said that John Thiery Broad was not the husband alluded to; and it was to be observed, that, though the interrogatory specially mentioned him by name, the answer of the witness was, that she did not wish it to be communicated to her intended husband. However probable, therefore, it might be that Mr. Broad was that person, still it was not proved. The treaty might have commenced subsequent to the settlement, and though there was proof of a desire to conceal it at the time of the marriage, still there was no proof that such desire continued until the marriage: she might have made the settlement to avoid importunity, or to prevent any yielding on her part; and so that she might have an opportunity when applied to, of saying, you must take me with the settlement. It had been said that J. T. Broad was the owner of the goods, stock in trade, &c., but he (Lord Langdale) did not think that the settlement was executed during the treaty, or that she desired it to be concealed: all these allegations were consistent with the evidence. Mr. Broad had sold the goodwill, stock, furniture, and effects, had applied £200., a part of the purchase money, in payment of a mortgage upon the premises in Bath-street. So far, then, Mr. Broad himself acquiesced in the terms of the settlement. or, at any rate, in right of his wife, and all he said was, that the deeds were given up to him, and that he paid the rent of the leasehold premises. In 1829, his wife, Joan Broad, mortgaged a part of the freehold premises to Mr. Strickland for £160., and in 1831 she sold the same premises, under a power in the deed, for £364., and received the purchase money. Mr. Broad was fully aware of this, and if it was fraudulent, though he did not actually join in the sale, still he acquiesced in what was done. On the 29th of January, 1836, this bill was filed: Mr. Broad, however, had filed no bill, or taken any proceedings to impeach the settlement; and under the circumstances, therefore, and considering that there was no proof of the treaty of marriage when the deed was executed, or of its concealment; or if there was, it appeared that Mr. Broad knew of it shortly after the marriage, and that he had not attempted to set it aside, he considered that he was bound to give the plaintiff relief, and he did so upon the evidence which had been read to the court. The case of Weeks v. Maillardet he did not think applied here. It was said there was more evidence; but that he had not read. He thought also there would be no difficulty in ascertaining of what the settled property consisted. The decree, therefore, would be that the settlement must be carried into execution, and an account must be taken of the stock sold, and of the value. There must also be an inquiry if any of the parties had been in possession of the freehold, and who; and if it should be found that any of the parties had been in possession, then there must be an account taken of the rents and profits which they had received. With regard to the plaintiff's costs they must be paid by Mr. Broad up to the hearing; but the costs of the other parties must be reserved. The subsequent costs must be paid by the parties.

CANE v. MARTIN.

SOLICITORS' LIEN upon PAPERS IN A CAUSE—

RIGHT of a SUITOR whose SOLICITOR withdraws himself from the conduct of a cause to have the free use of the papers held by that Solicitor, so far as they may be required in the prosecution of the cause, notwithstanding his LIEN upon them for COSTS, and that such free use extend to his NEW SOLICITOR.

Mr. Renshaw, for the plaintiffs, stated that Mr. Elderton, the former solicitor for the parties, had refused to proceed with the suit unless his bill of costs was paid. The parties were poor, and were unable to discharge the amount, and they were unable to proceed without the papers. Mr. Broughton was ready and willing to undertake the cause on their behalf, and the object of the present petition was, that the papers might be delivered up to Mr. Broughton upon his giving to Mr. Elderton an undertaking either to pay the costs, or to return the papers within a limited time after the hearing. The present application was made on the authority of Heslop v. Metcalf, 3 Myl. & Craig, 183, in which the LORD CHANCELLOR had made a similar order to that now asked. (a)

Mr. Elderton said the facts of the case cited did not sufficiently disclose the grounds upon which the order had been made, but they did not appear to agree with the circumstances involved in the present application. The success of this cause depended upon the parties being tenants in common. It appeared that they were joint tenants, and upon a demurrer being put in by two of the defendants, it had, upon argument, been allowed. This was a most ungracious application. Inquiries had been made by Mr. Broughton into the facts of the case, and a brief of the pleadings had been lent to him by Mr. Elderton, who was money out of pocket; but still, if Mr. Broughton would pay £20. he might have the papers. Before, however, the court made any order, he trusted that some better security than a mere undertaking would be given to his client.

Lord LANGDALE said that there was a double inconvenience in this case—the one on behalf of the solicitor, who was money out of pocket, and had a lien upon the papers; and the other on the part of the plaintiffs, who, for want of the papers, were obstructed in proceeding with the suit. Another solicitor, after looking at the pleadings, thought there was a probability of success, and the result was this application. The case which had been cited was an authority, and he thought he must make the order; but it was necessary that the solicitor coming into the suit should undertake to prosecute it with due diligence. If

Mr. Elderton, therefore, would allow Mr. Broughton to have access to the papers, for the purpose of examining them, in order that he might take advice upon the course he ought to pursue, he would not now make any order, but permit this application to stand over. If, however, after examination, Mr. Broughton was willing to give the undertaking, he would make the order.

The application was then ordered to stand over.

(a) Lord COTTENHAM in that case observed, —Since this question was first brought on, I have taken the opportunity of looking at all the cases, and I have now to consider whether I will act on Colegrave v. Manley (1 Turn. & Russ. 400), or will undo what Lord ELDON did in that case. The point was there directly raised whether, if the court is of opinion that there should be a production, the order ought to go beyond giving liberty to inspect and take copies. Lord ELDON, in his judgment, first considered the question arising upon the sale of his business by the solicitor, an act which he held to amount to a discharge by the solicitor of himself. His Lordship says, “I look upon Mr. Raphael as having dissolved the connection of solicitor and client; for it is not enough that he was willing to superintend the plaintiff's business. Now, where the solicitor discharges himself, the rule is quite different from what it is where the solicitor is discharged by the client;” and afterwards he adds, “So far as the use of papers is concerned, the suitor, when his solicitor discharges himself, must have his business conducted with as much ease and celerity, and as little expense, as if the connection of solicitor and client had not been dissolved.”

It is true that in several preceding cases, where the solicitor had discharged himself, orders were made, giving to the client the right of inspection only: but it cannot be supposed that Lord ELDON, who, with all his experience, had decided Colegrave v. Manley, in the year 1823, was not acquainted with the prior authorities. In Cresswell v. Byron (14 Ves. 271), his Lordship intimates, in the form of a doubt, his opinion that a solicitor discharging himself cannot claim a lien; an expression which must be understood as meaning, not that the solicitor loses the lien altogether, but that he cannot set it up so as to prevent the client from proceeding in the cause. And his Lordship's language in Lord v. Wormleighton (Jac. 580) is to the same effect.

Undoubtedly that doctrine may expose a solicitor to very great inconvenience and hardship, if, after embarking in a cause, he finds that he cannot get the necessary funds wherewith to carry it on; but, on the other hand, extreme hardship might arise to the client, if—to take the case which is not uncommon in the smaller practice in the country—a solicitor, who finds a poor man having a good claim, and having but a small sum of money at his command, may go on until that fund is exhausted, and then refusing to proceed further, may hang up the cause by withholding the papers in his hands. That would be a great grievance and means of oppression to a poor client, who with the clearest right in the world might still be without the means of employing another solicitor. The rule of the court must be adapted to every case that may occur, and be calculated to protect suitors against such conduct. Now a solicitor, if he knows that he must trust to the result of the cause for his remuneration, will, of course, be disposed to proceed with it in such a way as while it promotes the interest of his client is most likely to render his lien available. I have no doubt, therefore, that the existence of the lien, while it is a great protection to the solicitor against his client, is also a great benefit to the client; but the benefit would be entirely lost, if the solicitor might stop short in the middle of the suit and insist upon retaining the papers, because then no other solicitor could take up and carry on the cause.

It is admitted that, when the solicitor discharges himself, the client and his new solicitor shall, at all events, have free access to inspect and copy the papers at the office of the former solicitor. The mere giving of access, however, is nine times out of ten of no practical value; for if the papers are to remain, notwithstanding, in the custody of the solicitor who has discharged himself, it is obvious that they cannot be made use of in the further progress of the suit. The result would be, that the client is to be put to the expense of fresh copies; that fresh briefs must be prepared for counsel; in short, that all the costs arising from making copies of the papers and documents to be used in the cause must be incurred over again, and so the client is to be greatly damnified. That is entirely inconsistent with the dictum of Lord ELDON, that the suitor must have his business conducted with as much ease and celerity, and as little expense, as if the connection had not been dissolved.

On the other hand, if all that expense be, in fact, incurred by the client, what is the use of the solicitor's lien? There may, indeed, be original papers; but supposing them, as here, to be papers in the cause, the effect of the rule would only be to impose a very great hardship on the client, without any benefit to the solicitor. But if the expense is to operate so as to compel him rather to pay the solicitor's bill than to go to the expense of fresh copies, the admission of access and inspection would be nugatory and of no value. Now that a suitor, whose solicitor withdraws himself from the further conduct of a cause, shall be permitted to have the free use of the papers held by that solicitor, so far as they may be required in the prosecution of the cause, is quite consistent with the observations of Lord ELDON in Commerell v. Poynton (1 Swans. 1) and Lord v. Wormleighton. Those observations, coupled with the express decision to that effect in Colegrave v. Manley, leave no doubt in my mind as to what Lord ELDON considered to be the rule in such cases, and I entirely concur in the propriety of that rule.

His Lordship further said, I then take the law as laid down by Lord ELDON, and adopting that law must hold that Mr. Blunt is not to be permitted to impose upon the plaintiff the necessity of carrying on his cause in an expensive inconvenient and disadvantageous manner.

I think the principle should be that the solicitor claiming the lien should have every security not inconsistent with the progress of the cause. But it is clear that there will neither be, to use the expression of Lord ELDON, the same ease and celerity, nor as little expense in the conduct of it, if the new solicitor is merely to have access to the papers, as where they are placed in his hands upon his undertaking to restore them after the immediate purposes of the production have been served. S. C. 3 Myl. & Cr. 187.—EDITOR.

ROLLS' COURT.—June 27.

As to the authority to be given to the Notes of Counsel made upon their Briefs.

A discussion took place as to the degree of authority to be given to the notes of counsel made upon their briefs of the minutes of orders and decrees pronounced by the court.

Mr. Pemberton contended, that if the counsel on one side had taken no notes, the notes taken by the counsel on the opposite side upon their briefs must be held to contain the terms of the decrees and orders made by the court.

Mr. Cooper, contra, referred to the practice of the court and its rules and orders, and submitted that the entry alone of the registrar of the court ought to be consulted. He said that some of the most eminent counsel were known to have been in the habit of not taking any notes at all.

Lord LANGDALE said, that what had been intimated was correct, and that there were orders of court which directed that no attention should be paid to the notes of counsel upon their briefs. Times and practices had, however, changed, and the notes made by counsel upon their briefs had been found by experience to be of so great importance and use, that the orders of the court referred to had in a manner become obsolete, and his Lordship said, he trusted that counsel would continue to give their assistance to the court by continuing their notes in the manner lately practised.

SPECIAL JURY.

WELLER v. LEWIS.—Secretary of the West of England Fire and Life Insurance Company. (a)

MISTATEMENT. — Whether a mistatement made in a claim for loss by fire that is not a substantial mistake and not fraudulently made shall avoid the policy.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff, formerly a hatter, residing at No. 1, Vinegar-yard, Drury-lane, against the Secretary (as the proper officer to be sued,) of the WEST OF ENGLAND FIRE AND LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. Russell Gurney, (with whom was the Attorney-General and Mr. Evans, Q. C.) stated the plaintiff's case. It appeared that the plaintiff, Samuel Weller, was a hat and cap maker, carrying on business at No. 1, Vinegar-yard, Drury-lane, and had on the 1st May, 1839, effected a policy of insurance from fire upon his stock and utensils in trade, including house fixtures in those premises, described brick built and tiled, for £300, and on the fittings up of the shop £20, subject to the usual conditions of that office. On the 1st June, 1839, a fire took place in the premises by which they were burnt down and the plaintiff's stock destroyed. On the following day he gave notice to the fire office, and delivered an account specifying the articles and buildings destroyed, the value of which exceeded the sum for which he had insured the whole. Upon his claiming the amount of the policy, the defendant refused to pay, and the present action was brought.

The defendant pleaded, 1st, that the plaintiff was not interested to the amount of £320. or any part thereof.

2ndly—That the stock, &c. were not destroyed by fire, without fraud or evil practice of the plaintiff.

3dly—That the plaintiff did not give notice of the fire to the company as soon as possible, stating the particulars of the loss.

4thly—That in the claim there appeared to be fraud and was fraud in stating the amount of plaintiff's loss: and, lastly, non assumpsit.

The plaintiff replied by a similiter to the three first and last pleas, and denied the fourth.

A great number of witnesses gave evidence that the plaintiff and his wife were very honest and industrious persons, that the plaintiff paid ready money for his goods, and consequently kept few accounts, so that the evidence as to the specific value of all the stock was not so satisfactory as if he had kept books, but evidence of quantity and opinion as to value was given. The fire appeared to have arisen from an escape of gas.

COLERIDGE, J. stated the evidence to the jury and observed that the only question they had to decide was whether the claim was fraudulently incorrect. The defendant's counsel had admitted that his evidence was not sufficient to establish the plea that the fire had been caused by the plaintiff, who had called all the witnesses he could to give evidence as to the state of the shop. The payment of ready money for his goods was a proof that he was a thriving man. His Lordship concluded by directing the jury if they should be satisfied that there was not a substantial mistake in the claim made by the plaintiff, there was an end of the question; but that if there was, then they had to consider whether that was fraudulent. His Lordship observed, that although the jury might think themselves bound to find for the plaintiff, they were not bound to find the full amount of the claim, and with these observations he left the case in their hands.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, Damages £250, expressly desiring it to be understood, that in awarding that sum they by no means desired to impute anything like fraud to the plaintiff.

Mr. Evans prayed for speedy execution.

Mr. Hoggins, for the defendant, said that in consequence of the verdict being what it was, the insurance office would at once pay the money.

(a) We have to thank Messrs. Parker and Webster, the plaintiff's attorneys, for the papers in this case.—ED.

LORD DENMAN, in Stevens v. Harman, (which was a case on a fire policy, where the defence was an attempt to defraud the office by false statements,) said, the jury would have to decide by the conflicting testimony before them, whether there was an attempt on the part of the plaintiff to cheat the insurance office by a false statement of his losses, and whether he had deprived himself under the conditions of the policy of the insurance money. It was not unjustifiable in a man to put his claim at the highest point reasonable and proper under such circumstances; but if the jury were of opinion that the plaintiff has furnished a fraudulent statement of his losses, they would of course find a verdict for the defendant. Q. B. 13, Dec. 1839, M. S. S. And Lord ABINGER, in a similar case that came before him in the Court of Exchequer at Nisi Prius on Friday last, observed, that the question the jury had chiefly to consider was, whether the plaintiff had made an intentional misrepresentation for the purpose of defrauding the insurance company; if they did not believe so, they were bound to find a verdict for the full amount of the value of the property proved to have been destroyed by the fire. *Gravenor v. PEACOCK v. TRIMMELL.

LIABILITY of SHOPKEEPERS to damages for injuries sustained by PASSENGERS in the public streets, occasioned by SHUTTER APERTURES in the foot pavements.

Mr. Sergeant Talfourd, for the plaintiff, stated, that this action was brought to recover compensation for injuries sustained by the plaintiff, through the negligence of the defendant. The defendant kept a trimming shop in Regent-street, the window shutters of which were let down in the morning through a trap-door into the area, through which they were raised in the evening when the shop was closed for the night. On the night of the 9th of March last year, the plaintiff was passing along the street towards the Quadrant at the time when the shutters were being fastened, and just as the bar used for that purpose had been drawn up, he unfortunately fell into the aperture, and was severely injured, his lip being cut in two places, and his shoulder sprained. He was attended by a medical man for a period of five weeks, but he was not altogether prevented from attending to his business during that period. According to the plaintiff's witnesses, the aperture at the time of the accident was left unwatched, the place was dark, and no warning given. On the other side, it was stated that one of the defendant's porters was standing at the aperture at the time, he having just raised the bar, and that the accident was owing to the plaintiff's having the moment before been looking into a hairdresser's shop next door, in which there was a brilliant light, the glare of which must have dazzled the plaintiff's eyes, and so caused him incautiously to step within the bar which the porter was about to place against the shutters.

Mr. Petersdorff, for the defendant, contended that there had been no misconduct on the part of Mr. Trimmell. He had been guilty of no neglect, or gross and wilful carelessness, in exercising the right and accommodation to which every shopkeeper was entitled, for the convenience of duly transacting his business and protecting his property. On the contrary, the plaintiff himself was the party to whose charge negligence ought to be laid, he having walked on the area railings, while the path was the proper part for passengers along the street.

ERSKINE, J., left it to the jury upon this conflicting evidence to say whether the accident was attributable to the negligence of the defendant's servant, or to the plaintiff's own want of caution.

Verdict for the plaintiff—Damages, £20.

PHILLIPS AND OTHERS v. HUTH THE ELDER AND OTHERS.

PRACTICE.—COMMISSION to examine witness abroad after Rule for New Trial granted.

We so recently reported this case, (a) that the facts of it need not be here repeated. The rule for a new trial was made absolute on the 29th of April last, on the ground that no evidence was given on the trial to show the circumstances under which the tobacco warrants were "entrusted" to Messrs. Warwick and Claggett.

Mr. Kelly now applied to the court, on behalf of the defendant, for a commission to examine Mr. Warwick, who resided in or near New York, and who, it was alleged, was the only person who could supply the deficiency in the evidence.

Mr. Cresswell opposed the application, on the ground that the only object in making it was to delay the plaintiff in his endeavours to recover his just claims. The defendants had really no bona fide intention of examining the witness in question. They had already had two commissions for that purpose, on neither of which had anything effectual been done.

Mr. Kelly explained that the failure of the two former commissions was owing to the fact that the residence of Mr. Warwick could not be correctly ascertained; and, with regard to the imputation of an intention to delay the plaintiff, he observed that there was no suggestion, by him or otherwise, of such a motive in any of the affidavits.

Lord ABINGER said the court ought not to be governed in its decision by either the magnitude of the sum or the respectability of the parties, but by the known rules of practice in such cases. The defendants had gone to trial without the former commissions being returned, and without the evidence of this same witness, and they now applied for a third commission upon a suggestion that the residence of the witness had been since ascertained and was now, more correctly ascertained than it was before. There was no suggestion whatever in the affidavits as to what they expected the witness would prove; they had merely stated, as they did before, that he was a material witness. From all the circumstances it appeared to him that the defendant had made out no case for coming to the court for another commission.

Mr. Baron ALDERSON was of the same opinion. It ought to have been stated in the affidavits what the evidence of Mr. Warwick was likely to be, if the nature of it were known, and if not, he could not see how any one could conscientiously swear that to be material of which he knew nothing.—The other barons concurred. Application refused.

DOE DEM — v. ROE.

PRACTICE.—AFFIDAVIT to obtain Rule for Judgment against the casual Ejector—Necessity for its strictness in point of form.

Mr. Harlstone moved for a rule for judgment against the casual ejector. It appeared by the affidavit of service, that it had been duly made in May, without saying "last." The affidavit was sworn in the present month, and perhaps the court would infer that the service must have taken place in the last preceding month of May.

Mr. Baron PARKE.—No. That won't do; we must adhere to the strict rules in this case. You can get the affidavit amended in the course of the term.—Rule refused.

REVIEW OF NEW BOOKS.

A CHART, shewing the Distribution of the Personal Estate of an Intestate, under 22 & 23 Charles II. c. 10, and 29 Charles II. c. 30. By W. B. D., Gent., One, &c.

We have before us another very useful Chart of intelligence in relation to PERSONAL PROPERTY; Companion to the Chart of Real Property we have already noticed. The Chart is, in fact, a table showing the line of parties entitled to the distribution, to which is attached a KEY that makes it easy of understanding. The CUSTOMS of different places in ENGLAND and WALES are also given, as well as the CANONS or Rules by which the law divides the personal estate of an intestate. These latter the author thus describes:—

“1. THAT in all cases where there is only one person who is next of kin to the intestate, and no other relation in equal degree, that one person takes the whole.

“2. Where representation is allowed, all the children of such deceased person as may be entitled to a share take such, their parent's share, among them.

“3. If a person dies without children, grandchildren, father or mother, and his estate is divided between his brothers and sisters, and their children, the same rule is adopted as in the case of children or grandchildren. (See Rule 2.)

“4. If there be neither children, grandchildren, father, mother, brothers, or sisters, but a grandmother living, she takes the whole of the estate, and his uncles (if he has any) do not share with her; contrary to the case of his own mother, and brothers and sisters.

“5. In case of the intestate leaving only uncles and aunts, and nephews and nieces (being children of a deceased brother or sister), the uncles and aunts take equally with the nephews and nieces, being all next of kin in equal degree.

“6. If the intestate leaves his wife with child, such child when born shall have an equal share with the other children, or such other share as it would have been entitled unto if born and living at the time of his death.

“7. Where distribution is made among the children of the intestate, such children (excepting the heir-at law, 2 P. Wms. 441, 2) must bring into hotchpot any advancement made by the intestate in his lifetime. (Sec. 5. 2 P. Wms. 442.)

“8. The lineal descendants of the intestate, in infinitum, are preferred to all ascendants or collaterals. (Sec. 6, Keylway v. Keylway, 2 P. Wms. 346.)

ESSAY.

ON THE ENGLISH LAW OF BAILMENTS.

It was the practice in former times, by the declaration in an action against common carriers to charge them as common carriers, and make them liable for negligence by the custom of the realm, but it was afterwards held to be unnecessary to do so because the custom of the realm is the common law of the land, which the Courts of Law take notice of, and the distinction has, for many years prevailed between general and special customs in this respect. Afterwards the practice appears to have been to charge the defendants to be common carriers for hire, totidem verbis. That, however, was departed from in Brotherton v. Wood (a), and Pozzi v. Shepton (b). The principle laid down in those cases was, that common carriers are made liable, not on contract, but by the custom of the realm; and that, in a declaration charging several defendants as common carriers, it follows, that it is strictly an action on the case for a tort, and that one of several defendants may be found guilty upon it. This was maintained in Brotherton v. Wood. The declaration there stated, that the defendants were proprietors of a stage coach for the conveyance of passengers for hire (which the Court construed to mean common carriers), and received the plaintiff to be safely carried for hire from A to B, and by reason thereof ought to have safely carried him; but that they, not regarding their duty, conducted themselves so carelessly in that behalf, that the plaintiff, by their carelessness, while being so conveyed, was injured. A second count stated that the plaintiff became a passenger at the special instance of the defendants. It was held that a verdict against eight of ten defendants, the other two being found not guilty, was good. In Ansell v. Waterhouse (c), the defendant pleaded in abatement to a similar declaration, that there were parties jointly liable who were not sued; and the plea was held bad. BAILEY, J. there adverts to Govett v. Radnidge (d), where the declaration stated that three defendants had the loading of a hogshead of treacle of the plaintiff, for reward to be paid by him to them, but so carelessly conducted themselves in the loading, that, by reason thereof, the hogshead was broken; and a verdict against one defendant only was held good. His Lordship said, that if it were necessary to choose between conflicting cases (which necessity, however, he thought did not arise), he should be disposed to adhere to Govett v. Radnidge.

The next question to consider is: Who is the proper party to sue?

First. Where the goods are consigned to a particular carrier by order of the consignee, and the goods are lost through the default of the carrier, the consignor cannot maintain an action against the carrier for the loss, although he paid for the booking of the goods. The action can only be brought by the consignee. It was formerly the doctrine that an action on the case for goods lost might be maintained against a carrier, either by the consignor or consignee, and that it might be brought by the consignor notwithstanding a private agreement between him and the consignee that the carriage should be paid by the latter, the carrier being liable upon his agreement (e). This, however, has been overruled, and the question now is governed by the consideration in whom the property of the goods is vested. This was settled by Lord KENYON in Daves v. Peck (f), which was an action on the case by the consignor of goods against the defendant, a common carrier, for not safely carrying according to his undertaking in consideration of certain hire and reward to be therefore paid for two casks of gin from London to one Thomas Odey at Hillmorton, in Warwickshire, within the time limited by two excise permits, in consequence of which the casks of gin became forfeited to the Crown and were seized. The plaintiff proved his case by shewing the delivery of the casks to a person employed by the defendant at the usual place, where they were booked to be sent by the defendant's waggon, and the usual price paid for booking by the plaintiff's servant. The casks were directed to "Mr. Odey, Hillmorton, near Rugby, Warwickshire; by Peck's waggon." It appeared that they were afterwards sent by the waggon, and were left at the Crown Inn at West Haddon, which was the nearest place to Hillmorton, in the road which the waggon travelled; and when, after laying some time, they were seized in consequence of the time mentioned in the permit for their removal being expired.

Lord KENYON was of opinion that the action by the consignor could not be supported for that the legal right to the goods after such delivery was vested in the consignee, to whom alone the carrier was answerable, at all, and the plaintiff was nonsuited. Upon argument of a rule for a new trial, Daves v. James, and Moor v. Wilson, were cited in support of it, to shew that the action might be maintained against the carrier either by the consignor or consignee, and that the reason of the thing was more in favour of the action by the consignor, by reason of privity of contract between him and the carrier.

(e) Davis v. James, 5 Burr. 2680; Moor v. Wilson, 1 Term Rep. 659; 3 Camp. 320.

(f) 8 Term Rep. 320. See ante, p. 131.

Lord KENYON, C. J. said, I cannot subscribe to one part of the argument urged on behalf of the plaintiff, namely, that the right of property on which the action is founded is to fluctuate according to the choice of the consignor or consignee; and that, consequently, either of them may, at his pleasure, maintain an action against the carrier for the non-delivery of the goods. The legal rights of the parties must be certain, and depend upon the contract between them, and cannot fluctuate according to the inclination of either. This question must be governed by the consideration in whom the legal right was rested; for he is the person who has sustained the loss, if any, by the negligence of the carrier; and whoever has sustained the loss is the proper party to call for compensation from the person by whom he has been injured. The facts are these, a man in Warwickshire gave an order for goods from London, which he directed to be sent by a certain carrier, and the dealer in London delivered them accordingly to that carrier to be conveyed to the vendee. Upon this short statement, there can be no doubt, but that, after such a delivery, the vendee must stand to the risk. Then, here, the damnum et injuria are to him and not to the vendor, the plaintiff. I do not find that any thing which has been advanced is broken in upon by the two cases which have been relied upon in the argument—the distinction which is there taken I fully adopt. In the one case, the action brought by the consignor against the carrier was sustained, because the consignor was to be answerable for the price of the carriage; he stood, therefore, in the character of an insurer to the consignee for the safe arrival of the goods. And the subsequent case of Moor v. Wilson, proceeded on the same ground. It is not disputed but that the consignee might have maintained the action in this case; then, if the consignee had recovered a verdict against the carrier, how could such recovery by a stranger have been pleaded in bar to this action? And if it could not, and yet this action could be maintained, the consequence would be, that the carrier would be liable to answer in damages to both for the same loss. Therefore, common sense and justice, as well as strict law, are in favour of the objection made against the plaintiff's recovering in this action (g).

PROBLEM XI.—VOL. IV.

INTERESSE TERMINI.
What is it?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LEGAL GUIDE.

Sir,—I beg to enclose you an answer to the 20th Problem of the 3rd vol. of the Legal Guide. When I first perused the Answer of "ALIVUIS" (a) to the same Problem, I thought of writing an Addenda to his answer, but on reperusing it I found that as there were so many omissions in it it would be less trouble to write an original solution of the same problem than to carry my former intentions into effect. This I have done; and although it is not a complete essay on that part of the Bankrupt Laws on which it treats, yet I am confident it will, in some measure, supply the defects which are to be found in the answer of "ALIVUIS."

I am, Sir,

Yours obediently,

ANSWER TO PROBLEM 20. VOL. 3. BANKRUPTCY.

What are the different acts of Bankruptcy?

The 6 G. 4, c. 16, s. 3, enacts, That if any such trader (1) (see ante, vol. 3, p. 403) shall depart this realm (2), or being out of this realm, shall remain abroad (3) or depart from his dwelling-house (4), or otherwise absent himself (5), or begin to keep his house (6), or suffer himself to be arrested for any debt not due (7), or yield himself to prison (8), or suffer himself to be outlawed (9), or procure himself to be arrested, or his goods, money or chattels to be attached, sequestered, or taken in execution (10), or make or cause to be made, either within this realm or elsewhere, any fraudulent grant or conveyance of any of his lands, tenements, goods, or chattels (11), or make or cause to be made any fraudulent surrender of any of his copyhold lands or tenements (12), or make or cause to be made any fraudulent gift, delivery, or transfer of any of his goods or chattels (13); every such trader doing, suffering, procuring, executing, permitting, making, or causing to be made, any of the acts, deeds, or matters aforesaid, with intent to defeat or delay his creditors, shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy (14).

(g) See also Snee v. Prescott, 1 Atk. 248; Dutton v. Solomonson, 3 Bos. & Pull. 582; Jacobs v. Neilson, 3 Taunt. 428; also, Duff v. Budd, 3 Brod. & Bing. 177, where the vendor was induced by the fraud of a swindler, to deliver goods to a carrier for him, and the carrier, by negligence, let him get possession of them. It was held the vendor might sue the carrier in his own name as no property had passed from the vendor.

(a) Ante, vol. 3, p. 371; see also ante, p. 37.

By section 4 of the same statute it is enacted, that where any such trader shall execute any conveyance or assignment by deed to a trustee or trustees of all his estate and effects, for the benefit of all the creditors of such trader, the execution of such deed shall not be deemed an act of bankruptcy, unless a commission issue against such trader within six calendar months from the execution thereof by such trader, provided that such deeds shall be executed by every such trustee within 15 days after the execution thereof by the said trader, and that the execution by such trader, and by every such trustee, be attested by an attorney or solicitor; and that notice be given within two months after the execution thereof by such trader, in case such trader reside in London or within 40 miles thereof, in the London Gazette, and also in two London daily newspapers; and in case such trader does not reside within 40 miles of London, then in the London Gazette, and also in one London daily newspaper, and one provincial newspaper published near to such trader's residence; and such notice shall contain the date and execution of such deed, and the name and place of abode respectively of every such trustee, and of such attorney or solicitor.

Section 5 enacts, that if any such trader shall lie in prison for the space of 21 days after his having been arrested or committed to prison for debt, or on any attachment for nonpayment of money, or having been committed to prison for any other cause, shall lie in prison for 21 days after any detainer for debt lodged against him and not discharged; or if any such trader having been arrested, committed, or detained for debt shall escape out of prison or custody, every such trader shall be deemed to have thereby committed an act of bankruptcy from the time of such arrest. But the escape must be one in fact, and not merely that which might be deemed an escape in contemplation of law. (Rose v. Green, 1 Burr. 437.)

filing a declaration of insolvency or compounding with the petitioning creditor. (Vide ante, p. 4.)

Section 9 enacts, that if any such trader having privilege of Parliament shall commit any of the aforesaid acts of bankruptcy, a commission of bankruptcy may issue against him and be proceeded in in like manner as against any other trader, but with certain exceptions as to arrest. And section 10 provides, that if a trader having privilege of Parliament shall neglect, for the space of one calendar month, after being served with a writ of summons to pay, secure, or compound for such debt to the satisfaction of such creditor, or to enter into a bond with sufficient sureties as therein mentioned, and also to enter an appearance within one month after personal service of such summons, such trader shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy from the time of service of such summons, and any creditor or creditors whose debt or debts amount to a sufficient sum to support a commission, may sue out a commission against him, and proceed thereon in like manner as against other bankrupts. And section 11 provides, that if any such trader having privilege of Parliament shall disobey any order of any Court of Equity, Bankruptcy, or Lunacy, for the payment of money after service, and peremptory day fixed, he shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy, on which a commission may issue as in other cases.

By the 7 & 8 G. 4, c. 57. s. 13, the filing of a petition to the Insolvent Debtors' Court, of every person in actual custody who shall be subject to the laws concerning bankrupts, for his or her discharge from custody according to the said act, shall be an act of bankruptcy from the time of filing such petition; and any commission issuing against such person, and under which he or she shall be declared bankrupt before the time appointed by the said courts, and advertised in the London Gazette, for the hearing of such petition, or at any time within two calendar months from the time of filing such petition, shall have effect to avoid any conveyance and assignment of the estate and effects of such person which shall have been made in pursuance of the provisions of the said act; but the filing of such petition shall not be an act of bankruptcy, unless such person shall be so declared bankrupt before the time advertised, or within two calendar months from the filing the petition. The petition is considered as filed when it reaches its place of final custody, and not when it is delivered to an officer of the court, part of whose duty it is to hand it over to another officer for final deposit. (Garlick v. Sangster, 9 Bing. 46; 2 M. & Scr. 68.)

creditor or creditors in partnership, whose debts amount to £100., or any two creditors whose debts amount to £150., or three or more whose debts amount to £200., of a trader subject to the bankrupt laws, shall file an affidavit in the Court of Bankruptcy, that the debt is due, and that the debtor is such trader, and serve him personally with a copy, and with a written notice requiring payment, and the debtor shall not within 21 days after service pay, or secure, or compound for the debt, or enter into a bond with two sureties to pay the amount to be recovered in any action brought for the recovery of the debt with costs, or to render himself according to the practice of the court, or within such time as the court or a judge shall direct after judgment recovered, he shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy on the twenty-second day after service of the affidavit and notice, provided a fiat issue against him within two calendar months from the filing of the affidavit.

(1) But the party may commit an act of bankruptcy after he has retired from business, provided it be during the existence of a sufficient petitioning creditor's debt, contracted either before the trading commenced (Baillie v. Grant, 1 Bing. 121; 2 M. & Scott. 193), or whilst in trade. (Ex Bamford, 15 Ves. 449; Ex Dewdney, id. 495; Ex Bourne, 16 Ves. 145.)

(2) The word "realm" imports the extent of the courts of this country; and therefore if a trader residing in this country go to Ireland with intent to defeat or delay his creditors, it will be an act of bankruptcy within the meaning of this clause of the act. (Williams v. Nunn, 1 Taunt. 70; Windham v. Paterson, 1 Stark. 144.) So if a trader residing in Ireland or elsewhere, come to this country upon some temporary business and again quit it to avoid being arrested by a creditor, it is a departing the realm within the meaning of this clause. (Williams v. Nunn, supra; Holroyd v. Gwynne, 2 Taunt. 176. And vide ante, p. 3.)

(3) Vide ante, p. 3.

(4) Vide ante, p. 3. But if a trader depart his house with intent to delay his creditors, though upon a groundless apprehension, it is an act of bankruptcy. (Ex Bamford, 15 Ves. 419.) The length of the trader's absence is immaterial, as the act of bankruptcy is complete the moment the trader leaves his house. (Holroyd v. Gwynne, supra; Spencer v. Billing, 3 Camp. 312; Haylin v. Eylooe, 2 Stra. 809.)

(5) The decisions which have taken place upon the meaning of those words and which are also contained in the 13 Eliz. c. 7, s. 1, and Jac. 1, c. 15, s. 2, are as follows; that wherever a trader absents himself from his house merely to avoid a particular creditor (Bigg v.

Spencer, 2 Esp. 651), or for the purpose of avoiding an arrest (Chenoweth v. Hay, 1 M. & S. 676), he will have committed an act of bankruptcy. Or if a trader have no settled place of dwelling, absent himself from his usual place of abode, it will be an act of bankruptcy. Thus where a vender of newspapers, in the habit of attending the Royal Exchange to collect news, retired from 'change upon the approach of a creditor, and desired a friend to tell him he was not there, it was holden an absenting himself within the statute, and an act of bankruptcy. (Gimingham v. Laing, 6 Taunt. 532.) So a trader absenting himself from any place with intent to delay a creditor, commits an act of bankruptcy. (Hall v. Homer, 1 Car. & P. 108; Curteis v. Willes, ib. 211.) The absenting must be voluntary, and not by means of an arrest. (Phillips v. Peake, Greene 52.)

(6) The statute 13 Eliz. c. 7, s. 1, and 1 Jac. 1, c. 15, s. 2, also made it an act of bankruptcy for a trader to keep house in order to delay his creditors. If a trader retire from that part of his house where his business is carried on, and where he usually attended, to a more retired part, to avoid personal applications for money, he will be guilty of a beginning to keep house within this clause of the statute. (Dudley v. Vaughan, 1 Camp. 271; Key v. Shaw, 8 Bing. 320; 1 M. & Scott, 462.) So if a person do not attend his counting-house or office in his usual way, or if he send for his papers to his house, or do not go out as usual, they are circumstances from which a beginning to keep house may be inferred. (See 16 Ves. 149; and see Curteis v. Willes, 4 D. & R. 224; Hawkins v. Howard, 1 R. & M. 64.) The closing the doors and shutters of a bank is a beginning to keep house, though it is not the domicile of the banker. (Cumming v. Bailey, 4 M. & P. 36; 6 Bing. 363; sed vide Ex Mavor, 19 Ves. 543.) Several cases have decided that where a trader orders himself to be denied to a particular creditor, or to creditors generally, it is sufficient evidence to raise a presumption of the trader's beginning to keep house within the meaning of this clause of the statute. But a denial to a trader on a Sunday is not an act of bankruptcy, although the creditor calls by appointment with the bankrupt for payment of his debt. (Ex Preston, 2 V. & B. 311; 2 Rose, 21.)

(7) Vide ante, p. 3.

(8) Where a trader was arrested for a debt which he had sufficient money to discharge, but he chose to go to prison, in order, as he said, to compel his creditors to come to a composition, it was holden to be an act of bankruptcy. (Ex Burton, 7 Vin. Abr. 62.)

(9) Vide ante, p. 3.

means that species of attachment by which suits are commenced; such as the foreign attachment by the custom of London or Bristol, and the like. (Per Lord Mansfield in Clavey v. Hayley, Cowp. 428; and see Cullen, 41, 42.)

(11) A clause something similar to this was contained in the stat. 1 Jac. 1, c. 15, s. 2, but there the words were, "or make or cause to be made any fraudulent conveyance of his, her, or their lands, tenements, goods, or chattels." The words "either within this realm or elsewhere," were introduced in the present statute to prevent any fraud being practised by executing the deeds out of England, as it was decided that the stat. 1 Jac. 1, c. 15, s. 2, did not extend to such conveyances. (Inglis v. Grant, 5 T. R. 530; Norden v. James, Dick. 530.)

The conveyances which have been considered fraudulent within that part of the stat. 1 Jac. 1, which I have just quoted are the following, namely, voluntary conveyances without a valuable consideration which are rendered void as against creditors by the statutes 13 Eliz. c. 5, and 27 Eliz. c. 4 (Hassell v. Simpson, 1 Dougl. 88); and all deeds and conveyances which a court of equity would declare fraudulent (Jacobs v. Sheppard, 1 Burr. 471; Unwin v. Oliver, ib. 481); as well as all cases which either appear from the facts themselves to be, or from the conclusion of law arising from these facts, would be deemed to be fraudulent as against third persons, however fair they might be as between the parties themselves. (Worsley v. Demattos, 1 Burr. 467.) And it was also decided that the conveyance must have been by deed, properly stamped, and duly executed by all parties, but as in the present statute the words are "any grant or conveyance of lands, goods," &c., and in a subsequent part of the same section there is a provision that if any trader "make or cause to be made any fraudulent gift, delivery, or transfer, of any of his goods or chattels," he shall be guilty of an act of bankruptcy, it is plain that the transfer may be made without deed, and it would therefore be waste of time to enumerate the various cases and decisions which have taken place upon the words contained in the 1 Jac. 1, and upon which it was so decided that a deed was necessary.

(13) This includes mere manual delivery or transfer as well as conveyances by deed or otherwise. A bill of exchange is within the meaning of this section, and the fraudulent delivery or transfer of which will constitute an act of bankruptcy. (Cumming v. Bailey, 6 Bing. 363.)

(14) Every act of bankruptcy must consist of two parts, namely, first, of the act itself, which has already been treated of; and, secondly, of the intention with which it was committed. This must be done with intent to defeat or delay creditors; for if done to avoid performing a mere duty, as to avoid an arrest upon an excom. cap., or the service of process to enforce a decree in Chancery (unless a decree for the payment of money), (Com. Dig. Bankrupt, C.; 1 Coke, 89), or to avoid an attachment upon an award for not delivering goods pursuant thereto (Per Willes, C. J. in Linwood v. Eade, 1 Atk. 196), it will not of itself constitute an act of bankruptcy, unless accompanied by circumstances from which also an intent to defeat or delay creditors may fairly be presumed, but if the intention to defeat or delay the creditors actually existed at the time the act was committed, it is little matter whether a creditor was thereby defeated or delayed or not. This point has been so long settled, that it is thought useless to cite any cases in support of the proposition.

Imperial Parliament.

HOUSE OF LORDS—July 2.

APPEALS.

THE QUEEN OF PORTUGAL v. SIR R. C. GLYNN, BART., AND OTHERS.

DON MIGUEL'S LOAN—BILL OF DISCOVERY—Whether it can be supported against persons interested in the subject matter of the action, but not parties to the record.

APPEAL from the JUDGMENT of the LORD CHIEF BARON, overruling a demurrer put in by the QUEEN of PORTUGAL to the bill filed by the respondents.

The following are briefly the facts of this case. In the year 1829, Don Miguel, who was then de facto at the head of the Portuguese Government, negotiated a loan with two persons, subjects of France. Bonds were given to those individuals for the repayment of the loan, which was to be raised by bills drawn upon certain parties of England and France. The bills upon this country were transmitted to the respondents who are eminent bankers in London, and who accepted them. Upon Don Miguel being de-throned and declared an usurper, the present Queen of Portugal repudiated the loan, and ultimately a bill of discovery was filed, to which that Queen was made a party. The defendant put in a demurrer on the ground that the bill ought to have been for relief instead of discovery. Upon the demurrer being argued before the LORD CHIEF BARON, it was overruled, and against that decision the present appeal was brought.

The LORD CHANCELLOR stated that it was much to be regretted that so long a time had elapsed since the case was argued. It did not, however, arise from any doubt that he entertained upon the case, but from a desire to examine and look into the cases cited. The principal question in the cause was, whether a bill of discovery could be supported against persons interested in the subject matter of the action, but not parties to the record. The LORD CHIEF BARON was of opinion that they could, and upon that ground directed the demurrer to be overruled. The LORD CHANCELLOR could not agree with that proposition, and in that opinion he was fortified by the decisions of Lord ELDON in the cases of "Fenton v. Hughes" (a), and "The Mayor and Corporation of London v. Davi." (b). He was, therefore, clearly of opinion that the judgment of the Lord Chief Baron must be reversed.

Lord LYNDRUST fully concurred in the opinion expressed by his noble and learned friend. He considered the case of "Fenton v. Hughes" directly in point, and the judgment in that case had been affirmed in the case of "Powell and Yates."

Lord BROUGHAM expressed his entire concurrence in the view taken of the case by his two noble and learned friends.

Lord WYNFORD felt great diffidence in placing his opinion in opposition to the opinions of two noble and learned friends; but if their opinions were adopted by the House, as he feared they would, the Queen of Portugal would obtain a sum of money to which she had no title upon earth, and one of the foulest frauds that he could conceive would be committed. His own opinion clearly was that the decision to which the Lord Chief Baron had come, was correct, and ought not to be disturbed.

Judgment ordered to be reversed.

VICE-CHANCELLOR'S COURT—June 20.

TOMLINSON v. THE MANCHESTER AND BIRMINGHAM RAILWAY COMPANY

VENDOR AND PURCHASER—MISTAKE—Whether a purchaser taking possession under mistake is bound to bring his purchase money into Court—Ordinary Rule of the COURT.

Mr. Knight Bruce and Mr. G. L. Russell appeared for the plaintiff.

This was a motion on behalf of the plaintiff, the Rev. J. W. Tomlinson, rector of Stoke-upon-Trent, that the Manchester and Birmingham Railway Company might be ordered to pay into court the sum of £15,098. under a contract entered into for the purchase of a portion of the glebe lands of the rectory before the incorporation of the company. Under the powers of a private act of Parliament passed in the 7th and 8th of George IV. the plaintiff was enabled, with the consent of the patron and ordinary, to alienate certain glebe lands belonging to the rectory, and in 1837 two projects were set on foot for constructing different lines of railway from Manchester to Birmingham, one called the Manchester, Cheshire, and Staffordshire Railway, and the other the Manchester South Union. The plaintiff made his contract with the latter by an agreement with the provisional committee, in March, 1837. When the rival projects were carried before Parliament, it was found expedient to adopt some portions of each line, and an amalgamation of the two infant companies took place, out of which the present one grew, on the understanding that, in every case where either company should have entered into any contracts with landowners whose property might be affected by whichever of the two projected lines might be adopted, though in a somewhat different mode, and the company projecting the accepted line should not have made contracts with the individual landowners, the contracts so entered into by the company proposing the rejected line should be adopted by the united company. In the beginning of 1838 the present company intimated some intention of varying their line, and having expressed a doubt whether they should require the plaintiff's land, the present bill was filed by the plaintiff against the defendants for a specific performance of the contract, and by the answers of the company it was found the company denied their liability to perform the contract. A supplemental bill was then filed by the plaintiff, setting forth an alleged adoption of the contract of the company, and alleging acts of ownership on their part, such as the agent of the company having entered into possession of the land, and having let a portion of it to two persons, and with having received the sum of £5. 10s. by way of rent. The answer of the defendants to the supplemental bill set forth that such acts of ownership proceeded from a mistake on the part of their agent, Mr. Barlow, who, as soon as he discovered the mistake, took every step in his power to rectify the error, by returning the money received as rent to the plaintiff, and re-delivering possession of the land. The company denied that they now were, or ever had been in possession, but that, even if the Court decided otherwise, they were at liberty to elect whether they would give up possession or pay the purchase-money into court, as the plaintiff was not entitled to both.

Mr. Knight Bruce, for the plaintiff, submitted that a purchaser taking possession of land comprised in an agreement was invariably compelled by the court to pay the amount of his purchase-money into court until all matters in dispute should be settled.

Mr. Wigram, Mr. Koe, Mr. L. Lowndes, and Mr. S. Sharpe, appeared for the defendants.

Mr. Wigram opposed the motion, and submitted that the company never had actual bond fide possession of the land; that the short possession which had been had, was had through a mistake on the part of the company's agent, he not being authorised by the company to take possession; and that as that mistake had been promptly rectified, and the land re-delivered into the possession of the plaintiff, the rule of the court alluded to by the other side was not applicable to the case.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that cases of this kind depended very much upon the peculiar circumstances of each case. He admitted that if a purchaser did deliberately take possession of land without consent, that might be in some instances a reason why the court would order the purchase money to be paid into court, and that might be, even though the purchaser might be willing to give up possession. But the ordinary rule of the court seemed to be, that where a party took possession, and was in possession of the land, he should not be at liberty to retain possession of the land, and at the same time keep back the payment of the purchase-money. The present case appeared to his Honour to differ totally in its circumstances from any other case of the kind he ever recollected. The mere question here was, whether there had not been a possession, by the company, of the land. It did appear to his Honour that the acts which had in this case been done by the agent of the company, Mr. Barlow, were acts done under a mistake, and he did not think that the affidavits showed that there was any deliberate intention on the part of the company to take possession of the land in the ordinary way. His Honour then went into a detail of the facts of the case relating to Mr. Barlow, the company's agent, taking possession of the land by mistake, and observed, that it appeared to him that what Mr. Barlow had done was done under a mistake, and that he had immediately taken such steps as he could to rectify it. His Honour did not understand the company ever to have been in actual possession of the land, nor even, under all the circumstances of the case, to have been constructively in possession. It did, therefore, appear to him that there was nothing in the case to justify the court in ordering the purchase-money into court. There was this remarkable circumstance in this case, that the company, by their act, had power to carry their railway through the parish of Stoke-upon-Trent, or not to carry it through the parish of Stoke-upon-Trent, as they pleased. If, then, the company should not carry the railway through the parish of Stoke-upon-Trent, it was not clear to him that the company would have any power to purchase land in Stoke-upon-Trent; and, if they should elect not to carry their railway through Stoke-upon-Trent, then this was a contract with reference to which he conceived the court could grant no relief, because the company would then have no authority to purchase any land in Stoke-upon-Trent for that purpose. Upon the whole of the case, his Honour thought it would now be too much, upon the hearing of a motion to bring the purchase-money into court, to conclude that the land was purchased land, and therefore to be thrust upon the company. He would not, therefore, make any order for the payment of the money into court; and, as what had taken place appeared upon the showing of the company's agent to be a mistake, he thought, therefore, it would be too much to refuse the motion with costs. Refused, but without costs.

GRAHAM v. OLIVER.*

VENDOR and PURCHASER.—Specific performance of Contract.—Where a Vendor has only a limited interest in the estate contracted to be sold, and is thereby incapable of performing the whole Contract.—FRAUD.—Jurisdiction of the Court.

This suit was instituted by Mr. Wm. Graham, a solicitor of respectability and property at Abingdon, Berks, against John Oliver, Esq. nephew of Sir Charles Saxton, late of the same place, for a specific performance of the following contract:—

fields or parish of Abingdon aforesaid, containing 93 a. 1 r. and 7 p. And all the crops now growing on the said farms and lands, and the profits thereof, and of the said tithes, from Lady-day except that the said John Oliver shall and reside in the dwelling-house now occupied by him until Lady-day 1839, without paying any rent for the same. The said John Oliver agrees to make out a good title to the said premises, and the said Wm. Graham agrees to pay the said purchase-money on the 24th day of June next, to pay the expence of his conveyance; and agreed that the said John Oliver shall have the use of the front yard and the close with the same until Lady-day 1839. And the said Wm. Graham agrees to give him the cuttings of 3 acres of meadows.

This contract was left by the plaintiff in the possession of the defendant without the plaintiff receiving any copy of it. Before the contract was made, some discussion took place as to including the cottages standing upon the homestead, the defendant observing he was not quite sure whether they belonged to his father or himself; but as the plaintiff would not make the purchase without them, it was ultimately agreed that the cottages should be included in the purchase. On the day following the signing the agreement, the defendant wrote the plaintiff, that he could not consent to sell the cottages, and that he required to be paid the expences of the crops, to which the plaintiff replied reminding the defendant of the previous discussion, and that he would not make the purchase without them, and that as to the crops, it was expressly agreed that the plaintiff should not be subject to any expences whatever.

The plaintiff then wrote the defendant for a copy of the agreement which was replied to by the plaintiff that he had made any agreement, and therefore he was unable to furnish a copy. The plaintiff then sent his brother, Mr. Wm. Graham to demand an explanation, and the defendant admitted the execution of the agreement, and that it was in his possession, but refused to produce it or to permit Mr. Wm. Graham to see it, alleging that it was a memorandum and no agreement, and that he might if he pleased throw it behind the fire at any time. The present bill was therefore filed, charging the defendant with fraud in having made the contract by striking out the word "cottages," and prayed a specific performance of the contract, the plaintiff offering specifically to perform his part of the contract upon the defendant making a good and marketable title and executing a proper conveyance and agreement; and that if he was unable to make a good title to the whole, then that he might be decreed to convey to the plaintiff such parts as he was entitled to, and in that case that a reasonable abatement might be made from the purchase-money; also an injunction restraining the defendant from destroying or in any manner defacing or injuring the contract, and that it might be brought into court for safe custody.

The defendant by his answer set out a settlement made by the late Sir Chas. Saxton previous to the marriage of defendant with Miss Emma Matilda Morgan, dated 3 Nov. 1837, in which the freehold lands in the common fields or parish of Abingdon, called "Murses land," (part of the lands contracted to be sold to the defendant,) were conveyed to trustees to the use (after the marriage) of the defendant and his assigns sans waste for life, or which should first happen, until he should be found and declared a bankrupt or take the benefit of any Act or Acts of Parliament passed or to be passed for the relief of insolvent debtors, in either of which events the use or estate theretofore limited to the defendant of and in the said hereditaments and premises should cease and determine, with divers remainders over. The settlement contained a power of sale to the trustees at the request and by the direction of the defendant during his life, and also a power of revocation of the uses of the settlement for effecting such sale, and for the trustees to give legal discharges for the purchase-money without the purchaser being obliged to see to its application.

The defendant also set out a deed of covenant executed by Sir Charles Saxton in contemplation of the defendant's marriage, by which Sir Chas. Saxton did covenant to assign all his interest in the leasehold tithes and all other the premises then held by Sir Chas. Saxton by lease under the Municipal Corporation of Abingdon, (being part of the leasehold property contracted to be sold to the plaintiff,) unto the defendant, his executors, administrators, and assigns, for his and their own benefit absolutely. That the marriage took place. That the plaintiff and defendant met upon the subject of the purchase and sale, and that defendant told the plaintiff that as to the freeholds it was necessary he should have the consent of his trustees to sell it, but that there would be no difficulty in obtaining it. That as to the crops, the plaintiff agreed to pay the expence of cropping, and all the expences from Lady-day, and that as to the agreement the defendant before he signed it struck the word "cottages" out, stating at the time he struck out the same that the cottages did not belong to him. That he had a pen in his hand when he was reading the memorandum and that he so struck out the word "cottages" as he read it, and that after the memorandum had been so altered it was signed by both parties. The defendant then set out the contract, and admitted what took place at his interview with Mr. Thomas Graham. That if the court should be of opinion that the memorandum was a final and binding agreement, he was unable to make a title to or convey the freeholds, as he was only tenant for life, and that he had no power to compel the trustees of the settlement to exercise the power of sale, or to compel them to sell or convey, and that the complainant knew such to be the case, and that with respect to the cottages the defendant had no title whatever to them, and was wholly unable to make a title or to convey or assign them to the plaintiff, and that with respect to a house in Bear-street (other part of the property contracted to be sold), he had no other title except that his mother had promised to give the same to him.

By the evidence it appeared that the full, fair, and just value of the freehold and leasehold lands, tithes, and premises in April 1838, was £4974. 15s. 3d.; that all the leaseholds, except the cottages, were held under the Corporation of Abingdon for the residue of two terms of 21 years, from Michaelmas 1823, at annual rents amounting to £52. 10s., and the cottages were held under the same Corporation for the residue of a term of 21 years from Michaelmas 1837, at an annual rent of 2s. 6d., and that £184. 4s. 2d. would be the full, fair, and just value to be given in April 1838, for the expence of putting in the crops. It also appeared that the defendant had produced the contract to one of the witnesses who read it, and who deposed that the word "cottages" was in, and formed part of the said agreement not struck out or erased, and that the defendant had requested the witness to interfere with the plaintiff to give up the cottages, and that the defendant had written the witness stating that he had quite decided upon selling all at Abingdon, as well freehold as leasehold. Evidence was also given of other parties with whom the defendant had treated with for sale of the property as the absolute owner.

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. Turner, and Mr. G. L. Russell, for the plaintiff.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Sutton Sharpe for the defendant.

Mr. Kindersley said, that the plaintiff was a solicitor at Abingdon, and a man of great experience, and the defendant was a young and inexperienced man; he explained the situation of the defendant by his answer, and contended that the agreement afforded internal evidence that it was not a concluded contract.

Lord LANGDALE said, I have heard no evidence of the defendant's inexperience; he had no adviser, but there is no evidence of want of knowledge. He is 27 years of age, and appears by the evidence to be perfectly competent to look to his own interest.

Mr. Kindersley continued, and observed that it was the case of a professional man dealing for his own benefit, and that there was no one to advise the defendant. He cited Thomas v. Dering, (b) and contended that all the observations in the judgment in that case applied almost verbally to this case.

Mr. Turner replied, and cited Clark v. Seymour. (c)

Lord LANGDALE said, I think this agreement is binding upon the defendant, and I have no difficulty upon the question whether there be an agreement, and the plaintiff is entitled either to a decree for a specific performance, or to damages for a breach of the contract. It does not appear whether as to the freeholds it can be performed specifically—as to them I have a great difficulty. I think, however, if the trustees are of opinion that this is a beneficial contract, and wish to secure the benefit of it for those in remainder, in that case the defendant can perform the contract specifically as to the freeholds, and I shall feel no difficulty in declaring that it ought to be carried into effect, but it required further information to know whether that would be done with reference to both the freehold and leasehold parts of the estate, and if it could not then if the purchaser chose to accept less than the amount of his contract, the vendor must perfect his title to the smaller quantity. I have no doubt as to the leaseholds, and the evidence proves that the word "cottages" was in the agreement at the time of signature by both parties. Let it to the Master to enquire whether the defendant can procure to be made a good title to all the premises comprised in the agreement, including the cottages therein mentioned, or any and what part of such premises; and if the Master should find that the defendant cannot or by application to the trustees cannot make a good title as to any part of the premises, then let the Master state what reasons he cannot make a good title to that part, and liberty to the Master to state special circumstances; reserve further directions as to costs. (1)

(1) In Mortlock v. Buller, (10 Ves. 315.) Lord ELDON thus expresses himself:—"I agree if

(b) 1 Keen, 729. In that case it was held, on application for specific performance, first, that there was a binding contract between the vendor and purchaser, and secondly, that the vendor was bound to perform it if he was able. Secondly, that the vendor ought not to be decreed to request or direct the trustees to execute a conveyance, unless the trustees had a discretion, under the power of sale, which the court had no power or jurisdiction to control; and lastly, that the purchaser was not entitled, in such a case, to have the contract performed to the extent of the vendor's interest, by a conveyance of his life estate and his ultimate reversion.—Ed.

in, having partial interests in an estate, chooses to enter into a contract representing it, and agreeing to sell it as his own. It is not competent to him afterwards to say, though he has valuable interests in it, he has not the entirety, and therefore the purchaser shall not have the benefit of his contract. For the purpose of this jurisdiction, the person contracting under those circumstances, is bound by his assertion in his contract; and, if the vendor proposes to take as much as he can have, he has a right to that, and to an abatement; and the court will not hear the objection by the vendor, that the purchaser cannot have the whole." In the case Dale v. Lister, (cited 16 Ves. 7.) a bill was filed against the vendor for the specific performance of an agreement for the sale of leaseholds held under the Dean and Chapter of Norwich, which the defendant represented himself to be absolutely entitled, as to 24 acres, part of the leaseholds, he was not absolutely entitled, the leaseholds were in effect limited to him for life, with remainder to his sons and daughter in tail. To a part the vendor could not make a good title beyond his own life; he admitted that the plaintiff might put an end to the contract, but insisted that he, the vendor, ought not to be compelled to take less than the stipulated price. A specific performance with a reduction of the purchase-money was decreed; but from the observations made upon the case by Lord ELDON in Milligan v. Cooke, (16 Ves. 1,) there appear to have been circumstances which make the decision questionable.

Again, the case of Milligan v. Cooke, was a bill for a specific performance filed against the vendor, who had represented his interest in certain leasehold estates to be greater than it really was. Lord ELDON decreed that the contract ought to be specifically performed and carried into execution so far as the defendant was able to perform the same; and after clearly defining what, in his view, was the interest which the vendor had offered for sale, and the interest which he really had, he directed an enquiry what was the difference between the value of the interest represented, as proposed for sale, and the actual interest of the vendor in the lease. The decree provided for the case of the Master being unable to ascertain such difference in value, and the purchaser being willing to take such interest as could be given to him with an indemnity. Lord RAGDALE seems to have considered that the jurisdiction was confined within narrower limits than stated by Lord ELDON in Mortlock v. Buller. See Lawrenson v. Butler, (1 Scho. & Lef. 13,) and Harnett v. Fielding, (2 id. 553.)—ED.

COLLS v. COOKE.

SHERIFF'S POUNDAGE.—Right of the Sheriff to Poundage, where the Defendant tenders the amount of the debt and costs to the Officer on presenting his warrant.

The plaintiff in this cause had sued out execution against the defendant, who, when the sheriff's officer came to his house, tendered the amount of the debt and costs, but refused to pay the sheriff's poundage. The officer refused to accept payment without the poundage, and made a levy for the whole amount of debt, costs, and poundage.

Mr. Wightman had obtained a rule Nisi, calling upon the sheriff to show cause why he should not pay over to the defendant the amount of the poundage he had levied.

Mr. Crompton now showed cause against the rule, and contended that the sheriff was clearly entitled to his poundage, whether he levied under the writ or not, inasmuch as he acquired his right to the payment of poundage the instant the writ had come into his possession.

Mr. Wightman, in support of the rule, submitted that the sheriff did not derive the right of poundage in the event of the amount of the debt being tendered prior to the levy having been made.

The Court were of opinion that the rule must be made absolute.—Rule absolute.

SHEPHERD v. PYBUS.

WARRANTY, breach of—Damages for.

This was an action brought against the defendant, a barge builder, for damages for a breach of warranty.

Mr. Sergeant Talfourd stated the plaintiff's case to be that in 1838 he ordered the defendant to build him a barge, which was accordingly done. It was named "The New Dispatch," and delivered to the plaintiff as being fit for use. The plaintiff accordingly sent the barge on a voyage between London and Faversham, but her leakage was so great as to destroy a part of the cargo (cement) to the value of £60. and she had to be extensively repaired which cost upwards of £28. all of which charges the defendant refused to pay when demanded, and to recover which the present action was brought.

Mr. Sergeant Channell, for the defendant, contended, that every new barge leaked considerably when first put on the water; and that usually proper precautions were taken by the owner to prevent any injury resulting from that leakage. The barge in question was of good materials and good workmanship; and it was contended that all the damage that had occurred was the fault of the plaintiff in not taking due care. It was also pleaded that there was no stipulation in the contract that the barge should be fitted for the plaintiff's purposes.

TINDAL, C. J. said, that this was an action for a breach of warranty which the defendant was alleged to have made on the purchase by the plaintiff of a barge built by Mr. Pybus. That warranty was that the barge should be reasonably fit for use. It would be for the jury now to say whether the warranty had been broken or not. They had to decide whether the barge was, when delivered, fit for use, considering its nature and condition, or whether it was unfit, from want of care, on the part of the defendant, in building her.

FALSE IMPRISONMENT.—Necessity for an observation from the Judge occasioned by the frequency of innocent parties being given into custody on charges of felony without any cause.

This was an action to recover damages for false imprisonment.

Mr. Serjeant Bompas, for the plaintiff stated, that the plaintiff and defendant are both dealers in soap; and it appeared that the former, accompanied by a friend, went to the defendant, and offered to sell him a quantity. The defendant, having looked at the soap, fancied that it was his own property, and asked the plaintiff where he had procured it. The latter replied that he bought it from a Mr. Fenimore, but his companion corrected him, and said that the person who had sold him the soap was named Ball, and the defendant thereupon gave both the plaintiff and his friend into custody, and they were taken to the station-house, where they were confined for some time on a charge of felony. It subsequently appeared, however, that the plaintiff had purchased the soap from a person named Harding, upon which the plaintiff and his friend were discharged from custody.

Mr. Serjeant Talfourd, for the defendant, contended that at the time he gave the parties into custody he had reasonable and probable cause to suspect that the soap was his own property, although it subsequently appeared that he was mistaken.

TINDAL, C. J.—Told the jury that the plaintiff having proved his case, the only question for their consideration was the amount of damages.

Verdict for the plaintiff, damages £20.

TINDALL, C. J. said that the jury had come to a very proper decision, and he hoped that a few such verdicts would put an end to actions of this description, which were too common. Persons were too much in the habit of giving innocent parties into custody on charges of felony without any cause whatever.

CUMMING AND ANOTHER v. GRIFFITHS.

SHIPPING. — COLLISION.—Whether the proprietors of a TOWING VESSEL or STEAM TUG are answerable for damages done to the ship in tow by COLLISION.

This was an action brought to recover compensation for injury done to the plaintiffs' vessel, the Agnes, and to two others, while the former was under charge of the defendant's steam-tug. The Agnes, on the day of the accident, left the London Docks, and, when clear of them, was taken in tug by the steamer, which was a "sea-going" one of 600 or 700 tons. When they had proceeded some way, the pilot on board the Agnes, perceiving some vessels coming in an opposite direction, called to the steam-tug to ease her rate. Those in command eased her a little but immediately commenced again her former speed of progress. The pilot then called out for the rope to be cast off, or, in case that could not be done, for it to be cut away from the tug. If that had been done, no accident would, according to plaintiffs' witnesses, have occurred; but the speed of the tug was neither decreased, nor was the rope slackened or cut off. The consequence was, that the steam-tug dragged the Agnes against the Speculation, and rebounding from that vessel came in contact and caused the damage for which the present action was brought.

Mr. Serjeant Bompas for the plaintiffs contended that Messrs. Cumming had the right of action in this case, as it was the duty of the owner of the steam-tug safely to conduct the vessel for the distance contracted. The plaintiffs had been obliged to compensate the owners of the Speculation and Commerce for the injuries done.

The witnesses for the defendant went to prove that the accident had occurred through the want of sufficient precaution by those on board the plaintiffs' ship. In such cases it was understood that the tug and the vessel that was attached to her were so far independent that each was to look to her own safety. The towing-steamer was to be answerable both for its own security and for that of the vessel attached.

Mr. Thesiger, for the defendant, argued that it was the absolute duty of the vessel in the course of being towed to take all proper means and precautions for her own safety and preservation. She ought to be provided in such a manner that if, in order to avoid immediate danger, the towing vessel took a particular course which was likely to lead the ship towed into hazard, the master should be within the command of that ship, so towed, to escape the peril. If she had the warp in such a way that it could not be cut or slackened, it was contended that it would be very hard to make the master of the tug answerable.

Witnesses were called who stated that, in the case of one vessel being towed by a steamer, it was the practice for each to take care of itself; and, in difficulties, to act independently of each other. The usual course was for the ship towed, if danger arose, to cast off the towing-rope, or at least to slacken it.

TINDAL, C. J. said, this was an action brought by the owners of the Agnes vessel against the owners of a tug steamer, in which the former complained that, through the carelessness and negligence of the defendant's servants, they had so managed and conducted that steam-tug that it dragged the plaintiffs' vessel against the Speculation, and afterwards against another ship, the Commerce. The owners of the Agnes had, therefore, been compelled to make compensation to the masters of those vessels for the injuries inflicted. The question for the jury would be whether the case had been made out against the defendant. The contest now was whether the loss, which the plaintiffs assigned as solely attributable to the want of proper care on the part of the defendant's servants was really to be put down to that cause, or whether the plaintiffs' servants were not bound to take certain steps, by the adoption of which this accident would have been avoided. The injury now complained of shaped itself into two particulars: the first by the vessel belonging to the Messrs. Cummings having been first dragged against the Speculation, and then against the Commerce. It would also for the jury to consider whether the notice had been given to the defendant's servants, as had been alleged. His lordship said he thought resolved itself very much into the question whether those on board the ship belonging to the plaintiffs had a bond fide belief that those in the steam-tug would obey the order of the pilot. They would, therefore, have to ask themselves whether the captain of the steamer was going at a rapid rate in the pool, contrary to the directions of the pilot of the Agnes; whether he had acted as a prudent and careful man; and whether, taking the case, the plaintiffs' captain could have taken any course in the emergency to any steps by which the occurrence of the accident would have been avoided. If the jury thought that the plaintiffs had been contributory to their own loss in this instance by not following a prudent and careful course, their case would not have been made out. Their decision must then be for the defendant. There would be no question as to the amount of damages to be awarded, as that would be decided by the court.

Verdict for the plaintiffs.

BURNETT v BAUCH AND OTHERS.

SHIP BROKERS. — FREIGHT. — Whether the Owners of a Ship are obliged to pay more than one Broker, that party being the one through whose introduction the Merchant is found, who ultimately freights the Ship, or executes the charter-party.

This was an action to recover the sum of £39, and was brought by the plaintiff, a ship-broker, against the defendants, the owners of the ship Wilton, for commission due to him by reason of his having found a freight for that ship.

It appeared that the plaintiff was the broker who had introduced the merchant to the captain of the vessel, but in reality the charter-party was ultimately executed at the office of another broker. That the Wilton, as wanting a freight, had been entered upon the books of the plaintiff, and that the captain had subsequently called and requested the plaintiff to let him know of the first application he might have for a vessel of his tonnage (about 130 tons). In March, a merchant of the name of Ballard called at the plaintiff's office, and having stated that he wanted a ship of about 130 tons to go out for a cargo at St. Domingo, he was shown the book in which the names and descriptions of the various vessels were entered. After looking through the list, Mr. Ballard selected the Wilton as that which was likely to suit him. He then requested that the captain might be appointed to meet him at the counting-house of the plaintiff at a given hour. The appointment was in pursuance of this instruction made, and in due time the two parties were brought into each other's presence. In the course of the interview the captain demanded a freight of £4. 10s. whilst the merchant declined to give more than £4. 5s. To this an offer was eventually made to split the difference; but that proposition not exactly meeting the views of the one party, they separated with a distinct understanding that they were to meet on 'Change in the afternoon. Accordingly the plaintiff kept his engagement, and was on 'Change at the hour which had been fixed, when neither the captain nor the merchant made their appearance. On the succeeding morning the plaintiff's clerk went down to the captain, and asked him how it was that he had not kept his appointment, as had been arranged, for the preceding afternoon; whereupon he stated, that after he had quitted the plaintiff's counting-house, he and the merchant had gone to the office of another broker, where, in consequence of the latter having agreed to give him some little advantage in an outward freight, he had consented to split the difference, and to take £4. 7s. 6d. as proposed at the plaintiff's office.

The question between the parties was as to which of two brokers, or whether both; was entitled to the payment of commission on the freight.

Several witnesses were called to show that the usage was to pay the commission to the broker who introduced the merchant, or the party who ultimately executed the charter-party, to the ship, whether it so happened that such execution took place at the office of the particular broker, or that of some other.

The defence was, that the proper broker to be paid was the broker through whose instrumentality the charter-party or contract had been ultimately executed: and, therefore, inasmuch as that the plaintiff had not been such party, he was not entitled to set up the claim.

Verdict for the plaintiff, £39.

JOINT STOCK BANKING COMPANIES.

WE are enabled to give a very full report of the important appeal case in the House of Lords (The London Joint Stock Bank v. the Bank of England), embracing rights and privileges of all the Joint Stock Banks in the Kingdom, and it is of great importance to all the COUNTRY BANKS. By the statute 3 & 4 W. IV. c. 98. the right of carrying on the business of banking is extended upon certain conditions to partnerships, consisting of more than six persons in London, or within any distance in London.

The exclusive privileges of the Bank of England have been continued in Acts of Parliament from the 6th Anne to 7th George IV. c. 46. which was the first statute that enabled banks to be established by more than six persons. But that Act did not extend to London, or to places within sixty-five miles of London.

The question between the Bank of England and the London Joint Stock Bank, when reduced, is of great simplicity. It is whether the circumstance of a Canadian bank, drawing bills of exchange upon the manager of a London Joint Stock Bank in his individual capacity, which he accepts payable at such Joint Stock Bank, and the due payment of which bills is protected in Canada by the guarantee of that bank, is or is not a violation of the Bank of England

Acts of Parliament, and in particular that of the 4th and 5th W. IV. c. 98. This is the sole and simple question, however broad it may appear in the detail. Sir Wm. Follett in his argument before the Master of the Rolls against the injunction, observed,

The London Joint Stock Banks cannot sue and be sued in the name of one of their officers, for that, it is said, would be an infringement of the privileges of the Bank. It has been decided that they cannot accept a bill of exchange, drawn for a less time than six months, for that would be an infringement of the privileges of the Bank; but those privileges ought not to be stretched to an extent which the language of the Acts of Parliament does not warrant. Whether a foreign bill of exchange is within the prohibition is still a question. It is clear that a foreign bill of exchange, drawn by a foreign bank upon a London bank (which has money of the foreign bank in its hands); for the purpose of enabling it to negotiate its paper in this country, can never come into competition with the circulating paper of the Bank of England, and the fair inference, therefore, is that it does not fall within the meaning of the prohibiting clause in the Acts of Parliament.

The Bank has the power, and, if the power, it has shewn that it has the will and the inclination to throw every obstacle in the way of joint-stock banks, and to prevent them, if possible, from carrying on their business. There is no mode in which, so long as the privileges of the Bank continue, they can conduct their business upon an equality with that corporation; but if they can find a mode by which they may avoid some of the inconveniences to which they are exposed, without violating the acts of Parliament, they have a clear right to avail themselves of it. It is not denied, but avowed, that their object is to get out of the provisions of the act of Parliament, if they can; and they have a right to do so. It could not be the intention of the legislature, when it enabled joint-stock banks to be established in London, that the privileges of the Bank should be so constructed as to render it impossible for such joint-stock banks to carry on their business. It cannot be disputed that the London Joint Stock Bank had no right to act as agents of the Canada Bank to make advances for that bank, and to pay its paper to any amount which they thought fit to answer. Suppose the Canada Bank had made their promissory notes payable to the London Joint Stock Bank, that might be done without any infringement of the act of Parliament, and it is, in fact, the course which has been adopted by the country banks. Suppose the bills of the Canada Bank, instead of being drawn on Mr. Peel, as manager of the London Joint Stock Bank, had been drawn upon a merchant resident in the city of London, who thought fit to accept them upon a guarantee from the London Joint Stock Bank, would that have been an infringement of the act of Parliament? A fraudulent evasion of an act of Parliament is an infringement of the act of Parliament and will be dealt with accordingly by the Court of Law or Equity. But a contrivance to avoid the inconveniences to which a class of men are exposed by the penal provisions of an act of Parliament, is not unlawful and cannot be restrained by a Court of Equity, because a Court of Equity cannot extend the provisions of an act of Parliament. ## PROBLEM 12. VOL. IV.

DEVASTAVIT.

What shall not amount to a Devastavit?

ANSWER TO PROBLEM 24. VOL. IV.

DEVASTAVIT.

What shall amount to a Devastavit?

A Devastavit is the mismanagement of the estate and effects of a deceased person, in squandering and misapplying the assets, contrary to the duty imposed on executors or administrators for which they shall answer out of their pockets so far as they had, or might have had.

(a) Bank of England v. Booth, 3 Keen, 479, 3.

assets of the deceased. (1) Executors and administrators may be guilty of a devastavit, not only by a direct abuse by them, as by spending, consuming, or converting to their own use the effects of the deceased, but also by such acts of negligence and wrong administration as will disappoint the claimants on the assets.

The application of the assets to the satisfaction of the executor's own debt to a third party, or the collusive sale of the testator's goods at an under value, are devastavits by direct acts of abuse. The misapplication of the assets in unnecessary expences for the funeral, (2) in the payment of debts out of their legal order to the prejudice of such as are superior, or by an assent to or payment of a legacy where there is not sufficient for the creditors, are examples of devastavit by bad administration; (3) but the payment of a debt of an inferior degree before one of higher, which he had no notice, will not amount to a devastavit. Hawkins v. Day, 1 Dickins, 155. If an executor surrenders the residue of a term for years where the land is of more value than the rent, or assigns a term to attend the inheritance, he is liable for devastavit.

By releasing or compounding debts due to the testator, unless it appears to have been for the benefit of the trust estate, he will be liable for a devastavit. (4) So also, if he applies the assets to the payment of a claim which he is not bound to satisfy, or pays a bond ex turpi causa, or one founded on an usurious contract. (5)

Such acts of negligence or careless administration as defeat the rights of creditors or legacies, or parties entitled in distribution, amount to a devastavit. So if an executor delays the payment on which interest is payable, while he has sufficient funds in hand, he can be charged with the interest. Hall v. Hallet, 1 Cox, 134, 135. (6) If an executor, by his delay in bringing an action, enables the debtor to make a defence under the Statute of Limitations, he is liable for a devastavit. (7)

At law an executor or administrator is liable in respect of assets come fully into his possession or hands, and afterwards lost to the estate. (8) but Courts of Equity are very liberal in making every possible allowance, and are cautious not to hold executors or administrators liable except in very clear cases. (9) Thus in Courts of Equity an executor is not held liable for the loss of the goods of the testator by theft or casualty, or for the loss of money invested on a real security, though without the indemnity of a decree, where, at the time of the investment, there was no reason to suspect the security, but afterwards such security proves bad. (10) With respect to loans upon personal security, the doctrine of the Courts of Equity is, that an executor or administrator lending money upon bond, promissory note, or other personal security, is guilty of a breach of trust, and shall be personally answerable if the security prove defective. Vigrass v. Binfield, 3 Madd. 62; Walker v. Symonds, 3 Swanst. 63. (11) An executor is not liable for any loss by the fall of stocks. (12)

Executors should not allow the money of the testator, at the time of his death, invested on personal security, to remain so, longer than is absolutely necessary, as they will generally be held liable for any loss that may happen, unless they appear to have acted with diligence and good faith. Powell v. Evans, 5 Vesey, 839; Buxton v. Buxton, 1 Mylne and Cr. 80. With respect to losses sustained by the failure of bankers or other persons in whose hands the money of the testator has been deposited by the executor, the rule in equity appears to be, that where the deposit was made from necessity, or conformably to the common usage of mankind, the executor will not be responsible for the loss. Bacon's Abridg. tit. FRIVOLOUS SUITS ACT.

Vic. 3 & 4, cap. 24.

An Act to repeal part of an Act of the forty-third year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, intituled "An Act to avoid trifling and frivolous suits in law in her Majesty's Courts in Westminster," and of an Act of the twenty-second and twenty-third year of the reign of King Charles the Second, intituled "An Act for laying impositions on proceedings at law;" and to make further provisions in lieu thereof.

3d July, 1840.

WHEREAS an Act passed in the forty-third year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, intituled, "An Act to avoid trifling and frivolous suits in law in her Majesty's Courts in Westminster," and another Act in the twenty-second and twenty-third years of the reign of King Charles the second, intituled "An Act for laying impositions on proceedings at law," which recites that many good subjects of this realm have been and daily are undone by such suits, contrary to the intention of the said statute of Queen Elizabeth; but the same evil, notwithstanding, doth still prevail and increase, and it is expedient to make further provisions for the prevention thereof: Now be it enacted by the Queen's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that the said recited Act of the forty-third of Elizabeth, so far as it relates to costs in actions of trespass, or trespass on the case, and so much of the twenty-second and the twenty-third of Charles the Second as relates to costs in personal actions, be and they are hereby repealed.

II. And be it further enacted, That if the plaintiff in any action of trespass, or of trespass on the case, brought in any of her Majesty's Courts at Westminster, or in the Court of Common Pleas at Lancaster, or in the Court of Common Pleas at Durham, shall recover by the verdict of a jury less damages than forty shillings, such plaintiff shall not be entitled to recover or obtain from the defendant, in respect of such verdict, any cost whatever, whether it shall be given upon any issue or issues tried, or judgment shall have passed by default, unless the judge or presiding officer before whom such verdict shall be obtained shall immediately afterwards certify on the back of the record, or on the writ of trial or on the writ of inquiry, that the action was really brought to try a right besides the mere right to recover damages for the trespass or grievance for which the action shall have been brought, or that the trespass or grievance in respect of which the action was brought was wilful and malicious.

III. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That nothing herein contained shall extend to or be construed to extend to deprive any plaintiffs of costs in any action or actions brought for a trespass or trespasses over any lands, commons, wastes, closes, woods, plantations, or enclosures, or for entering into any dwellings, outbuildings, or premises in respect of which any notice not to trespass thereon or therein shall have been previously served, by or on behalf of the owner or occupier of the land trespassed over, upon or left at the last reputed or known place of abode of the defendant or defendants in such action or actions.

SMALL TENEMENTS ACT.

1 & 2 Vict. c. 74.—Passed 10th Aug. 1838.

An Act to facilitate the Recovery of Possession of Tenements after due Determination of the Tenancy.

This beneficial Statute to Landlords of Tenements at a rent under £20. a-year, saving them the expense and delay of proceedings by Ejectment to recover possession, where a tenant refuses to quit at the determination of his tenancy, is now getting into full work throughout the country. It becomes necessary, therefore, that our readers should have its contents.

Sec. I. enacts, That from and after the passing of this Act, when and so soon as the term or interest of the tenant of any house, land, or other corporeal hereditaments held by him at will or for any term not exceeding seven years, either without being liable to the payment of any rent or at a rent not exceeding the rate of £20. a-year, and upon which no fine shall have been reserved or made payable, shall have ended or shall have been duly determined by a legal notice to quit or otherwise, and such tenant or (if such tenant do not actually occupy the premises, and only occupy a part thereof,) any person by whom the same or any part thereof shall be then actually occupied shall neglect or refuse to quit and deliver up possession of the premises or of such part thereof respectively, it shall be lawful for the landlord of the said premises or his agent to cause the person so neglecting or refusing to quit and deliver up possession to be served (in the manner hereinafter mentioned) with a written notice, in the form set forth in the schedule to this Act, signed by the said landlord or his agent of his intention to proceed to recover possession under the authority and according to the mode prescribed in this Act; and if the tenant or occupier shall not thereupon appear at the time and place appointed, and show to the satisfaction of the justices hereinafter mentioned reasonable cause why possession should not be given under the provisions of this Act, and shall still neglect or refuse to deliver up possession of the premises or of such part thereof of which he is then in possession to the said landlord or his agent, it shall be lawful for such landlord or agent to go to such justices proof of the holding and of the end or other determination of the tenancy, at the time or manner thereof, and where the rent of the landlord has accrued since the letting of the premises, the right by which he claims the possession, and upon proof of service of the ice, and of the neglect or refusal of the tenant or occupier, as the case may be, it shall be lawful for the justices acting for the district, division, or place within which the said premises or any part thereof shall be situate, in petty sessions assembled, or any two of them, to issue a warrant under their hands and seals to the constables and peace officers of the district, division, or place within which the said premises or any part thereof shall be situate, commanding them, within a period to be therein named, not less than twenty-one nor more than thirty clear days from the date of such warrant, to enter (by force if needful) into the premises, and give possession of the same to such landlord or agent: Provided always, that entry upon such warrant shall not be made on a Sunday, Good Friday, or Christmas Day, or at any time except between the hours of nine in the morning and four in the afternoon: Provided also, that nothing herein contained shall be deemed to protect any person on whose application and to whom any such warrant shall be granted from any action which may be brought against him by any such tenant or occupier, for or in respect of such entry and taking possession, where such person had not at the time of granting the same lawful right to the possession of the premises: Provided also, that nothing herein contained shall affect any rights to which any person may be entitled as out-going tenant by the custom of the country or otherwise.

Sec. II. enacts, That such notice of application intended to be made under this Act may be served either personally or by leaving the same with some person being in and apparently residing at the place of abode of the person so held over as aforesaid, and that the person serving the same shall read over the same to the person served or with whom the same shall be left as aforesaid, and explain the purport and intent thereof: Provided that if the person so holding cannot be found, and the place of abode of such person shall either not be known or admission thereto cannot be obtained for serving such summons, the posting up of the said summons in some conspicuous part of the premises so held shall be deemed to be good service upon such person.

Sec. III. enacts, That in every case in which a person to whom any such warrant shall be granted had not at the time of granting the same lawful right to the possession of the premises, the issuing of any such warrant as aforesaid shall be deemed a trespass by him against the tenant or occupier of the premises, although no entry shall be made by virtue of the warrant; and in case such tenant or occupier will become bound by two sureties as hereinafter provided, to be approved of by the said justices, in such sum as the justices shall seem reasonable, regard being had to the value of the premises and to the probable costs of an action, to sue the person to whom such warrant was granted with effect and without delay, and to pay all the costs of the proceeding in such action in case a verdict shall pass for the defendant, or the plaintiff shall discontinue or not prosecute his action or become nonsuited therein, execution of the warrant shall be delayed until judgment shall have been given in such action of trespass; and if upon the trial of such action of trespass a verdict shall pass for the plaintiff, such verdict and judgment thereupon shall supersede the warrant so granted, and the plaintiff shall be entitled to double costs in the said action of trespass.

Sec. IV. enacts, That every such bond as hereinbefore mentioned shall be made to the said landlord or his agent, at the costs of such landlord or agent, and shall be approved of and signed by the said justices: and if the bond so taken be forfeited, or if upon the said trial of the action for securing the trial of which such bond was given the judge by whom it shall be tried shall not indorse upon the record in court that the condition of the bond hath been fulfilled, the party to whom the bond shall have been so made may bring an action, and recover thereon: Provided always, that the court where such action as last aforesaid shall be brought may, by a rule of court, give such relief to the parties upon such bond as may be agreeable to justice, and such rule shall have the nature and effect of a defeasance to such bond.

Sec. V. enacts, That it shall not be lawful to bring any action or prosecution against the said justices by whom such warrant as aforesaid shall have been issued, or against any constable or peace officer by whom such warrant may be executed, for issuing such warrant or executing the same respectively, by reason that the person on whose application the same shall be granted had not lawful right to the possession of the premises.

Sec. VI. enacts, That where the landlord at the time of applying for such warrant as aforesaid had lawful right to the possession of the premises, or of the part thereof so held over as aforesaid, neither the said landlord nor his agent, nor any other person acting in his behalf, shall be deemed to be a trespasser by reason merely of any irregularity or informality in the mode of proceeding for obtaining possession under the authority of this Act, but the party aggrieved may, if he think fit, bring an action on the case for such irregularity or informality, in which the damage alleged to be sustained thereby shall be specially laid, and may recover full satisfaction for such special damage, with costs of suit: Provided that if the special damage so laid be not proved, the defendant shall be entitled to a verdict, and that if proved, but assessed by the jury at any sum not exceeding 5s., the plaintiff shall recover no more costs than damages, unless the judge before whom the trial shall have been held shall certify upon the back of the record that in his opinion full costs ought to be allowed.

Sec. VII. enacts, That in construing this Act the word "premises" shall be taken to signify lands, houses, or other corporeal hereditaments; and that the word "person" shall be taken to comprehend a body politic, corporate or collegiate, as well as an individual; and that every word importing the singular number shall, where necessary to give full effect to the enactments herein contained, be deemed to extend and be applied to several persons or things as well as one person or thing; and that every word importing the masculine gender shall where necessary extend and be applied to a female as well as a male; and that the term "landlord" shall be understood as signifying the person entitled to the immediate reversion of the premises, or if the property be held in joint-tenancy, coparcenary, or tenancy in common, shall be understood as signifying any one of the persons entitled to such reversion; and that the word "agent" shall be taken to signify any person usually employed by the landlord in letting of the premises or in the collection of the rents thereof, or especially authorized to act in the particular matter by writing under the hand of such landlord.

Sec. VIII. The Act shall not extend to Scotland or Ireland.

Imperial Parliament.*HOUSE OF LORDS, July 10.*ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE BILL

The LORD CHANCELLOR moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee on this Bill. His Lordship said, that the Committee which had sat upon the Bill had suggested an alteration which he was anxious to state:—The Bill left the appointment of successors to the two Vice-Chancellors in the hands of the Crown, and the alteration proposed was, that the Crown should only have the power of appointing a successor to one, and that the other should, in the first instance, be only appointed for life, thus rendering it necessary, upon his death, to apply to Parliament to appoint a successor.

Lord LYNTHURST said, that the Committee had examined the whole of the subject with the greatest minuteness, and had been perfectly unanimous upon every point suggested.

The Bill then passed with the proposed alterations.

July 16.

Read a third time and passed.

July 14.

COPYHOLD ENFRANCHISEMENT BILL.

Lord BROUGHAM withdrew this Bill. His Lordship observed, that when he first brought in this Bill he had wished it to be referred to a Select Committee, and after some delay that had been done. The Committee had sat for some time, and a period of the session had now arrived which made him feel that he could hardly hope to get the Bill passed this session. If he were to proceed with the Bill, it could not be sent down to the other House of Parliament before the end of this month, and that was a sufficient reason for his withdrawing it. He would add, that this circumstance presented the only reason for withdrawing it, because, with the exception of the compulsory clauses, he was confident that he should have obtained the consent of the Select Committee. He would withdraw the Bill now, but he had no doubt whatever that this important Bill would receive the sanction of the Legislature early next session.

Lord LYNTHURST said, that in his opinion his noble friend was perfectly right in withdrawing the measure, upon a pledge that he would bring it forward early in the next session of Parliament. Their lordships had been so much occupied with the Chancery Committee from day to day, and in fact as often as his noble and learned friend on the woolsack could attend, that it was impossible to consider the details of his noble friend's bill.

Lord REDESDALE stated, that, under existing circumstances, he should withdraw the Bill which he had himself introduced on the same subject, and bring it forward early next session, in order that their lordships might have an opportunity of comparing the merits of the two measures.

Law Reports.*HOUSE OF LORDS, July 9.*APPEALS.

BOOTH AND OTHERS, DIRECTORS OF THE LONDON JOINT STOCK COMPANY v. THE GOVERNORS AND COMPANY OF THE BANK OF ENGLAND.

The exclusive PRIVILEGE claimed by the BANK OF ENGLAND over other BANKING COMPANIES for accepting Bills of Exchange having less than six months to run.—Whether it is lawful for a Joint Stock Banking Company (consisting of more than six persons) to contract with a foreign Bank, by which the latter may draw Bills of Exchange upon the Manager of the Joint Stock Bank in his individual capacity, and not as Manager, payable at the Joint Stock Bank, and having less than six months to run.—The due payment of such Bills being guaranteed by the Trustees of the Joint Stock Bank making its funds responsible.

This was an Appeal from an Order of the Master of the Rolls made in June, 1837, of the very first importance to Joint Stock Banking Companies and to the commercial world at large.

Sir W. Follett and Mr. Kindersley appeared for the Appellants, and Sir F. Pollock and Mr. Pemberton for the Respondents.

The facts as shewn by the Bill, are these—

The following Prospectus was issued for the purpose of establishing a Bank in London, to be called THE LONDON JOINT STOCK BANK. “The London Joint Stock Bank, Princes Street, Mansion House. Capital 3 Millions, in 6000 shares of £50. each. Directors Sir Felix Booth, Bart., Wm. Miller Christy, (and 16 others) George Pollard, Esq. Manager. The business of the Bank is conducted on the following principles. Accounts of parties properly introduced, are received agreeably to the present custom of London bankers, with this advantage, that interest is allowed on correct accounts, and on deposits, on the first day of every month, at the rate of £2. per cent. on the smallest balance, which may appear to the credit of each account at the close of any days during the preceding month. Sums of money received on deposit, at such rate of interest, and for such periods as may be agreed upon, reference being had to the state of the money market, and if required, bills or promissory notes at not less than six months' date, will be delivered to the depositors in lieu of receipts for sums not less than £100. interest at the rate of £2. 10s. per cent. allowed on sums not exceeding £2000., deposited without special agreement, which may be withdrawn at any time on giving ten days' notice. The agency of joint stock, and other country and foreign banks, undertaken on such terms as may be agreed upon. Investment in, and sales of all descriptions of, British and foreign securities, bullion, specie, &c. effected; dividends received, and every other description of banking business, and money agency transacted. A bill committee of the directors sit daily, from 12 to 2 o'clock, to receive applications for discounts, which are considered confidential, and promptly decided upon. The board of directors meet weekly when a full statement of the affairs of the bank is laid before them." That the bank was established in Oct 1836, the defendants were the directors and manager, and were all partners or shareholders except the manager.

That the plaintiffs had discovered that the object and design of the said company was not only to carry on the business of a Bank of deposit, but to borrow, owe, and take up money on their bills or notes, at a shorter date than six months, from the issuing thereof, in violation of the privileges of the plaintiffs.

That a bank at KINGSTON, UPPER CANADA, in NORTH AMERICA, called "THE COMMERCIAL BANK, MIDLAND DISTRICT," had previously to May, 1837, commenced drawing, and had in fact drawn divers bills of exchange, payable at less than six months from the time of the acceptance, upon the LONDON JOINT STOCK BANK, and that such bills of exchange had been accepted by that Bank, and that such bills had been drawn and negotiated with a view to maintain a circulation of paper-money for the benefit of the LONDON JOINT STOCK BANK.

That on the 26th of April, 1837, the Secretary of the LONDON JOINT STOCK BANK addressed the following letter to the plaintiffs:—

"Gentlemen,—Having received from a transatlantic bank the offer of their agency, which would involve the necessity of the bank accepting their drafts, payable at a shorter date than six months, the Directors of this Bank are desirous of knowing whether the Directors of the BANK OF ENGLAND would interpose any difficulty in the way of the Bank accepting such drafts.—I have the honour to be," &c.

To this the following reply was given—

"Bank of England, 27th April, 1837.

"Sir,—I am desired to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 26th inst. addressed to the Governor and Court of Directors of the Bank of England, in which you asked whether the Directors of the Bank of England would interpose any difficulty in the way of the London Joint Stock Bank accepting drafts payable at a shorter date than six months, and in reply I have to state, that such acceptances would be an infringement of the privileges of the Bank of England, and as respects the public would be illegal and void, and, consequently, could not be permitted by this corporation."

That notwithstanding such reply, at the end of Sept. 1837, the plaintiffs received, among various bills of exchange which formed part of remittances sent to them from Canada, a bill of exchange drawn by the President of the Commercial Bank, Midland District, upon the London Joint Stock Bank, as follows:—

"£1000. Sterling. Kingston, Upper Canada, 25th of July, 1837, Sixty days after sight, pay this my 1st of exchange, 2nd and 3rd unpaid, to the order of F. A. Harper, Cashier, the sum of £1000. sterling value received, which place to the account of the Commercial Bank, Midland District, with or without further advice. John S. Cartwright, President. To George Pollard, Esq. Manager, London Joint Stock Bank, London."

That the plaintiffs presented this bill for acceptance at the London Joint Stock Bank, which was accepted by George Pollard as manager of the said bank as follows.—"Accepted 2d October, 1837, at the London Joint Stock bank, George Pollard."

That the word "at" was fraudulently introduced for the purpose of defrauding the plaintiffs and the public; and that the bill was really accepted by the London Joint Stock Bank, and that such company held themselves and their assets liable to pay the same; that the plaintiffs caused the bill again to be taken to the office of the London Joint Stock Bank, and required an acceptance in words according to the tenor of the bill; but that one of the clerks stated that such acceptance was sufficient, and that the bank were ready to discount the bill.

That on the 26th of October, 1837, the plaintiffs caused their solicitors to write the following letter to the defendants:—"Gentlemen,—The attention of the Governor and Directors of the Bank of England has been drawn to bills of exchange which have recently appeared, drawn by a bank in Upper Canada, for which, it appears you act as London agents, upon your manager, and accepted at your office. The Bank are advised, that the acceptance of such bills, having less than six months to run is a violation of their exclusive privilege; and we are therefore requested to know whether it is intended to persist in the practice, as in that case we are instructed to take immediate proceedings to obtain an injunction from a court of equity. We are, &c. FRESHFIELD and SOY."

To which was given the following answer:—"London Joint Stock Bank, 2nd November."

1837. Gentlemen,—Your letter of the 26th ult., addressed to the directors of this bank, was read before the board yesterday, and in reply hereto, I am instructed to state, that the directors deny that any practice has been adopted by the London Joint Stock Bank, which is a violation of the exclusive privilege of the Bank of England, the London Joint Stock Bank never having accepted, nor directed, nor authorized their manager, or any other person, to accept any bills of exchange having less than six months to run. I am, &c., MICHAEL BOGLE."

The bill charged that the directors had authorised George Pollard to accept bills of exchange drawn upon the company in the manner and form in which the bill of exchange, dated the 25th of July, 1837, had been accepted by him; that such form of acceptance had been resorted to in consequence of the acts of parliament giving such privilege, to the plaintiffs, with intent and for the purpose of evading or eluding the provisions of the said acts or some of them, or of avoiding the operation thereof: that the defendant George Pollard had no connection with the Commercial Bank of Upper Canada, except as agent, manager, or servant of the London Joint Stock Bank; that the bills of exchange so accepted by George Pollard were entered in the bill books belonging to the company, and paid out of the money belonging to the bank. And prayed that an account might be taken of all bills accepted by the defendants on behalf of the Company having less than six months to run from the date of acceptance, and particularly on all bills drawn upon the Company accepted by the defendant, George Pollard, or any agent of the company, in the form in which the bill of the 25th of July, 1837, was accepted, and of the gains and profits of the company made by such acceptances; and that it might be declared that the accepting such bill of the 25th of July, was a fraud upon the plaintiffs, and that the defendants might be restrained from accepting on behalf of the London Joint Stock Bank company any bills payable at less than six months from acceptance; and from accepting any bills in the form in which the bill of the 25th of July, 1837, was accepted; and that the defendant, George Pollard, and every agent or servant of the company might in like manner be restrained, and that all the defendants might in like manner be restrained, from in any other manner borrowing, owing, or taking up in England and on behalf of the said company, any sum of money on the bills or notes of the said company, payable on demand, or at any less date than six months from the borrowing thereof.

All the defendants except Mr. Pollard filed a joint and several answer; and Mr. Pollard, the manager, who was not a partner or shareholder, filed a separate answer. It appeared from the answers that 30,000 shares had been subscribed for by the 22nd of October 1837, and that on the 31st of October 1837, a deed was executed by which it was provided that the concerns of the Company should be under the control of nineteen directors, who should have the entire management of the business of the Company, and the sole power of appointing and removing the manager and every other officer or servant of the Company; that such person or persons as the directors should by any resolution or minute authorise, should exclusively have power to sign, draw, indorse, and accept all bills of exchange and other negotiable securities, which alone should be binding upon the Company; and each of the directors and shareholders disclaimed all right so to do, unless he should be expressly authorised by the directors, who were to have the entire control and disposition of the capital and effects of the Company; and the manager and other officers of the Company were placed under the directors. The directors were authorised to execute any power of attorney to enable any other person or persons to act on behalf of the Company, in any transaction, business, or thing, which should be stated in such power.

On the 19th of November, 1836, the defendant, George Pollard, was authorised by the directors exclusively to indorse all bills of exchange and promissory notes, and to draw such cheques in the name and on account of the Company as might be necessary in the usual course of business. On the 14th of March 1837, the London Joint Stock Bank received a letter from Mr. Harper, the secretary of the Kingston Commercial Bank, in Upper Canada, proposing that the London Bank should become their agents, receiving drafts from the Canada Bank payable at sixty days, and giving the Canada Bank a credit for that time to the amount of from £40,000. to £60,000. On the 6th of May 1837, the directors of the London Joint Stock Bank resolved that a communication should be made to the Kingston Commercial Bank, stating their readiness to act as the agents of the Kingston Commercial Bank, upon condition that all drafts should be drawn upon and accepted by the manager of the London Bank, in his individual capacity. On the same day, Mr. Pollard wrote a letter to Mr. Harper, stating that by the construction put upon the charter of the Bank of England by the Court of Common Pleas and the Master of the Rolls,<sup>(a)</sup> no joint-stock bank could accept bills of exchange in London, or within sixty-five miles of London, at a less date than six months; and suggesting that the difficulty might be got over either by the Kingston Com- mercial Bank issuing their own promissory notes to the extent of £40,000, payable at sixty days at the London Joint Stock Bank; or by drawing, at sixty days' sight, bills upon Mr. George Pollard, the manager of the London Joint Stock Bank—the due payment of the bills accepted by the manager to be guaranteed by the London Joint Stock Bank. Mr. Harper replied on the 21st of June 1837, that the board of the Kingston Commercial Bank had taken into consideration the two modes proposed, so as not to come within the power of the acts in favour of the Bank of England, and preferred that of drawing on the manager at sixty days; and requesting that the guarantee of the London Joint Stock Bank might be sent to protect the drafts of the president of the Kingston Commercial Bank. The directors, on the 26th of July 1837, resolved to accept the agency on these terms; and on the 29th July 1837, the trustees wrote a letter, undertaking that, in consideration of the Kingston Commercial Bank keeping a banking account with the London Joint Stock Bank, the latter would provide the necessary funds to pay at maturity all such bills as might be drawn by the Kingston Bank upon, and accepted by, Mr. George Pollard, manager of the London Bank, such bills being accepted by him in his individual capacity. With this guarantee was sent a counter-understanding, to be executed by the Kingston Bank, that they would pay the balances due to the London Bank, which was returned, signed in due form, to the London Bank. The president of the Kingston Commercial Bank drew the bill of exchange dated the 5th of July 1837, in anticipation of the guarantee being sent out. This bill was protested by the Bank of England for non-acceptance, but was ultimately paid. On the 6th of Oct. 1837, Mr. Pollard suggested an alteration in the form of the bills of exchange, to the Canadian Bank, by leaving out the word "manager," and directing them "to George Pollard, Esq. at the London Joint Stock Bank."

The defendants (the directors) denied that the bill was accepted by Mr. Pollard, as manager of the company on their behalf, and for their benefit, but said that it was accepted on behalf of himself, and for the benefit of the Kingston Commercial Bank; they denied that the word "at" was fraudulently inserted; and also denied that they held themselves or the assets of the company responsible or liable to pay the bill; but they stated the arrangement made between the London Joint Stock Bank and the Kingston Commercial Bank; and that, in conformity therewith, they had out of monies belonging to the Kingston Commercial Bank in their possession, or out of their own monies, paid all the bills of exchange of the Kingston Commercial Bank, drawn upon and accepted by the defendant, George Pollard, which bills were sometimes adressed "to G. Pollard, Esq. manager, London Joint Stock Bank, London; and at other times; "to G. Pollard, Esq. manager of the London Joint Stock Bank, London;" and at first "accepted at the London Joint Stock Bank, Geo. Pollard;" and afterwards, "accepted payable at the London Joint Stock Bank, Geo. Pollard."

Defendant, George Pollard, admitted that he was manager of the London Joint Stock Bank; and that the only connection which he had with the Kingston Commercial Bank in his individual character was, in accepting their bills of exchange; and that the bills accepted by him were paid out of the assets of the company, but he said that he had authority to indorse bills and draw cheques, but no authority to accept bills of exchange on behalf of the company; that the bills of exchange accepted by him were entered in a private account kept by himself, and when paid, were entered in the books of the company.

The MASTER of the ROLLS granted an injunction, restraining the London Joint Stock Bank and every partner therein, and the defendant, George Pollard, and every clerk, servant, or agent of the same, from accepting, or causing to be accepted, in the name of the said partnership, or in the name of the said George Pollard, or any other name on behalf of the said bank, in the course of their banking transactions, any bill or bills of exchange payable on demand, or at any less time than six months from the acceptance thereof.(b)

This appeal now came on for argument on the part of the Bank of England. The case of the Bank of England v. Anderson (c) was relied upon.

On the part of the London Joint Stock Bank the following cases were cited: Thomas v. Bishop; (d) Emly v. Lye; (e) Jackson v. Hudson; (f) Leadbitter v. Farrow; (g) Denton v. Rodie; (h) South Carolina Bank v. Case; (i) Wilson v. Barthrop; (k) Darcey v. Gill; (l) Bramah v. Roberts. (m)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, if the case of the Bank of England v. Anderson was to be taken by their lordships to be the law, then the question to be considered would be, how the circumstances of that case created any distinction, so as to make a different rule of law applicable to the facts of this case as opposed to the case of the Bank of England v. Anderson. In proposing questions for the consideration of the judges, the object of their lordships would be so to put them as to draw from the learned judges an opinion how far the circumstances which varied the two cases would affect that decision in point of law. Now here were three circumstances relied on as distinguishing that case to which he had referred from the present. First, it was said that the bill which was here accepted was an inland bill of exchange, and that, in the present case, it was a foreign bill of exchange. Secondly, it was insisted, and it was the most important circumstance, no doubt, as regarded the mode in which the acceptance was made, not being made by the company, or in the name of the company, but by Mr. George Pollard, under the circumstances which appeared upon the facts of the case. Then it was said, thirdly, that in the case of the Bank of England v. Anderson, it was a fact stated, that at the time the company accepted the bill, they had funds in hand equal to the amount of the bill so accepted. In the present case the contract was that the company in London should accept bills—looking to the company in Canada remitting money in time to meet the acceptances as they became due. He did not, he confessed, see any distinction between the two cases, as respected the bills of exchange, being in one case an inland bill, and in the other a foreign bill of exchange, because the object of the Act was to protect the Bank of England. His lordship then submitted the four following questions for the decision of the judges:—

“First.—The London Joint-stock Bank under the circumstances which have made it illegal in them as a company, and a violation of the rights and privileges of the Bank of England, to have accepted and issued bills herein-aftermentioned, if drawn upon them under an arrangement with a bank in Canada to pay bills drawn by such bank upon George Pollard, the manager of the London Joint-stock Bank to be accepted by the said George Pollard, and to provide funds for the due payment by the said George Pollard, the money transactions arising therefrom being on the account between the two banks, and to be treated in all respects as transactions between the said two banks. Is the acceptance of such bills by the said George Pollard, in execution of that arrangement, lawful, regard being had to the Act in force respecting the Bank of England?”

“Secondly.—Would the acceptance of such bills be lawful, assuming that the London Joint-stock Bank, at the time of such acceptance, had funds in their hands on account of the Bank in Canada equal to the amount of bills so accepted?”

“Thirdly.—Would the acceptance of such bills be lawful, assuming that the London Joint-stock bank had not, at the time of such acceptances, any funds in hand belonging to the bank in Canada, but that such bills were accepted upon the credit of the contract by such bank to remit sufficient funds to the London Joint-stock Bank to meet such acceptances before the time at which they would become payable?”

Lord Chief Justice TINDAL, on behalf of the judges, asked for time to consider the questions.

ANNUITANTS FOR LIVES.—Power of the Lord Chancellor to order the holder of a Rent-charge upon real Estates for lives to produce the lives at the next parish church to the residence of the cestuis que vie.

Mr. Whatley applied under the statute 6 Ann, c. 18. with an affidavit made by the owner of certain lands, upon whose real estate a rent-charge had been granted for four lives, who resided at Camden-town and in Tottenham Court-road, and who deposed as to his belief that the cestuis que vie were dead, and that the holder of the rent-charge concealed that fact from him, which brought the present application within the statute. The cestuis que vie all resided within the parish of St. Pancras, which parish having several parish churches, a difficulty arose as to which church they should be produced in.

The LORD CHANCELLOR ordered all the cestuis que vie to be produced at the parish church of St. Pancras within a month.

BANKRUPTCY.—PRACTICE.—ORDER for annulling a FIAT in BANKRUPTCY—the effect of such an ORDER by the COURT of REVIEW.

Mr. W. R. Ellis moved in this case to alter the date of an order annulling a fiat. The order had been pronounced by the Court of Review on the 30th of May, but it could not be obtained from the office in order to procure the signature of his Lordship until the 1st of June. By the statute the power to annul a fiat was vested solely in the Lord Chancellor; but in practice the great seal was applied on the credit of the order by the Court of Review. He said it was important to the petitioner, because he had commenced an action against a debtor, who had left the country for New South Wales, and if new process were necessary, his remedy would be lost. Under these circumstances he prayed the Court to antedate the fiat, or strike out the date altogether.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said, the order of the Court of Review was of no force until the great seal was affixed, and therefore he could not alter the date. It did not reach his Lordship until the 1st of June, otherwise the petitioner should not have been injured by the inability to obtain his signature on the day it was brought. If it had been brought on the 30th of May, the date might have been of that day; but not being so, the Court could not remedy the particular inconvenience by a general rule which would affect others.

QUEEN'S BENCH, July 11.

THE SHERIFF AND THE JURY FINED.

LORD DENMAN said, there had been several persons who had not attended at all during the present sittings. They had been resummoned, and had been fined 5*l*. They were now fined 40*s*. more, and it was right the public should know that there was no limit to the fines which might be imposed on jurymen for non-attendance; if they still absented themselves, a very heavy fine would be imposed. His Lordship then asked for the summoning officers, but they were not to be found; he then called for the sheriff, but no person was present to represent him.

LORD DENMAN then said, that he should like the public to see the heavy bills of costs parties had to pay for bringing their cases here; indeed, it often happened that it was their utter ruin; and then, when things were fully prepared, the sheriff, who was bound to have a jury, was not in attendance; the sheriff should, therefore, be fined 20*l*.

PRACTICE.—AFFIDAVITS sworn before a Commissioner for taking Affidavits in IRELAND.
—Whether it will be read as evidence in ENGLAND.

In this case a judgment had been obtained in Dublin, and an affidavit was put in to support a rule upon such judgment in the Court of Queen's Bench in England, which appeared to be sworn before a Commissioner for taking affidavits in the Courts in Dublin.—An objection was made to this affidavit, on the ground that an Irish Commissioner had no authority to take affidavits in causes pending in the English Courts of Law.

WILLIAMS, J., held that such an affidavit could not be read in the English Courts.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER, May 8. Sittings in Banco.

BALL v. STANLEY.

JUDGE'S ORDER for payment of a debt by a given time or Judgment—Whether the Plaintiff can before that time has expired when the Defendant is about to leave the kingdom, apply to a Judge for a Capias.

—Suggestion of the Court in such cases.

In this case a writ of summons had been served upon the defendant, for a debt due to plaintiff, and an order had been made by consent of plaintiff and defendant, that on payment of costs by the defendant, and of the debt within six months from the date of the order, all proceedings should be stayed, but that in default of such payment the plaintiff was to have final judgment. The defendant did pay the costs according to the order, and the time had not arrived for payment of the debt, but the plaintiff having learnt that the defendant was about to leave the kingdom, he made an affidavit to that effect as required by the Act for abolishing Arrest for Debt, and obtained an order from PARKE, B., for a Capias, upon which the defendant was arrested, and put in bail in the usual manner.

Mr. E. V. Williams, for the defendant, now moved to set aside the Judge's order and the writ of Capias as contrary to the agreement between the parties, by which all proceedings in the cause were stayed, until the defendant should commit a breach by not paying the debt at the time specified; that time had not arrived, and the defendant had in all other respects performed his part of the order, by which the proceedings were stayed—therefore the Judge's order was irregular and the arresting him was unjustifiable.

PARKE, B., expressed himself to have had considerable doubt upon the meaning of the word "proceedings," when he granted the order for the Capias, and had consulted his Brother ROLPH before he did so, but he felt now that he ought not to have granted the order. He thought the word "proceedings" meant any proceeding tending to final judgment, and he considered that a Capias was only such a proceeding, and under that impression he had made the order. His Lordship said, where a creditor grants his debtor time for payment of a debt, the hands of the creditor are absolutely tied up for that time, he cannot during that time take any proceedings against the debtor. So in this case the order staying proceedings is an agreement on the part of the plaintiff, granting six months for the defendant to pay the debt, he can take no proceeding against him while that time is running. "I was therefore wrong in making the order for the Capias. When a plaintiff feels there is any danger of a defendant quitting the kingdom, in cases of this nature he should, by the order for stay of proceedings, reserve to himself a power of applying to a judge in such an event for a Capias."

The rest of the Court concurred.

Judge's order for the Capias and the Writ set aside. Plaintiff to pay the costs. The defendant undertaking not to bring any action.

— V. MARTIN.

PRACTICE—NEW WRITS—Whether the forms adopted by the Judges may be varied as circumstances shall require.*

In this case a capias satisfaciendum had been issued against the defendant, by which the sheriff had been commanded to arrest the defendant, to satisfy the plaintiff not only for a debt due to him, but also interest thereon, which writ did not follow the form prescribed by the judges.

Mr. Watson now moved for a rule to set aside the writ for irregularity.

PARKE, B. said the Court were of opinion that the plaintiff was at liberty to adopt the form complained of, which suited the altered circumstances of the law with reference to the right to recover the interest. By the general rules the judges had given forms of writs which were to be followed, subject to certain variations required by circumstances. When a party was allowed to sue interest as well as principal, the form of the writ might be altered, even if the judges had not themselves made any rule; but the fact was that the rule was so general as to allow the writs to be altered to the extent now complained of.

Rule refused.

INSOLVENT DEBTORS' COURT, July 9.

JOHN GIBLETT'S CASE.

OVERSEERS committed to NEWGATE for Defalcation. Whether upon a Petition for Relief under the Insolvent Act, by such a person, he can be admitted to BAIL.

This was the first case of the nature that has come before the Court since the passing of the statute.

The Insolvent had presented his petition to be discharged under the statute. He had been overseer of the parish of North-holt, near Harrow, Middlesex, and having been found a defaulter in the parish accounts was by the magistrates committed to Newgate, under the 50th Geo. III. c. 49. s. 1. He was now brought up from that prison by order of the Court, upon his petition to be discharged upon bail.

Mr. Woodroffe appeared for the parish, and contended that the insolvent could not be admitted to bail, that the warrant against him gave him no locus standi to make the present application. There was, he said, at this time an assignee in Newgate for appropriating a considerable sum to his uses, and if the Court entertained the case now before it, that party would have a right to make a similar application. The Court had, in cases of criminal conversation, &c. refused to liberate parties on bail, and if he had supposed the insolvent to be serious in his intention to appear, he would have been better prepared. He was committed by two justices on a warrant under the 50th Geo. III. c. 49. s. 1. there to remain without bail or mainprize.

Commissioner BOWEN, on reference to the copy of causes, said there was nothing about bail or mainprize in the document. It seemed a distress had been levied, but as no money was realized he was then committed to the common gaol of Middlesex.

Mr. Woodroffe said he was told the warrant stated the commitment was without bail or mainprize.

Commissioner BOWEN thought it could not be so. The warrant had clearly been copied.

Mr. Cooke, for the insolvent, said the question before the Court rested simply on the act of Parliament under which the insolvent now applied to the Court. The insolvent had a clear right, under the 35th section of the act for abolishing arrest for debt, to petition: he was in custody for the non-payment of a sum of money, and it mattered not in what prison he was confined. Being so entitled, he could exercise the privileges which the act gave him, and one of the most important was, the privilege of bail, which was now extended to persons confined for debt. The Court had said, in cases where it was obvious a demand would take place on the mere production of the record, that the parties should not be liberated on bail, but there was no analogy in the instances mentioned. This man was in custody for the non-payment of money, and it did not follow as a matter of course that he would be remanded. The legislature had said, a man should have the privilege of bail, and this was not a case in which so important a privilege should be denied.

Commissioner BOWEN said, the warrant on which the insolvent was in prison had been granted by magistrates, and it did not set forth various matters, as it was supposed, and which, if it had been done, it would, perhaps, have been bad in law. This was clearly a criminal commitment to Newgate, though the Court had authority under the act to discharge the insolvent. The Court had a discretionary power as to bail, and he did not think the present insolvent was a proper person to admit to bail; his application would, therefore, be rejected. It would be, added the learned Commissioner, making the warrant of the magistrates "quite ridiculous" if this man was to give bail.

BUSINESS of the COURT—OPERATION of the NEW INSOLVENT ACT—SITTINGS during the VACATION.

The Court did not sit to-day, but in a bail case heard on the previous day, the hearing was appointed for the 22nd September, when the Court will resume its sittings after the vacation.

The present sittings will continue to Saturday the 15th August, at which time the vacation will commence. It is, however, understood that the Court will sit during the recess one day in each week to hear bail cases, as it did last year, with the view of carrying out the intention of the legislature in framing that salutary provision. The Commissioners could order an adjournment of six weeks, as the clause regulating the sittings in the present act existed in the former, when bail was not allowed; but they do not mean to avail themselves of the power, as many would be detained in prison, and it would give parties an opportunity of gratifying their feelings against debtors, by delaying executions until the adjournment took place. There has been a good deal of business before the Court for some time. No visible diminution of business has occurred since the operation of the new act, and in cases where parties cannot procure bail the imprisonment is longer than formerly, from the fact that the orders for hearing extend over a more lengthened period than they did some time ago. Those persons who have just commenced their cases cannot now (if without bail) be discharged until the latter end of September. Nearly two-thirds of the applicants to the Court in London have, since the passing of the new act, been liberated on sureties.

COURT OF THE CORONER FOR MIDDLESEX, June 10.

CARTER v. EVANS AND ANOTHER, SHERIFFS.

This was an action for false imprisonment. The Defendants suffered judgment by default. A writ had been issued directed to the Coroner for Middlesex to assess the amount of damage.

Mr. Wordsworth stated that the plaintiff, Major Carter, had reason to complain of a gross violation of the rights of an Englishman—namely, the deprivation of his personal liberty, by an arrest which was not justifiable in law, and an imprisonment which was most unjust, and, if tolerated, would go far to endanger the liberty of the subject. The defendants had not ventured to justify their proceedings; and he should, therefore, merely call witnesses to prove the fact of the arrest, and the consequent injury sustained by the plaintiff, which would entitle him to a verdict. He should prove that Major Carter was walking on the evening of the 3d of March last, through the Quadrant, when he was seized very unceremoniously by a sheriff's officer, named Willis, at the instance of a man named Clarke, who pointed out the plaintiff as being one Samuel Chifney, against whom Clarke had brought an action. Major Carter in vain asserted that the officer was mistaken, and the latter left him in custody of an assistant, who took the plaintiff to a sponging-house in Chancery-lane. On their way: ~~thinking~~ Major Carter called upon a tradesman who knew him, and who assured the officer that he had taken the wrong party into custody, and stated that the plaintiff was Major Carter and not Samuel Chifney. The bailiff, however, refused to release him from custody, asserting that he was only doing his duty, as the plaintiff had been pointed out as Chifney. The plaintiff was, consequently, compelled against his will to go to the lock-up house, where, after being detained for an hour and a half, Clarke entered, and, holding a candle towards the plaintiff, said that he had made a mistake, and the major was then permitted to go at large. He called several witnesses, who fully proved the fact of the arrest and detention of the plaintiff.

Mr. Jones (for the defendant) contended that although the sheriffs were the nominal defendants, the jury had in fact to decide on the conduct of the officer. The sheriffs were bound by law to execute the writs directed to them, and their officer was bound to arrest the party whom the plaintiff pointed out to him as being the defendant, or he and the sheriffs would be liable to an action. In the present instance there could be no doubt the officer had acted bona fide, and Clarke, who was anxious to make reparation for his error, had offered, first 5*l*, and then 10*l* and the costs, to settle the affair. The plaintiff had, however, rejected the offer, and demanded 20*l* and costs, which Mr. Clarke refused to pay.

Witnesses were then called to prove this offer, and that the plaintiff had been treated with all the civility possible.

Mr. Wordsworth replied, and contended that the liberty of an individual ought not to be outraged with impunity. Sheriff's officers were performing a voluntary act for their own profit, and therefore were not entitled to sympathy if they committed any error. They ought to be very cautious that they arrested the right party, and if they did not they must bear the responsibility. The learned counsel urged that no offer made by Mr. Clarke, had anything to do with the case, the sheriffs being the parties against whom the plaintiff had a right to proceed. He considered this a case of palpable indiscretion and gross blunder, and one calling for exemplary damages.

Mr. WAKLEY (Coroner) recapitulated the evidence; and observed, that in his opinion, the great mistake was the officer not attending to what was told him by the plaintiff and the witness, viz., that he was mistaken in the person. Clarke no doubt led the officer into error; but the jury would not have to decide on that fact, but give such calm and moderate damages as would be some recompense to the plaintiff for the anxiety he must have felt, and the inconvenience he experienced, in consequence of his detention.

Verdict for the plaintiff—damages 20*l*.

ROBINSON v. EVANS AND ANOTHER, SHERIFFS.

This was an action brought for a trespass committed by the defendants' officers, by illegally taking possession of the goods and chattels of the plaintiffs.

Mr. James said the plaintiff was a young man just set up in the wine and spirit trade, in King William-street, Strand, and the action arose from his goods having been illegally taken, under an execution, by the same officer as in the last case, which proved him to be an inexperienced and rash man, notwithstanding he was a sheriff's officer. The execution had been taken at the suit of Messrs. Nicholson, the distillers, against a person named Myers, who formerly kept the house, now held by the plaintiff, to whom the stock and business had been transferred, 15 months ago. The case was very different from the last, for in an execution against the goods, the sheriffs stood in a much better position than with any one against the body, inasmuch as if the sheriffs in the latter case refused to arrest an individual that was pointed out to them, they were liable to an action; but when it was against the goods, and two parties claimed them, then the law protected the sheriffs, and they could retire, or compel the plaintiff in the suit to give them an indemnity. In the present instance the defendants could have compelled Messrs. Nicholson to have proved the goods belonged to Myers, but they had failed to do so, and the officer had obstinately gone on, although he was shown the deeds, and also invoices made out by Messrs. Nicholson in the plaintiff's name, for goods supplied to the house. Willis had left a man in possession for 24 hours, when he was withdrawn. For the first three or four hours the man remained in the plaintiff's counting-house in the sight of all his customers, and hereby did a grievous and unquestionable injury to the plaintiff's reputation.

J. Cole, the plaintiff's cellarman, proved the act of a man being left in possession, and said that the latter told witness that Willis had seen the deeds, and no doubt he (the bailiff's man) could be called away in half an hour.

Cross-examined—Myers' name was in one place on the front of the shop, and also on a blind in the window.

Mr. Bell, a shoemaker, said he lived next door to the plaintiff, and it was well known in the neighbourhood that he had bought the trade, &c. of Myers. Witness heard the man in possession say that the plaintiff had offered to show Willis the rate-books, and had referred him to the Directory; but Willis said he had nothing to do with the Directory. Witness is a member of the paving-board, and knows it for a fact that the plaintiff was the rated possessor of the house.

Mr. Jones, for the defendants, said no doubt Willis was acting conscientiously, and that, from the fact of Myers's name being conspicuously over the door, he considered him the proprietor, and that he was bound to execute the warrant. The officer was, in such a case, in a most awkward situation, for if he retired on being told an assignment had been made, or had seen the deeds, if it subsequently turned out to be a collusive and fraudulent agreement, the sheriffs would be subject to an action for not executing the writ, while, on the other hand, if they made the seizure, they ran a risk of action, as in the present instance. He thought it was one of those cases that did not deserve more than trifling damages.

The CORONER left it to the jury to say whether due caution had been used by the officer; they would bear in mind that the name of Myers was to a certain extent put forward as the landlord, but at the same time if the officer refused to listen to explanations, or avail himself of information offered, he must bear the brunt of it. He, the learned coroner, said that it should also be taken into consideration, that although no special damage was proved, yet there could be no doubt that the fact of a bailiff being in possession, and the fact becoming known in the neighbourhood, must do a certain injury.

No case of the above description has been tried before either of the Coroners for Middlesex for more than six years.

ESSAY.

ON THE ENGLISH LAW OF BAILMENTS.

CARRIERS BY WATER.

CARRIERS by WATER usually make special contracts by charter parties and bills of lading. Of this class are the owners and masters of ships and vessels, lightermen, barge-owners, hoymen, ferrymen, canal boatmen, and others who by water engage to convey or transport goods from place to place for hire. Carriers by water generally stipulate against all liability for losses occasioned by "the act of God, the king's enemies, pirates, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of what nature or kind soever." The common law gives them the benefit of the two first stipulations, and the statute 26 Geo. 3. c. 86. s. 2. relieves them not only from loss by fire, but also from making good loss or damage to any gold, silver, diamonds, watches, jewels, or precious stones, sustained by any robbery, embezzlement, making away, or secreting thereof, unless the owner or shipper has at the time of shipping declared the nature and value thereof in writing. The statute 53 Geo. 3. c. 159. relieves them from liability in all cases of loss occasioned without their default or privity; but this act does not extend to vessels used solely in rivers or inland navigations, nor to any ship not duly registered according to law; nor do any of the acts extend to lighters and gabbets.<sup>(a)</sup> The relief afforded by the acts extends to owners only, not to masters; the latter statute contains an express clause against relieving the master, though he may happen also to be a part owner. Mr. Justice BAYLEY, in Wilson v. Dickson<sup>(b)</sup>, gave a very elaborate judgment upon the construction to be placed on this statute. That was a special action on the case brought by the plaintiff against the defendants as joint owners of the ship Hope, on account of the loss of certain goods therein laden belonging to the plaintiff: the nature of the loss was, the improper sale (by the captain and part owner) of those goods in the course of the voyage. The cause was referred, and the arbitrator by his award submitted for the consideration of the court three questions which arose upon the last-mentioned statute. 1st. Whether, inasmuch as there was fault of negligence on the part of one of the three owners, that takes away the protection given by the statute to the other part owners? and supposing his fault does not take away from the others (who are sued jointly with him) the protection of this statute, the second question is, whether the value of the ship in this Act of Parliament is the value at the time of the loss, or at the time when the ship commenced her voyage? 3rdly. Whether under the words "freight due or to grow due," that part of the freight which was paid by anticipation is to be taken into the account? Mr. Justice BAYLEY said, upon the first point the arbitrator was of opinion that upon the true construction of this act, the defendants being sued jointly, and no fault being imputable to more than one of them, in the form in which this action was brought the defendants were entitled to the benefit of the act, and were not responsible beyond the value of the ship and freight. And in this respect it seems to me the arbitrator came to the proper conclusion. The object of the Act of Parliament is to limit the responsibility of ship-owners, and the words of the 1st section are, "that no person or persons who is, are, or shall be owner or owners, or part owner or owners, of any ship or vessel, shall be subject or liable to answer for or make good any loss or damage arising or taking place by reason of any act, neglect, matter or thing done, omitted or occasioned, without the fault or privity of such owner or owners, which may happen to any goods, wares, merchandise, or other things, laden or put on board the same ship or vessel, or which may happen to any other ship or vessel, or to any goods, wares, merchandise, or other things being in or on board of any other ship or vessel, further than the value of his or their ship or vessel, and the freight due or to grow due for and during the voyage which may be in prosecution, or contracted for at the time of the happening of such loss or damage." The act therefore contemplated two descriptions of losses—the one a loss or damage to the cargo laden on board the ship, the other a loss or damage to an unconnected ship or her cargo. This is not the first Act of Parliament which limited the responsibility of shipowners for the 7 Geo. 2. c. 15. was an act passed for the same purpose, but the words "owner or owners," were certainly not used in that statute, and I rather think they were for the first time introduced into this act. Without, however, considering whether those words were previously introduced in any intermediate statute or not, it is clear that the use of them in this act shows anxiety on the part of the Legislature to explain the words "owner or owners," used in the 7 Geo. 2. c. 15, and to give a protection to part owners, which might not have been given under the general words owner or owners. Indeed, it seems as if those words were introduced as a legislative explanation of the words "owner or owners," as used the former statute. It is admitted that the words in the first section are sufficiently large to give the protection of the statute to these defendants, but it is said that the object of the statute was to protect the owners against the acts of their servants, and not against their own acts; that this is a loss occasioned by the act of one of several part-owners, and that therefore the whole are liable. But part owners, though jointly liable to the persons with whom they contract on account of the ship, yet in many respects stand in a very different situation from that of partners; and for this, amongst other reasons, that in the case of a partnership, every man knows who his partner is, but when one part-owner sells his share, the remaining part-owners not being privy to the instrument by which the new part-owners are created, may be entirely ignorant of the fact who the person is who has become a part-owner with them. And it is to be observed, also, that the words of the statute are, "that they shall not be liable for any act, &c. without the fault or privity of such owner or owners," without saying "or any of them." So that it seems that the true construction of the clause is this, that if you sue a sole owner, and the fault or privity were in him, he will be excluded from the protection of the statute; but if you sue several owners, then the words applicable to that case are, "without the fault or privity of such owners;" the fair and true construction of which is, that there must be the fault or privity of each. The fourth section of the act seems to shew that that is the right construction; for that section provides that "nothing shall lessen or take away any responsibility to which any master or mariner of any ship may now by law be liable, notwithstanding such master or mariner may be an owner or part owner, &c." It seems to me, that the meaning of that clause is, that if the master be a part-owner, his responsibility, if you sue him in his character of master, and not as one of several part-owners, will not be affected by the first section of the act; but that, if you sue him as one of the part-owners, with the other part-owners, the circumstance of the loss being occasioned by his fault, and with his privity, will not take away from the other part-owners the protection which the first section of the statute intended to give to them.

The second question is, at what period of time you are to estimate the value of the ship: the words of the act as to that point are, "further than the value of his or their ship or vessel, or the freight due or to grow due during the voyage which may be in prosecution, or contracted for at the time of such loss or damage." It has been argued, that the words "at the time of such loss or damage," not only refer to the freight due or to grow due, but also to the words, "their ship or vessel." It seems to me, however, that they do not apply to either, but are connected with the words "the voyage;" for these words are substituted for others, which are found in the 7th Geo. II. c. 15. s. 1. which are, "the full amount of the freight due, or to grow due, for and during the voyage, wherein such embezzlement shall be made, permitted, or done." Then substituting for these latter words, in the 7th G. II. the words, "at the time of the said loss." In the Act in question, it clearly appears that these latter words apply to "the voyage," and not to any other part of the sentence. The question, therefore, must be considered as if those words were not in the Act. In speaking of value generally, we must be understood to speak of existing value, and in this instance the Legislature is speaking of a thing existing at a particular period of time, for they use the terms freight due, that is due at the time of loss, for the words "to grow due," apply to the freight that may become due upon that voyage, after the loss. With respect therefore to freight, the Legislature contemplated two periods of time.

viz. freight due at the time of the loss, and freight due at the conclusion of the voyage; and if they had intended that the value of the ship was to be taken at two periods also, or at a period different from that of the loss, they would have used words to express their intention in that respect. It has been argued, that the owners of the cargo trusted the owners of the ship to the amount of the value of the ship before she sailed, and that therefore they ought to continue liable to that extent; but it must be recollected, that their responsibility is limited also in like manner in the case of damage done to any other ship by collision, &c.; and it being obvious that this argument could only apply to the one class of cases, and not to the other, both being included in the same clause, it follows that the argument is not entitled to any weight. Upon the whole, therefore, it seems to me that the words "the value of his or their ship or vessel," must, unless there are some other words to control them, mean the existing value at the time when the loss takes place. The mode of ascertaining that value is a matter of evidence, and may possibly be attended with some degree of difficulty. If the ship ultimately arrive, by ascertaining her then value, you may easily find the value at the time of the loss; in other cases, when the exact time of the happening of the injury is uncertain, the plaintiff may launch a prima facie case by shewing the value at the time of sailing, leaving it to the opposite party to shew what deterioration had taken place. That, however, is mere matter of evidence, and no positive rule can be laid down upon the subject; and possibly (I only say possibly) the Legislature, from motives of policy, might think that persons who had embarked their property in shipping, should, on giving up all they had ventured in a particular voyage, be relieved from any further responsibility.

The third and last question is, what is the true construction to be put upon the words

"freight due or to grow 'due?'" And it seems to me that those words mean all the freight for that voyage, whether paid in advance or not. If the whole freight had been paid in advance, according to the argument, the defendants would be liable to the value only of the ship, and not of the freight. It is clear, on the other hand, that it would come within the very words of the Act, if the whole freight were due at the time of the loss; and it seems to me, that it ought not to make any difference with respect to the owner's responsibility, whether the freight be in his own pocket, or in that of the person who would have to pay it. I therefore think that the words "freight due or to grow due," were meant to comprehend all the freight for the voyage, and that it makes no difference whether that freight was paid in advance or not."

BANKRUPTCY.

JOINT AND SEPARATE FIATS.

In what case may a joint fiat be sued out against all or some of the members of a firm, or a separate fiat against one or each of them, and what debts may be admitted to prove under each of such fiats?

SIR,—I shall divide this answer into two parts, the first of which I shall confine to joint fiats, and the second to separate fiats.

First, of joint fiats.—Joint fiats may be sued out against all or some of the members of a firm where all the partners, or such portion of them have committed acts of bankruptcy, which fiat can be sued out by any creditor of such partners committing such bankruptcy.

As to the proof of debts under joint fiats, an order of Lord Loughborough made in 1794, it is ordered, that the commissioners in a joint commission against two or more bankrupts shall be at liberty at any meeting or meetings for the proof of debts under such commission, to admit the proof of any separate debt or debts of any one or more of such bankrupts under such joint commission, and such separate creditors shall be at liberty to assent to, or dissent from, the allowance of the certificate of the bankrupt or bankrupts of whom they shall be separate creditors.

Under this order it has been decided that the creditors of a firm of three partners may prove their debts under a commission against another firm consisting of these three partners and others. (Ex parte Worthington, 3 Mad. 26; Vylie, 2 Rose 393).

Joint debts are debts for which an action, if brought, must be brought against all the partners constituting a firm. Where parties are indebted jointly, and enter into a covenant on demand jointly and severally to pay, no demand is necessary to entitle the creditor to proceed severally against the parties, but if it be expressly stipulated by three partners, that until a demand is made, an existing debt should remain a joint debt, and no demand is made previous to the bankruptcy, the debt is proveable against the joint estate only. (Ex parte Fairlie, Mont. 17). Where one of three partners, who also carried on a separate trade, being indebted to J. S. in £100., sent him a bill for £300. indorsed by the firm, and not by that partner individually, and received from him the balance in cash, upon the bankruptcy of the firm, this was holden to be a joint debt. (Ex parte Kirby, Buck, 511). But if an executor, assignee of a bankrupt, or trustee, be a partner in a firm, and apply the trust-money to the purposes of the partnership, with the knowledge of his partners, the cestui que trust may treat it as a joint or separate debt, at his option. Where one of the partners of a banking-house, by means of a power of attorney, urged by him, sold bank stock belonging to a customer, paid the proceeds into another banking-house to the account of the firm, and subsequently appropriated the proceeds to his own use, and the partner who so acted was executed by other forgeries, it was holden that the value of the bank stock was proveable under a commission afterwards issued against the other partners. (Ex parte Bolland, 1 Mon. & A. 570). Where one of two partners, after his co-partner has committed an act of bankruptcy, accept bills in the name of the firm for a previous partnership liability, the bills in the hands of a bona fide holder are proveable under a fiat against both. (Ex parte Robinson, 1 Mon. & A. 18; 3 Dea. & J. 376;) on appeal from ex parte Ellis, Mon. & A. 249. If a joint security is given for the separate debt of one partner, it is upon the creditor to prove the authority of the partners to the giving the security of the firm. (Ex parte Thorpe, 1 Ves. 394). Where two partners agreed to borrow money for the purposes of the partnership, but one only gave a bond for the payment of it, the other being a witness, and the money was entered in the cash book of the partnership, it was holden that the lender might treat this as a joint debt. (Ex parte Brown, 1 Atk. 255). If a man deal with a trader without knowing that he has a dormant partner, he may afterwards treat the debt as a joint debt. (Ex parte Hodgkinson, 19 Ves. 291). Where one partner dies, and the remaining partners continue the partnership and become bankrupt, those who were the creditors before the death may prove equally with those who became creditors after. Where different firms are engaged in a joint adventure, the creditors of the adventure may prove against the joint estates of the partnerships. Although joint creditors are prevented from claiming a dividend under a separate fiat, yet it was deemed only right that they should have a control or influence over the certificate and the choice of assignees, and they were therefore allowed to prove for those particular purposes—(vide 6 Geo. 4. c. 16. s. 62.) which applies only to a partnership subsisting at the time of bankruptcy. The petitioning creditor is however made a statuteable exception to this rule, and although a joint creditor, he may prove and receive dividends under any separate fiat sued out by him. (Ex parte Ackerman, 14 Ves. 604). But if a joint creditor sue out a joint fiat, he binds himself by so doing to resort to the joint property only, and when a fiat is sued out against a trader as a "surviving partner," this is considered a joint fiat, and the petitioning creditor will not be allowed to claim on separate property. (Ex parte Barned, 1 Gly. & J. 309). Where two partners became indebted on bond, and one of the partners conveyed real estates, his separate property, for securing the debt, it was held that the creditor could prove against the joint estate without giving up the real security, the joint estate being primarily liable, and the separate estate being only a security for the joint estate. (Ex parte Peacock, 3 Gly. & J. 27). Where partners purchased an estate out of partnership funds, but took the conveyance as tenants in common, and afterwards jointly mortgaged it for a joint debt, it was held to be a joint security, and that the debt could not be proved under a commission against the firm without giving up the security. (Ex parte Freen, 2 Gly. & J. 250). If a creditor has a joint and several bond, and as a collateral security a joint warrant of attorney upon which judgment is signed, the liability on the bond is merged, and the creditor is not entitled to prove upon the separate estate. (Ex parte Christie, Mon. & B. 352).

If a creditor have two distinct debts due to him, one from a partner individually, the other from the firm, he may prove them accordingly on the separate and joint estates respectively. Where one of three partners in a bank advanced money to the business upon the security of the other partners, and afterwards retired from the business, and by the deed of dissolution the remaining partners covenanted to repay the same by four instalments, and to indemnify against the partnership debts, the continuing partners, after paying one instalment, became bankrupt when two other instalments were due, and the retiring partner paid some partnership debts, it was held that the remaining instalments and debts were proveable under the commission. (Parker v. Ramsbottom, 5 D. and R. 138). Where some of the partners of a firm carry on a distinct trade, and in the course of dealing in the distinct trade one of the firms becomes indebted to the other, such debt can be proved under a fiat against the debtor firm. (Ex parte Castell, 9 Gly. & J. 124). And if one partner of a firm is also a partner of a distinct firm, the two firms may prove against each other.

Secondly—Of separate fiats.—A separate fiat is a fiat sued out against one or each of the members of a firm who has committed an act of bankruptcy, independent of the other partners, as where one of three partners in a bank, who resided thereat, (the others residing at a distance from it) shut up, and absented himself from the bank, which stopped payment, this was held to be an act of bankruptcy in the resident partner only. (Mills v. Bennett, 2 Mau. & S. 556). For what shall be deemed acts of bankruptcy whereon a fiat may issue, see ante, pp. 3 & 37.

A joint creditor may sue out a separate fiat against any one of the partners of the firm indebted to him, who has committed an act of bankruptcy, and even one of the partners of a firm may sue out a fiat against his co-partner, if his debt have not arisen out of the partnership, otherwise not unless upon an account settled. (Crispe v. Perritt, Willes 467; Wyndham v. Paterson, 1 Stark. 144; see Antram v. Chase, 15 East, 209; ex parte Noakes, 1 Mon. B. L. 423). As two fiats against the same person cannot be in operation at the same time, the Court of Review will, upon application, impound one of them, leaving that in operation which is most beneficial and advantageous to the creditors; and where a separate fiat issues against one partner, and a joint fiat is subsequently sued out against him and others of the firm, as the latter is generally advantageous to creditors, the separate fiat is usually impounded or annulled at the costs of the joint estate, unless there may be special reasons to the contrary. Ex parte Smith, 1 Gly. & J. 256; see ex parte Rowlandson, 1 Rose, 89.

As to the proof of debts under a separate fiat, the rule of law, as now generally laid down, I find to be that "separate debts are those for which the creditor can have his remedy at law, not against the whole firm, but against that partner only who contracted them." Where a dormant partner drew bills, which were accepted by the ostensible partner for partnership purposes, the holder of the bill, being ignorant of the partnership, was held entitled to prove against the separate estate of such partner, and not against the joint and separate estate of the acceptor. (Ex parte Husband, 2 Gly. & J. 4.) If an executor, assignee of a bankrupt, or trustee, be a partner in a firm, and apply the trust-money to the purposes of the partnership, without the knowledge of his partner, it can be treated as a separate debt only. (Ex parte Apsey, 3 Bro. C. C. 265). A bill accepted in the name of a firm by one of the partners, for his separate debt, and without the authority of the co-partner, does not bind the firm, and therefore it is a separate debt only. (Ex parte Goulding, 2 Gly. & J. 118). And where a joint security is given for the separate debt of one partner, it is upon the creditor to prove the authority of the partners to the giving the security of the firm. (Ex parte Thorpe, supra). There must always be some degree of assent on the part of the creditors to change a separate into a joint debt, although slight circumstances will in general be deemed sufficiently indicative of it.

As to separate fiats, it has always been deemed most equitable that the separate estate of each partner should pay his separate debts, and the joint estate of all the partners pay the joint debts; and as the assignees under a separate estate have, in fact, but the separate estate, and the bankrupt's proportion of the surplus of the joint estate, after payment of the joint creditors, to distribute among the creditors who prove under the fiat, it has hitherto been deemed right to prevent joint creditors from receiving any dividend under a separate fiat, if there were any joint property, no matter how trifling (ex parte Peate, 2 Rose, 54), or if there were another partner, no matter whether solvent or insolvent (ex parte Kensington, 14 Ves. 447), unless it were a dividend out of the surplus of the separate estate, after payment of all the separate creditors (ex parte Copeland, 1 Cox, 420), or unless the joint creditors agree to pay the separate creditors 20s. in the pound (ex parte Chandler, 9 Ves. 35); but if separate fiats were sued out against all the surviving partners of a firm, and there were no joint property whatever, in that case, the Court, upon petition, would allow the joint creditors creditors to prove and receive dividends under the separate fiat of each partner, but not if there is a solvent partner (ex parte Hayden, Cook, 261).

As to the exception by which a petitioning creditor is, although a joint creditor, allowed to prove and receive dividends under a separate fiat, vide supra.

A security for a separate demand does not extend to secure a joint demand; but if a creditor have two distinct debts due to him, one from a partner individually, and the other from the firm, he must prove them accordingly on the respective estates.

If one of two partners become bankrupt, and the solvent partner pay all the joint debts, he will be entitled to prove upon the separate estate of his partner for so much of the money as he was obliged to, and actually did pay out of his private funds, in order to make up the deficiency between the joint assets and the debts, as the bankrupt's partner would have been obliged had he remained solvent (ex parte Watson, Buck, 149). Where a bankrupt borrowed money of his partner by way of personal loan, and upon the dissolution of the partnership the loan formed an item in an account rendered as between the outgoing partner and the late firm, this loan was nevertheless held to be a separate debt (ex parte Richardson, 3 Dea. & C. 244). But the assignees of a joint estate are sometimes allowed to prove on the separate estate, and the assignees of the separate estates on the joint estate. And where traders in partnership also carry on business individually, if the separate trades be distinct from the joint, proof will in general be allowed as between the different estates, but not where the separate trades are merely branches of the partnership concern (ex parte Barbe, 11 Ves. 413). If one of several partners draw monies out of the partnership, and apply them to his separate use, and conceal the fact, or disguise it in the partnership books, the joint estate will be entitled to prove upon the separate estate (ex parte Smith, 1 Gly. & J. 74).

As to mutual debts, I shall, in concluding my answer to this problem, which has far exceeded the limits originally intended, observe that they must be owing by and to the same bankrupt, or set of bankrupts. You cannot set off a joint debt against a separate debt, or vice versa, or a debt due from three partners against a debt due to two of them, and so on.

A DISCUSSION OF THE PRESCRIPTION ACT.

Section 5, regulates the mode of pleading to be adopted by parties who intend to rely on the statute—the first clause of that section is thus worded:—

“That in all actions on the case and other pleadings, wherein the party claiming may now, by law, allege his right generally, without averring the existence of such right from time immemorial, such general allegation shall still be deemed sufficient; and if the same shall be denied, all and every the matters in this act mentioned and provided, which shall be applicable to the case, shall be admissible in evidence to sustain or rebut such allegation.”

This clause must be considered as applying only to declarations.

It is undoubtedly true, that, as against a wrong doer, a party, whether plaintiff or defendant, may simply aver possession, and need not set out his title; see Taylor v. Eastwood, 12 East. 212. But this rule refers only to a case in which the title to a corporeal hereditament is at issue. For instance, in trespass, for chasing cattle, the defendant may plead his possession of a close on which the cattle were damaged; because, in this case, the question will be, whether the close is the defendant's or not, and no other right will be at issue; and there is no doubt that the first averment of title to a corporeal hereditament, which is alleged in the record, need only be of a title of possession. But there is no case in which this rule has been extended so far as to enable a defendant to plead, that by reason of his possession of a corporeal hereditament he is entitled to an incorporeal hereditament. The practice has been invariably to set out the prescriptive title specially in the plea; and since the statute, the defendant must either plead in the mode previously in use, or in that given by the statute.

It appears from the case of Welcome v. Upton, 5 Mee. & Wels. 398, that if a defendant intends to rely on the period given by this statute in proof of the right he claims, he must plead accordingly; that is, that a plea of enjoyment from time immemorial will not be supported by proof of an enjoyment for the particular period specified in the act.

The remainder of the fifth section is as follows:—

“And that, in all pleadings to actions of trespass, and all other pleadings wherein before the passing of this act, it would have been necessary to have alleged the right as existing from time immemorial, it shall be sufficient to allege the enjoyment thereof as of right by the occupiers of the tenement, in respect whereof the same is claimed for, and during such of the periods mentioned in this act, as may be applicable to the case, and without claiming in the name or right of the owner of the fee, as is now usually done."

"And if the other party shall intend to rely on any proviso, exception, incapacity, disability, contract, agreement, or other matter hereinbefore-mentioned, or on any cause or matter of fact, or of law, not inconsistent with the simple fact of enjoyment, the same shall be specially alleged and set forth, in answer to the allegation of the party claiming, and shall not be received in evidence on any general traverse or denial of such allegation."

On this part of the 5th section, most of the cases which have arisen upon the statute have turned—

The words, "the enjoyment thereof as of right" have the same meaning as the words in the first and second sections, "enjoyment by a person claiming right thereto."

The doubt has been as to the manner of replying to a plea, stating the enjoyment as of right, viz. when the general traverse is sufficient, and when a special replication under the last clause of section 5 is requisite.

That clause is, "if the other party shall intend to rely on any proviso, &c. contract, agreement, &c. not inconsistent with the simple fact of enjoyment."

The words, "the simple fact of enjoyment," mean "an enjoyment as of right." See the judgment of the court in Beazley v. Clarke. 2 Bing. H. C. P. 709. Again, in Onley v. Gardiner, 4 Mee. & Wels. 501, the court says, "The simple fact of enjoyment" referred to in the 5th section is "an enjoyment as of right."

The first question then is, "What is an enjoyment as of right." The next, "What is such a proviso, &c. contract, &c. as is not inconsistent with the simple fact of an enjoyment as of right."

We must look to the cases where these questions have been decided. The first case is Monmouthshire Canal Company v. Harford, 1 Cro. M. & R. 614. There was a plea of enjoyment of a way as of right for 20 years, and the general traverse of the right replied. Under this traverse the judge (ALDERSON, B.) allowed the plaintiffs to give evidence, that the enjoyment had been with their licence and permission. A new trial was moved for, on the ground that this fact should have been specially pleaded, but the rule was refused.

PARKE, B. said—"The issue is, whether the occupiers of the closes of right and without interruption have had the use and enjoyment for 20 years, as they insist under the issue, therefore they must shew an uninterrupted rightful enjoyment for 20 years. If they had enjoyed it for one week and not for the next, and so on alternately, their plea would not have been proved. In the case of Bright v. Walker, 1 Cro. Mee. & R. 222, lately decided in this Court, it was held that the claimant must shew that he has enjoyed the way for the period of 20 years, and that he has done so as of right and without interruption; and that such claim might be answered by proof of a license written, or parol, for a limited period, comprising the whole or part of the 20 years.

"In the present case, the permission asked for and given shews that the occupiers of the closes did not enjoy the way as of right; and also, that they did not enjoy it uninterruptedly."

The definition of an enjoyment as of right, given in the case of Bright v. Walker, was as follows:—

"Therefore, if the way shall appear to have been enjoyed by the claimant not openly, and in the manner that a person rightfully entitled would have enjoyed it, but by stealth, as a trespasser would have done, or if he shall have occasionally asked the permission of the occupier of the land, no title would be acquired, because it was not an enjoyment as of right."

But the plainest definition is given by LORD DENMAN, C. J. who, in delivering the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in Tittle v. Brown, 4 Adol. & Ell. 369, said—

"It seems, therefore, that the enjoyment as of right must mean, an enjoyment had secretly, or by stealth, or by tacit sufferance, or by permission asked from time to time on each occasion, or even on many occasions of using it; but an enjoyment had openly, and notoriously, without particular leave at the time, by a person claiming to use it, without danger of being treated as a trespasser; as a matter of right, whether strictly legal, by prescription and adverse user, or by deed conferring the right, or though not strictly legal, yet lawful, to the extent of exercising a trespass, as by a consent or agreement in writing, not under seal, in case of a plea for 40 years, or by such writing, or parol consent, or agreement, contract, or license, in case of a plea for 20 years." His Lordship said, "according to this view of the act, a license in writing must be replied to a plea of 40 years enjoyment if it cover the whole time, and the same of a parol license in the case of a plea for 20 years" (1).

(1) And in support of a plea of enjoyment for 20 years, evidence may be given of enjoyment by the claimant for that period; for if evidence of user beyond 40 years were to be excluded, it might be, that after the claimant had been established as far as 38 years back, a discontinuance of proof might occur as to the two or three preceding years, and the party might fail, because he was unable to carry his case on without going to the distance of 41 years; see Lawson v. Langley, 1 A. & Ell. 890.—EDITOR.

From this last sentence we find in what cases a special replication is necessary. Indeed, the rule so to be observed in such cases is laid down very clearly in this same judgment.

"On looking at the report of the case of the Monmouthshire Canal Company v. Harford, we find that the decision rests on this ground, viz. that the asking leave, from time to time, within the 40 or 20 years, breaks the continuity of the enjoyment as of right, because each asking of leave is an admission, that at that time, the asker had no right; and, therefore, the evidence of such asking within the period is admissible under a general traverse of the enjoyment for 40 or 20 years, as of right (2). To this ground of decision I quite accede, and it will follow, that not only an asking leave but an agreement, commencing within the period, may be given in evidence under the general traverse, notwithstanding the words of the 5th section. For the party cannot, and does not rely on it, as an answer to an enjoyment as of right, which he confesses, nor as avoiding any such enjoyment during the time covered by the agreement; but, is shewing that there was not, at the time the agreement was made, an enjoyment as of right; and so the continuity is broken, which is inconsistent with the simple fact of enjoyment during the 20 or 40 years."

In accordance with this decision, it was decided in the case of Onley v. Gardiner, that the enjoyment of an easement as of right for 20 years, next before the commencement of the suit, within the statute, means a continuous enjoyment as of right for the 20 years next before the commencement of the suit of the easement, is an easement without interruption acquiesced in for a year; and that it is therefore defeated by unity of possession, during all or part of the 20 years.

It was also decided, consistently with the previous decision, that such unity of possession need not be specially replied under the 5th sect.

Section 6 of the act enacts, that no presumption shall be made in favour of any claim. (3)

"That in the several cases mentioned in and provided for by this act, no presumption shall be allowed or made in favour of any claim, upon proof of the exercise or enjoyment of the right, or matter claimed, for any less period of time, or number of years, than such period or number mentioned in this Act, as may be applicable to the case and nature of the claim."

(2) See 2 Bing. N. C. 709; 4 Mee. & Wels. 501.—EDITOR.

(3) The act relieves a party from the necessity of proving the right from time immemorial, and allows an equivalent the proof of actual enjoyment for 30 years, so that no presumption is admissible; see Bailey v. Appleyard, 3 Nev. & Per. 260.—ED.

This section confirms and makes imperative the rule, which had previously obtained, enjoyment for twenty years, and even for less having been generally considered as sufficient proof of the right; but by this section, nothing less than an enjoyment for thirty or twenty years, according to the nature of the right can be held to sustain the right.

Section 7 provides for cases, in which the party, against whom the right is asserted, is incapacitated from resisting the claim.

Section 8 introduces an important proviso.

"Provided always, that when any land or water, upon, over, or from which, any such way or other convenient watercourse, or use of water, shall have been or shall be enjoyed or derived, hath been or shall be held under or by virtue of any term of life, or any term of years exceeding three years from the granting thereof, the time of the enjoyment of any such way or other matter, as herein last before mentioned, during the continuance of such term, shall be excluded in the computation of the said period of forty years, in case the claim shall within three years next after the end, or sooner determination of such term be resisted by any person entitled to any reversion expectant on the determination thereof." (4)

Two cases have been decided on this section.

In Bright v. Walker a way had been used adversely, and under a claim of right for more than twenty years overland in the possession of a lessee, who held under a lease for lives granted by the Bishop of Worcester.

It was contended, that although the Bishop, as reversioner, might not be barred, the right was good as against the lessee; but it was held, that under the Act, this user gave no right as against the Bishop, and did not affect the see. And also as it could not give a title as against all persons having estates in the locus in quo, it gave no title as against the lessee, and the persons claiming under him. And that no title was gained by an user, which did not give a valid title as against the Bishop, and permanently affect the see.

PARKER, B. in delivering the judgment of the Court, said, "The important question is, whether this enjoyment (as it cannot give a title against all persons having estates in the locus in quo,) gives a title as against the lessee, and the defendants claiming under him, or not at all?"

"We have had considerable difficulty in coming to a conclusion on this point; but on the fullest consideration, we think that no title is gained at all by an user, which does not give a valid title against all, and permanently affect the see."

(4) See 4 Mee & Wels. 500.—ED.

And afterwards—"From hence we are led to conclude, that an enjoyment for twenty years, if it give not a good title against all, gives no good title at all."

See also Wright v. Williams, 1 Mee. & Wels. 100.

It will be seen, that the case of a tenancy for life is mentioned both in the 7th and 8th sections. In the 7th, the periods are not to be reckoned during the existence of the tenancy for life, except only in cases where the right or claim is declared to be absolute and indefeasible.

In the 8th section, the longer period is not to be considered as running during the existence of the tenancy for life, provided the reversioner expectant on the determination thereof within three years resist the right.

The construction to be put upon these two clauses, is that the shorter term does not run during the tenancy for life, but if the longer term has elapsed, the right becomes absolute, unless (under sec. 8,) the reversioner resists it within three years from the determination of the life estate. In Wright v. Williams, the Court said "The time of a tenancy for life in a person, who might otherwise be capable of resisting the claim, though excluded by the 7th section from the computation of the shorter period of twenty years, absolutely is by the 8th section, excluded from the computation of the longer period of forty years, conditionally only, that is, provided the reversioner expectant on the determination of the term for life shall within three years (that is probably before the end of the years,) after such determination resist the right."

3 & 4 Vic. cap. 26.

An Act to remove doubts as to the competency of persons, being rated inhabitants of any parish, to give evidence in certain cases.

WHEREAS it is expedient to remove all doubt whether persons are by law competent to give evidence in cases where they have been formerly held to be disqualified by the liability to pay parochial rates; Be it enacted by the Queen's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that from and after the passing of this act no person called as a witness on any trial in any court whatever may and shall be disabled or prevented from giving evidence by reason only of such person being, as the inhabitant of any parish or township, rated or assessed or liable to be rated or assessed to the relief of the poor, or for and towards the maintenance of church, chapel, or highways, or for any other purpose whatever.

II. And be it enacted, that no churchwarden, overseer, or other officer in and for any parish, township, or union, or any person rated or assessed or liable to be rated or assessed as aforesaid, shall be disabled or prevented from giving evidence on any trial, appeal, or other proceeding by reason only of his being a party to such trial, appeal, or other proceeding, or of his being liable to costs in respect thereof, when he shall be only a nominal party to such trial, appeal, or other proceeding, and shall be only liable to contribute to such costs in common with other the rate-payers of such parish, township, or union.

TAXATION OF STOCK IN TRADE FOR THE RELIEF OF THE POOR.

Under the stat. 43 Eliz. c. 2, all personal property yielding a certain annual permanent profit is rateable to the relief of the poor. (a) Stock in trade, when its value can be ascertained, is rateable. (b)

A Report has been recently made (14th of May last) by the Poor Law Commissioners upon the expediency of an alteration being made in this law. The Commissioners, after describing the extent of operation under the statute of Elizabeth, and progress of the tax on stock in trade, with its great inequality and easy evasion in many instances, say;—

"The rate on stock in trade, dependent on the amount of profit, cannot be made without minute investigations into the concerns of individuals—investigations so difficult, and the results of which are so fallacious, that a right conclusion can scarcely be obtained, while to the ratepayers every inequality, the result of a wrong estimate, is a subject of dissatisfaction, necessarily begetting disputes and litigation.

"From these difficulties, and from a desire to avoid appeals, another kind of injustice has existed in places where stock in trade has been rated. Those who could most successfully conceal their profits, or could most easily reach elsewhere, or keep their stock away from the parish, have been able to make the best terms with the overseers, to which terms, rather than lose all, the overseers and other inhabitants are compelled to submit; and, as an inducement to avoid appeals by such as might be supposed to be capable of appealing successfully, it has been the practice of overseers to set the rates at sums which, being much below the true amount of the liability, were likely to be undisputed by the ratepayers, and which the overseers were certain of being able to prove.

(a) Rex v. Hogg, 1 Term Rep. 727; Barr. 22; Rex v. Ringwood, Cowp. 326.

(b) Per Lord Kenyon in Rex v. T. Mast, 8 Term Rep. 154; Rex v. Dursley, id. 53; see also Rex v. White, 4 Term Rep. 771.

"There is good reason to believe that there is no parish in the kingdom in which the overseers have ever been able fully to carry out the law. The instances which have come to our knowledge of attempts to carry it out have been instances of compromise, and fully justify Lord Mansfield's enlightened views as to the impossibility of carrying the rating of stock in trade into effect. His Lordship's views appear to be still entertained in the manufacturing districts, and in other parts of the country, since the recent communications on the rating of stock in trade, which we have received, generally express a stronger sense of the impracticability of the law than of its injustice or impolicy.

"It would appear to be unnecessary for us to make any remarks upon the general policy of a tax operating so unequally, affecting some trades and some classes of traders with inevitable burdens, from which others are exempt, without any other reason for the difference than the merely accidental variety in the ease with which the tax can be imposed in one class of cases, as compared with the other. But it is proper to call our Lordship's attention to the fact, that the tax, as yet, has never been imposed on the parishes in the greater part of England and Wales, and is practically unknown in the districts which have become the great modern seats of manufactures. Thus its extension to these would operate with all the disturbing effects of a new tax, and with an effect which we are not prepared to estimate, but which may be considerable in changing the relations of our trade and manufactures, both as regards other parts of her Majesty's dominions (as Scotland and Ireland), where no such tax can be laid, and as regards the competition of our countrymen with the trade and manufactures of other countries.

"On the other hand, as the tax has not yet been practically laid on these districts, the repeal of the law would not deprive the landed interest of any benefits now enjoyed by it in the taxation of the commercial and manufacturing classes. The repeal of the liability would leave the whole class of ratepayers in those districts in their existing relative positions. In the districts in which the practice of rating stock in trade formerly prevailed, and has been recently resumed, the alteration, by the total repeal of the liability, would be comparatively small, on account of the limited extent to which the liability has hitherto, in the causes before adverted to, been capable of being enforced.

"It is likewise important to remark, that the assessments are made by the parish overseers, who are unpaid officers, acting only for a single year, and are therefore not likely to possess or obtain the skill, to bestow the labour, which would be requisite for so difficult a task as that of making a fair and equal rate upon stock in trade.

"It has been sometimes suggested as desirable, that the practice of rating inhabitants for stock in trade should be confined by legislative enactment to the places in which it has already been carried into effect.

"If this suggestion should be adopted, it would be right to couple it with another—namely, that the rate should be made only in the same proportions to the actual profits as hitherto. For, as we have before stated, the practice has been such as to allow of a large escape of profits from the rate; and if ever a rate should be made in any place on the whole amount of profits legally liable to the rate, such a rate would, to the extent of this difference, be a new rate on the trade of the place: this provision, however, from the difficulty of discovering the proportion between the amount of profits which have been rated, and the amount of the true rateable profits, would be difficult of application.

"We think that it would be most beneficial to repeal altogether the effect of the word 'inhabitant' in the statute of Elizabeth. Hitherto no inhabitants, simply as inhabitants, have been rated other than the possessors of stock in trade; but, inasmuch as stock in trade was affected with its liability above a century and a half after the passing of the statute of Elizabeth, and as the words of the statute would undoubtedly admit of a much wider signification than has yet been attributed to them, there is still danger that it may at some time or other have a wider practical effect given to it. It appears to us to be better to prevent such an extension than to postpone the remedy until the evil has arisen; especially as this can now be done without any derangement beyond the repeal of the liability to be rated in respect of stock in trade.

"It would, however, be sufficient for the immediate purpose, to repeal specifically the liability of inhabitants to be rated in respect of stock in trade."

BOOTH AND OTHERS, DIRECTORS OF THE LONDON JOINT-STOCK BANK v. THE GOVERNOR AND COMPANY OF THE BANK OF ENGLAND.

OPINION of the JUDGES upon the QUESTIONS proposed to them by the LORDS.(a)

TINDAL, C. J. C. P., gave it as the unanimous opinion of all the judges, that the arrangement or agreement entered into by the London Joint Stock Bank with the Kingston Commercial Bank in Upper Canada, was only an indirect mode of doing that which could not be directly done according to law, and consequently was a violation of the rights and privileges of the Bank of England, and that the order of the Master of the Rolls was, therefore, correct; that the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in the case of Bank of England v. Anderson, (b) which laid down the same doctrine, had been taken into consideration upon the present occasion, and had received the unanimous approbation of all the judges.

The LORD CHANCELLOR expressed his entire concurrence in the opinion of the judges, and stated that he never had entertained any doubt about the case.

SETTLEMENT OF THE LAW.

Whether a child born in SCOTLAND of UNMARRIED PARENTS domiciled in that country, who, after the birth of the child, intermarrying in SCOTLAND, is, by such after marriage, rendered capable of inheriting lands in ENGLAND.

The very important question raised in this case has been in agitation since the year 1823.

The facts appear to be these:—

In 1823 a bill in Chancery was filed by the plaintiff, John Birtwhistle, against the defendant, in which it was stated that the defendant had entered upon lands of the plaintiff, situate in Yorkshire, during the infancy of the latter, and received the rents and profits, whereby she became liable to account as guardian in socage, charging that the ancestor of the plaintiff had died indebted in various specialties, and praying a receiver, an account and delivery of the title deeds, and that the personal estate might be applied in payment of the specialty debts. Upon motion made before LORD ELDON for a receiver, his Lordship directed an action of ejectment to be brought in the Court of King's Bench, and pressed upon the parties the necessity—in a case of such importance to the settlement of the law—that a special verdict should be taken, intimating a decisive purpose, upon application by either of the parties, to direct a new trial if they came back to the Court of Chancery with a common verdict.

An action of ejectment was accordingly brought, which was tried at the Yorkshire spring assizes, in 1825, before Mr. BARON BAYLEY, when the jury returned a special verdict, in substance as follows:—William Birtwhistle died on the 12th May, 1819, seised in his demesne as of fee of and in one undivided third part of divers lands in Yorkshire, without leaving any issue of his body. All his brothers died in his lifetime, and, except his brother Alexander Birtwhistle, they all died unmarried, and without issue. Alexander Birtwhistle, in 1790, went from England into Scotland, and became and was domiciled there, and there remained and dwelt so domiciled until the time of his death. While domiciled in Scotland he cohabited during the whole of the period of time with Mary Purdie, being also domiciled there, and during such cohabitation had issue by the said Mary Purdie the plaintiff John Birtwhistle, who was the only son of the said Alexander Birtwhistle, and of the said Mary Purdie, and was born in Scotland on the 15th May, 1799. On the 6th May, 1805, after the birth of John Birtwhistle, Alexander Birtwhistle and Mary Purdie were married in Scotland, according to the laws of Scotland, and on the 5th of February, 1810, Alexander Birtwhistle died in Scotland, seised to him and his heirs of divers lands there, leaving the said John Birtwhistle him surviving, who, after the death of his father was duly served heir thereto, according to the law of Scotland, which he held and enjoyed in his own right, he having from the time of his birth dwelt and remained in Scotland, and been domiciled there. (b) If a marriage of the mother of a child with the father of such child takes place in Scotland, such child born in Scotland before the marriage is equally legitimate by the law of Scotland with children born after the marriage for the purpose of taking land, and every other purpose. (c)

The case upon this special verdict was argued before the Court of Queen's Bench on the 3d May, 1826, when the present LORD CHIEF JUSTICE TINDAL made a very talented argument as counsel on behalf of the plaintiff, in which he contended that the lessor of the plaintiff being legitimate by the law of the country in which he was born, was legitimate all over the world; legitimacy being a personal status which accompanies a man wherever he goes. That the lessor of the plaintiff was born ex justis nuptiis according to the law of the country where he was born, and by that law the question ought to be determined.

Mr. Courtenay contended against this argument, and cited Calvin's case (d) to show that the right of inheriting English lands must be decided by English principles and English law, and that foreign laws, and the decision of foreign courts, could not prevail.

ABBOTT, C. J., said, (e)—The simple question is, who is the heir to the lands in England? The rule as to the law of the domicile has never been extended to real property, nor have I found in the decisions in Westminster Hall any dictum giving countenance to the idea that it ought to be so extended. Two decisions in the House of Lords (f) have, however, been referred to, whence it is said such an opinion may be inferred; it is, therefore, satisfactory to me to know that this case may be carried before that tribunal. There being no authority for saying that the right of inheritance follows the law of the domicile of the parties, I think it must follow that of the country where the land lies. Personal property has no locality, and even with respect to that it is not correct to say that the law of England gives way to the law of a foreign country, but that it is part of the law of England that personal property should be distributed according to the jus domicilii. The question now to be decided is, whether a person having been born abroad can inherit land here, who would not have inherited had he been born in England. That the descent of land in England follows the law of the place where it is situate, appears by the various customs prevailing in different manors. Is there then any authority that the law of England, as to any lands in England, is to adopt the law of a foreign country? We are not together without an authority upon the subject. It appears by the statute of Merton, that the bishops were desirous of having that very law for which the lessor of the plaintiff now contends, introduced into this country; but it was refused in language which has always been remembered and often repeated. That language, it is said, must be confined in its application to persons born in England; but the Crown had foreign possessions at that time, and persons born there were not aliens, and I see no reason for restraining the meaning of the passage in question in the manner contended for. Having that authority before me, and finding nothing in our law books to support a contrary doctrine (indeed in Brodie v. Barry, (g) there is a dictum in favour of it), I think we shall not be warranted in giving effect to the Scotch law of legitimacy. It is not against our law that a foreign marriage, however solemnised, should be held good; we adopt the laws of all Christian countries as to marriage, but it by no means follows, that we are to adopt all the consequences of such marriages which are recognised in foreign countries; it is sufficient if we admit all such consequences as follow from a lawful marriage solemnised in this country. For these reasons I am of opinion that our judgment must be in favour of the defendant.

Mr. Justice BAYLEY concurred in this opinion, and observed, he conceded that the lex loci governed the question of marriage; but whether all the consequences recognised in a foreign country, as following upon a marriage there, are also to be recognised in this country, is a very different question, and he thought must be answered in the negative; and the rest of the Court were unanimous in these opinions, and determined that the lessor of the plaintiff could not be received as legitimate heir to land in England, and judgment passed for the defendant. (h)

A Writ of Error was then brought in the House of Lords, where, for the plaintiff, the substantial question put in issue was, "Whether the lessor of the plaintiff was, or was not, entitled to the character and status of heir of his father, to the effect of inheriting a real estate situate in England, as being, or not being, the lawful son of his said father."

MAGISTRATES, Actions against.—Whether the Statute 5 & 6 W. 4, c. 50, sec. 75, which requires 21 DAYS notice of action, repealed the 24th Geo. 2. c. 50, which requires a month's notice.

The plaintiff in this case is a labourer, and the defendants are magistrates. It appeared that the plaintiff had two cows impounded, on the ground of their having strayed. He, believing that they had not strayed, desired two of his boys to go and release them from the pound. An information was afterwards laid against him under the provisions of the 5th and 6th Wm. IV., chap. 50, sec. 75, and the defendants convicted him in the penalty of 1*l.* 1*s.* and 8*d.* costs. He refused to pay, and was sentenced to one month's imprisonment and hard labour. This action was subsequently commenced, and the 21 days' notice of action which the statute the 5th and 6th Wm., chap. 50, required, were given. An objection was taken at the trial for the defendants, that a month's notice of trial ought to have been given, according to the provisions of the 24th Geo. II., c. 50, which had not been repealed by the subsequent act, the 5th and 6th Wm. IV. c. 50. The objection was overruled, and the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, damages 40s.

A rule nisi to set aside the verdict, and enter a nonsuit, was then obtained.

Mr. Palmer showed cause against the rule.

The COURT was of opinion that the latter statute could not be considered as a repeal of the earlier statute, and that, therefore, the action had been brought too soon. Under those circumstances, the rule must be made absolute.

LANE V. BURGHART.

Guarantees—Liability of a BANKRUPT upon a GUARANTEE, given previous to his Bankruptcy.

The plaintiff is the executor of one Mr. Simon. The defendant is a tailor. It appeared that a debt was owing from General Bacon, formerly in the service of the Queen of Portugal, to Mr. Simon, and he was arrested under a writ of capias for £275. The defendant then entered into a guarantee that, in consideration of the general's discharge, he would secure the payment of the £275. by half-yearly instalments. The present action was brought to recover the third instalment. The defendant had, since the transaction, become a bankrupt, but had now resumed business.

Mr. Sergeant Channell, for the defendant, contended that the subsequent bankruptcy of Mr. Burghart disposed of this debt, and formed a bar to it.

Verdict for the plaintiff—damages £74. 18s. the defendant having leave to move to enter a nonsuit on the question of law, whether the bankruptcy formed a bar to the demand.

Mr. Henderson applied for a writ of habeas corpus, to be directed to the keeper of a lunatic asylum, in which the defendant is a patient, in order that the plaintiff might have an opportunity of serving him with a process in this cause, the keeper having refused to allow any access to him.

PARKE, B.—If you take a rule nisi, it will answer your purpose.

Mr. Henderson would be glad to listen to any suggestion of the sort, but that he feared his client might be delayed and prejudiced by it. At present the affidavits disclosed very clear ground for a habeas absolutely, and it was feared that, by taking it nisi now, much delay and expense might be created, which it would be better to avoid.

PARKE, B., however, after consulting the rest of the Judges, said it was not so clear that the habeas ought to issue absolutely in the first instance, and it would be better to take a nisi, which would no doubt answer quite as well as the compulsory rule. There was no reason why the keeper should not allow the patient to be served with due precaution, and if a rule nisi were to be served with a proper explanation, the keeper would in all probability so act as to render unnecessary the trouble and expense of bringing up the defendant afterwards.

Rule nisi granted.

COURT OF REVIEW—May 13.

FIAT AGAINST ROBERT HENRY WALSH.

EX PARTE JACOB KING.

EQUITABLE MORTGAGEE—of a house and fixtures—Whether common house fixtures are goods and chattels within the order and disposition of the Bankrupt, under the 73d sec. of the Bankrupt Act, and belong to the Assignees; or whether they pass to an equitable Mortgagee.

The petitioner, Jacob King, in his petition, stated that he was possessed of the lease of a house and premises at Mitcham, in Surrey, for the residue of a term of 21 years, which the bankrupt had contracted to purchase from him for £200., and that by an indenture of assignment, dated the 9th March, 1839, the petitioner, in consideration of £200. therein expressed to be paid by the bankrupt, assigned the lease to him for the residue of the term, together with all the fixtures, mentioned in a schedule, to such assignment absolutely.—That the petitioner signed the usual receipt for the £200. purchase-money upon the back of the assignment, but that in fact only £50. was paid in money to the petitioner, the balance of £150. being paid by a bill of exchange, drawn by the petitioner upon the bankrupt, at three months' date, which was dishonored, and in fact had not since been paid. That the fiat of bankruptcy was issued on the 12th September, 1839, and the petitioner claimed a lien upon the lease and fixtures for the balance of the purchase-money remaining unpaid, and prayed an order that the lease and fixtures might be sold, and the proceeds applied in payment of the debt and the charges of sale.

The fixtures consisted of stoves, blinds, and other tenant's fixtures, which were claimed by the assignees.

Mr. Chandless supported the petition, and contended that the fixtures were not goods and chattels within the order and disposition of the Bankrupt, which the Bankrupt Act would vest in his assignees.

Mr. Rogers appeared for the assignees, and insisted upon the right of the assignees to the fixtures.

ROSE, J., said, these fixtures might have been reached by an execution. Can they be removed without injury to the freehold? If not, they favour so much of the realty as not to be within the order and disposition of the bankrupt, so as to pass to his assignees; but if they do not favour of the realty, then I think they do fall within that order and disposition, and come within the statute. There is no doubt that fixtures, as such, will pass to the mortgagee, and the only question is whether these were indelibly affixed to the freehold. The legal title of the assignees was paramount to the equitable title of the petitioner, and if these be tenants' fixtures, as in relation between landlord and tenant, they passed to the assignees by order and disposition. The question is, whether they can be detached from the freehold without waste; and what the mortgagee seeks to effect is what the bankrupt might have severed at any time previous to the bankruptcy. A mortgagee's title cannot be put higher than that of a landlord, as was decided in Horn and Baker (a), and subsequent cases. He was of opinion that the petitioner was entitled to no more than the proceeds of the case, and that the proceeds of the removable chattels were the property of the assignees, though what these were was of course a question for inquiry. Upon the question of order and disposition, I have always understood the rule to be, with regard to the trade fixtures of a bankrupt, that as the assignees are entitled to reach them as an executor can claim against an heir-at-law, or which a tenant can remove against his landlord, having regard to the particular quality of the estate. In ordinary cases, house fixtures are for the most part looked upon as a part of the house to which they are attached, and do not, therefore, raise any credit from possession; but in the case of trade utensils and fixtures, it is otherwise; and the fact of the possession by the trader raises the presumption of property, and induces credit. In the former instance, the possession may well remain in the bankrupt, without affecting the title of the mortgagee, it not being within the mischief of the statute. This is a question of fact merely between the parties. However, there have been some decisions which are supposed to shake this rule, and to authorize the proposition that whatever article comes within the most extended and comprehensive meaning of the word "fixture," without reference to the injury and waste which may be done to the premises in its removal, forms part of the realty, and passes to the mortgagee as a part of his security; so that it would no longer remain a question of fact between the parties. This, I think, is stating the rule much too widely. If we had to decide this case upon the very early authorities, we should certainly be obliged to consider, that whatever was attached to the realty, formed a part of it; but in modern decisions, personal property has been looked upon as of greater importance; and many exceptions were allowed—for instance, as between heir and executor, landlord and tenant, debtor and creditor. Many exceptions have been allowed for the benefit of trade. A positive rule was laid down in Horn v. Baker. The determination in that case raises two questions here to be governed by it. First are the fixtures trade chattels annexed to the freehold, which can be removed, or such as when so annexed, are customarily removed. Secondly, if such be the fact, can they admit of being removed without damage to the freehold. If they can, then they are assets of the bankrupt, and pass to the assignees; if they cannot, the petitioner has no claim upon them.

CROSS, J., said, the question in this case is a question of law—whether fixtures are goods and chattels within the meaning of the Bankrupt Act. There are other cases before the Court depending upon the decision in this case, and I much regret that I cannot concur with my learned colleague in the view that I have taken of the question; but my opinion is, that the petitioner is entitled to the lien he claims upon the house and fixtures, and I am the more inclined to this opinion by the decision made by the Court of Exchequer in Boydell v. M'Michael (b), which was recently adopted by this Court (c), where it was determined that fixtures were not goods and chattels within the 72d sec. of the Bankrupt Act, and that consequently in this case the claim of the assignees cannot be allowed. We have the authority of Lord Lyndhurst and Mr. Baron Bayley to this effect, in Trappes v. Harper (d), where an action was brought for injury to the reversionary interest of the plaintiff by the defendants (assignees), by taking away certain engines, machines, utensils, fixtures, and things affixed and fastened to the closes and buildings. The possession was in the defendants. The plaintiff claimed under a term of 1000 years, by way of mortgage, to secure a sum of £4655, of all the messuages, tenements, dwelling-houses, lands and buildings, and also the steam-engines, mill gearing, heavy gear, mill-wright-work fixed, machinery, and other matters and things erected and then standing and being in or upon the buildings, works, and premises which in any manner constitute fixtures and appendages to the freehold or any part thereof. The bankrupts had all these in their possession; and they were "firmly fixed to the freehold," yet in such a manner that they might easily be removed without any material injury to the articles themselves, or to the buildings. It was contended, that, between mortgagor and mortgagee, the rule against removing fixtures applied in its ancient strictness. But Lord Lyndhurst met the argument by observing, "The question is, whether these articles are fixtures, and it arises between mortgagees and a mass of other creditors." And in another place he says, "A mill or steam-engine may be a fixture; but how many other things are affixed to those moving powers upon the condition of which there may be more doubt?" Bayley, B., said, "Here the question is, were these articles fixtures or not? The bankrupts were the reputed owners of the machinery, and in consequence of their being so considered, obtained extensive credit. We are of opinion, therefore, that with respect to machinery of this description, erected by the bankrupts for the purposes of trade, it would have passed to the executor and not to the heir, and that it was the partnership estate of the bankrupts." His Lordship then commented upon cases before Lord Hardwicke, between heir and executor; and cited Lawton v. Lawton (3 Atk. 13) as affording the principles upon which, as between mortgagees and creditors, these cases are to be decided. "These authorities," says Lord Lyndhurst, "lead us to the conclusion, that where utensils and machinery are erected by the owner for the purpose of trade only, in a neighbourhood where such utensils and machinery as these would commonly have been removed, and where this can be done without injury to the inheritance, they form an exception to the general rule, and are not to be taken as part of the inheritance, but as personal estate." And such is the law at this day, unless that doctrine is shaken by Boydell v. M'Michael; but there Mr. Baron Bayley said, "as the assignment mentioned the fixtures eo nomine, it is valid as between mortgagor and mortgagee to pass them to the latter if they are goods and chattels; but whether they are to be considered such between him and the assignees of the bankrupt mortgagor is worth consideration." And it was held that the mortgagor was entitled in preference to the assignees, because the articles claimed were "fixed to the freehold and parcel of it." This is perfectly consistent with Trappes v. Harter; but if it is said, this is an authority for the proposition that if the article claimed be within the common acceptance of the word "fixtures," that is sufficient to take it from the mortgagee I entirely dissent from looking upon it as an authority for such a proposition.

ESSAY.

ON THE ENGLISH LAW OF BAILMENTS.

CARRIERS BY WATER.

THE liabilities of CARRIERS by WATER are also much narrowed by the statute, Geo. 4. c. 155. s. 53, of which statute exempts them from liability from damage arising from the want of a duly qualified pilot, and the 7 Geo. 4. c. 15, exempts them from making good losses incurred by the misconduct of the master and mariners without their privity to a greater extent than the value of the ship and freight.

In reference to the case last cited, (a) as to the goods with which he is entrusted the last thing the master of a ship should think of, because it can only be justified by that necessity, which supersedes all human laws. If he sell without necessity, his owners as well as himself will be answerable to the merchant, (b) and they will be answerable if he places the goods at the disposal of a Vice Admiralty Court, in a British Colony, and they are sold under an order of the Court, such a Court having no authority to order the sale. (c) And the persons who buy under such circumstances will not acquire a title as against the merchant, but must answer to him for the value of the goods. (d) The law at the present day upon this subject was very clearly shewn by LORD DENMAN, in a recent case in the Court of Queen's Bench, (e) the facts of which were these. In January, 1836: the agent of the defendant, shipped at Singapore, on board the James Scott, belonging to the plaintiff, certain goods under a bill of lading, by which it was stipulated, "That the goods were to be delivered at the port of London to Richard Thornton, Esq. or his assigns, he or they paying freight for the said goods, as per margin." The James Scott proceeded on her voyage with a general cargo; but, encountering severe gales, was obliged to put into Batavia; and on her arrival there, in consequence of the damage to the ship and cargo, a transhipment was found necessary, and the cargo, including the goods of the plaintiff, was transhipped to the Mountaineer and Sesostris, and bills of lading were drawn for delivery of the cargoes to William Ellward, Esq. or his assigns, he or they paying freight. On the arrival of the last-mentioned vessels with their cargoes in London, the defendant claimed and obtained both parcels of goods, under the bill of lading, per James Scott, but contended that he was only bound to pay freight pro rata from Singapore to Batavia, and the actual freight per Mountaineer and Sesostris.

Lord Denman, in delivering the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, said, "Upon the trial, it appeared that the plaintiff had been paid freight by the James Scott, at the rate originally agreed on, for so much of the voyage as had been performed up to the ship's arrival at Singapore, and for the remainder of the voyage to London, at the rate of which he had contracted for the carriage of the goods by the Mountaineer and the Sesostris. The action was brought for the difference between the two rates for that portion of the voyage; and it was objected, that for this portion of the voyage he was not entitled to receive more than he had actually paid; while, on the part of the plaintiff, it was contended, that the necessity of the transhipment being assumed, which it must be for the purpose of the argument, the Mountaineer and Sesostris were to be considered as the James Scott; that the master had fulfilled his undertaking in carrying the goods to their destination, and had, therefore, earned his full freight, while it was a matter of indifference to the owner of the goods whether they had arrived safe by one vessel or the other. It is clear, "That by the contract, the shipowner, and the master, or his agent, is bound to carry the goods to their destination in his own ship, if not prevented from doing so by some event which he has not occasioned, and over which he has no control. When, however, such an event has occurred to interrupt the voyage as above defined, and the shipowner or master, (for we think no distinction can be made between the two) has no opportunity of consulting the freighter, there seems to be much disagreement in foreign ordinances and jurists on the point, whether or not, he is bound to tranship, or having contracted only to carry in his own ship, he is not absolved from further prosecution of the enterprise, by the vis major, which prevents his accomplishing it in the literal terms of his undertaking. By the Rhodian law, the laws of Oleron, Art. 4, and the ordinances of Wisbuy, Art. 16, the master was at liberty, but was not bound to tranship. The old French Ordinance, on the other hand, in precise terms, imposed the obligation upon him: En cas que la raison ne puisse être accommodée, le maître est obligé d'en louer incessamment un autre. Art. 11, Du Fret (f). The terms of this ordinance occasioned, however, much controversy, Pothier and Valin, maintaining that they were not imperative, except as the condition of earning full freight; Emerigon, on the other hand, insisting that the duty was strictly cast upon the master as the agent of the freighters (g). The modern French code appears to adopt this view of the question. The words of the Code de Commerce, 296, are, on this point, almost the same as those we have cited from the ordinance and it is stated by Chancellor Kent, who, in his Commentaries, vol. 3, p. 207—12, 3rd ed. very ably and learnedly sums up the whole question, that Boulay, Paty, and Harderus, in their commentaries on it, have agreed in holding to the construction adopted by Emerigon.

All authorities, however, are in unison to this extent, that the master is at liberty to procure another ship to transport the cargo to the place of destination; and, in these words, Lord Tenterden cautiously lays down the rule of our law. It may, therefore, easily be taken to be either the duty or the right of the shipowner to tranship in the case now supposed, if it be the former, it must be so in virtue of his original contract; and should seem to result from a performance of him of that contract, that he will be entitled to the full consideration for which it was entered into, without respect to the particular circumstances attending its fulfilment; on the other hand, if it be the latter, a right to the full freight seems to be implied—the master is at liberty to tranship; for what purpose, except for that of obtaining his full freight at the rate agreed.

In the case supposed, we may introduce another circumstance. Let the owner of the goods arrive, and insist, as he undoubtedly may, that the goods shall not proceed, but be delivered to him at the immediate port; there is no question but that the full freight at the original rate must be paid; and that, because the freighter presses the master, who is able and willing, to have the right to insist on it, from fulfilling the contract on his part, and because sending the goods to their destination in another vessel is deemed a fulfilment of the contract. If, therefore, the owner of the goods is not present and personally exercises no option, still the shipowner, in forwarding the goods, must have the same rights, and in so doing, must be taken to exercise them with the same object in view."

"One question, however, has been asked, which it will not be right to pass over: what, it has been said, if the transhipment can only be effected at a higher than the original rate of freight, which party is to stand to that loss? By the French Ordinance and the Code de Commerce (to which Chancellor Kent refers), the shipowner is entitled to charge the cargo with the increased freight; and, as a consequence of that rule, it becomes an average loss; and in case of an insurance, must be made good by the insurers (h). No case of the sort, that we are aware of, has occurred in this country, nor is it necessary for us to express any opinion further than as bears on the present question."

"It may well be that the master's right to tranship may be limited to those cases in which the voyage may be completed on its original terms as to freight, so as to occasion no further charge to the freighters; and that, where freight cannot be procured at the rate, another, but familiar principle, will be introduced—that of agency for the merchant. For it never must be forgotten that the master acts in a double capacity; he is agent of the owner as to the ship and freight, and agent of the merchant as to the goods. These interests may sometimes conflict with each other; and from that circumstance may have arisen the difficulty of defining the master's duty, under all circumstances, in any but very general terms. The case now put supposes an inability to complete the contract on its original terms in another bottom, and therefore the owner's right to tranship will be at an end, but still, all circumstances considered, it may be greatly for the benefit of the freighter that the goods should be forwarded to their destination, even at an increased rate of freight; and if so, it will be the duty of the master, as his agent, to do so. In such a case, the owner will be bound by the act of his agent, and, of course, be liable for the increased freight. The rule will be the same, whether the transshipment be made by the shipowner or the master; and, in applying it, circumstances make it necessary, on the one hand, to repose a large discretion in the master or owner, while the same circumstances require that the exercise of that large discretion should be very narrowly watched."

PROBLEM XIV. VOL. IV.

LESSOR AND LESSEE.

COVENANTS—WAIVER. What amounts to a WAIVER of a breach of Covenant?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LEGAL GUIDE.
ANSWER TO PROBLEM 26. --VOL. 3.
WHAT IS DEEMED AN ILLUSORY APPOINTMENT?

By the Act 1 Wm. IV. cap. 46, no appointment shall be construed illusory and invalid, by reason of the share appointed being unsubstantial and nominal. But it is necessary to understand the doctrine as it stood before that act.<sup>(a)</sup>

Where a power was given to A. B. to appoint property to a set of persons, or where property was given to a set of persons in such proportions as A. B. should appoint; an appointment of a merely nominal or very small portion of the property divisible was, at law, held a good and valid appointment. If any part was allotted to each, a court of law would not enter into the question as to the adequacy or sufficiency, but would hold it good, although the fund divisible was never so large.<sup>(b)</sup> But in equity relief would be granted where the share was nominal and disproportionate.<sup>(c)</sup> Thus in Gibson v. Kinven, 1 Vern. 66, the testator gave personal estate to his wife, "upon trust and confidence that she would not dispose thereof but for the benefit of her children." She gave five shillings to one, and the court granted relief.<sup>(d)</sup> And in Wall v. Thurbane, 1 Vernon, 414,<sup>(e)</sup> where the testator devised that his real estate should descend amongst his three daughters, provided that his wife should distribute it in such proportions as she should think fit in her lifetime, and the mother appointed a very small share to one daughter,—the court, after long debate, declared that the case was relievable in equity. In this case was cited Gibson v. Kinven; (ubi. sup.) but note, says the reporter, one main reason in that case was that the wife had married a second husband, and, being under coverture, her distribution might be influenced by her husband's authority.<sup>(f)</sup>

The disproportion of the sum appointed to the share which the object would have taken in default of appointment, and not the actual amount, seems to have been the point looked at by the court in deciding whether the appointment was illusory or not, 1 T. R. 785. And to determine what proportion of a fund should be the standard in adjudicating on cases of this nature has caused much controversy. In Wilson v. Piggott, 2 Ves. jun., 351, LORD ALVANLEY held that one sixteenth to one of four objects was not an illusory appointment. In that case the share was not appointed, but came to one of the objects, in common with others, in default of appointment, but LORD ALVANLEY said that made no difference, and assimilated the case to one where lands suffered to descend were held in satisfaction of a covenant to purchase. In Kemp v. Kemp, 5 Vesey, jun. 855, the learned judge decided, that an appointment of 10*l.* to one of three objects, the fund being 1900*l.*, was illusory, and decreed an equal division.<sup>(g)</sup>

(d) But all the interests given to the children were taken into consideration.—See also Vanderzee v. Acton.—EDITOR.

(e) Reported also there, p. 355.—EDITOR.

(f) This book is so inaccurate that much relief cannot be placed upon it. See also Craggs v. Easter, and Sweetnam v. Woolaston, there also cited, but it is unknown who decided these two cases.—EDITOR.

(g) The decision made in this case was that, under a power to appoint among several objects, each must have a share, and by the rule in equity as to illusory appointments, a substantial share; and a good reason appears, as another provision by the person executing the power, not from any other quarter. Under such an appointment, the fund is divided, being appointed 10*l.* to one, 50*l.* to another, and the remainder to a third child, all having other portions aliunde, it was set aside as illusory; but in Wilson v. Piggott, LORD ALVANLEY held an appointment to one of our children, amounting only to the sixteenth of the whole fund, (being a fourth less than the equal proportion,) to be good. His Lordship often expressed his desire to get out of the rule altogether, and lamented that equity had not followed the rule of law, and in Kemp v. Kemp he said he was compelled, against his will, to hold the appointment in that case illusory.—EDITOR.

(a) Because the Act is not retrospective.—EDITOR.

(b) See Spring dem. Titcher v. Biles, 1 Term. Rep. 438 n. per Lord Mansfield.

(c) In equity an appointment of a very small share is not illusory, if justified by circumstances, as where that object is otherwise provided for, Vanderzee v. Acton, 4 Ves. jun., 785.—EDITOR.

But in Butcher v. Butcher, 9 Vesey, junior, 32, Sir WILLIAM GRANT held that an appointment of £200 out of a fund of about £17000 was good (h). He made a distinction between a substantial share and a substantial provision. And in Dyke v. Sylvester, 12 Ves. jun. 126, that Judge followed up the principle which he had established in the last case; and though, of each of seven objects out of nine, only about £71. were given, the fund being £7100, and, consequently, the disproportion much greater—like decision was made.

And it seems that, in decreeing the appointment illusory, the conduct of the appointees could not be taken into consideration (Kemp v. Kemp, ubi supra).

But the previous advancement of a child, as in marriage, would operate in favour of the validity of the appointment (Bristow v. Warde, 9 Vesey, jun. 336).

Nor would the appointment have been considered illusory where such appointee was at the time an uncertificated bankrupt (Bax v. Whitbread, 10 Vesey, jun. 31). In this case the bankrupt took interests in other property by the same deed of appointment; and this circumstance seemed to weigh much with the Court.

The appointment would have been valid if the child had been before provided for by the donor of the power, Kemp v. Kemp. Mocatta v. Lousada, 12 Ves. jun.

But such provision must not have been made by the donor of the power, Kemp v. Kemp.

It may be added, that if the property to be appointed was mixed, it was not necessary that the appointee should take some of each; Morgan v. Surman, 1 Taunt. 289. (i)

The late act of 1 Wm. IV. cap. 46, has properly put an end to all further inconvenience arising from these differences by enacting, "that no appointment to be made in exercise of any power to appoint amongst several objects, shall be invalid, or impeached, in equity, on the ground that an unsubstantial, illusory, or nominal share only shall be thereby appointed, or left unappointed, to devolve upon any one or more of the objects of such power; but that such appointment shall be as good in equity as at law: provided that nothing in the act shall affect any provision in the instrument creating any such power, which shall declare the amount of the share or shares from which no object shall be excluded; provided also that nothing in the act shall be taken at law or in equity, to give any other validity to any appointment than such appointment would have had if a substantial share of the property affected by the power had been thereby appointed, or left unappointed, to devolve on any object of such power." A. J. H.

(i) The result of the authorities, then, was rather a negative than an affirmative rule. LORD ALVANLEY determined, that where a party is, in default of appointment, to take a third share, a gift of a hundred and ninetieth share to him is illusory. There the MASTER OF THE ROLLS drew the line, so that any share which, squared by this rule, would exceed that in amount, was not deemed illusory. But upon an appeal to the LORD CHANCELLOR, in Bax v. Whitbread, for the express purpose of restoring the old rule, his Lordship thought that the principle stated in the late cases, in effect destroyed all the authorities. The sum of £50. being given, he said, in one family, and by one will, it is difficult to conceive that the identity of the sum, or the proportion, can afford the ground of determination in another family and upon another will. The motives also must be furnished by the same circumstances, whether good conduct or misconduct; a provision by a parent or a third person; circumstances, if the Court is at liberty to regard them, of utility. The result of the authorities, he added, was, that from the time of LORD NOTTINGHAM, the Court has taken upon itself the duty of exercising a discretion in these cases; and his Lordship seems to have considered himself still bound by those decisions. Upon a later appeal to LORD ELDON, in Butcher v. Butcher, he expressed the same opinion (1 Ves. & Bea. 79). The law, therefore, on this head appears to stand as it did before the case of Butcher v. Butcher was decided by the MASTER of the ROLLS; and yet although LORD ELDON decided that the Court was bound to inquire whether the share was substantial or not, his Lordship showed a strong disposition to narrow the doctrine. In both the appeals, the decrees of the MASTER of the ROLLS were confirmed, on the ground that the shares were not illusory. In Butcher v. Butcher, Elizabeth Butcher had a power to appoint the fund amongst her children, by her present or any future husband, by deed or will, from time to time. The power was quite in the common form; and therefore, perhaps, much weight could not be given to the circumstance, that at the time of making any particular appointments, he could not know what the number of objects would ultimately be; and, indeed, as appointments are not often made till the children require their portions when the probability of many other children must have ceased, this is a difficulty which is not likely to arise. In default of appointment, the fund was given in the usual way to sons at twenty-one, and to daughters at twenty-one or marriage; but it was provided, that if any son of her present marriage should attain twenty-one, or any daughter twenty-one, or marry, no child by any future husband should, by marriage or otherwise, be entitled to more than a moiety of the property, which provision, it might be contended, could not affect the right of each class of children, as between themselves, to a substantial share. She made the unequal appointment which has been mentioned; and LORD ELDON held, that attending to all the circumstances, and the nature of the trust collected from the deed, he was not authorised to say that the share was not substantial. He relied upon the circumstances, that the power was from time to time, and the number of objects was incapable of being ascertained until she reached an age at which she could not have more; and if there had been one child by a subsequent marriage, after all her particular appointments, that child might have taken a moiety of what constituted the whole fund before any appointment, though that should leave to perhaps twenty children of the former marriage, only their respective shares of what remained unappointed. It is evident, he observed, how immensely large a discretion was given, and to what the fund might, by repeated executions of the power, be reduced, and this went far to shew that her discretion must, as far as it can in any case, be unfettered. See 1 Sug. Powers, 568.

BIRTWHISTLE v. VARDILL.

LEX LOCI DOMICILII.

SETTLEMENT OF THE LAW.

Whether a child born in SCOTLAND of UNMARRIED PARENTS domiciled in that country, who, after the birth of the child, intermarrying in SCOTLAND, is, by such after marriage, rendered capable of inheriting lands in ENGLAND.

The following QUESTION was put by the LORDS to the Judges:—

“A. went from England to Scotland, and resided and domiciled there, and so continued many years till the time of his death. A. cohabited with M. an unmarried woman, during the whole period of his residence in Scotland, and had by her a son B., who was born in Scotland. Several years after the birth of B., who was the only son, A. and M. were married in Scotland according to the laws of that country. By the laws of Scotland, if the marriage of the mother of a child with the father of such child take place in Scotland, such child born in Scotland before the marriage is equally legitimate with children born after the marriage, for the purpose of taking land, and for every other purposes (a). A. devised of real estate in England and intestate. B. entitled to such property as the heir of A.”

On the 10th of June, 1830, Sir W. ALEXANDER, C. B., delivered the opinion of the judges, of which the following is the substance. (b)

There are two points to which attention must be directed, separately, and in succession to each other.

The 1st regards the status or condition of the claimant. The 2nd is, what rules of inheritance the law of the country where the property is situated, and the tribunal sits, has impressed upon the land the subject of the claim?

(a) This was the CIVIL LAW established by the Emperor Constantine, and confirmed by the Emperor Justinian; and was established in the CANON LAW by the Constitution of POPE ALEXANDER III. in 1160.

(b) See a full Report of this Opinion, and of the case 9 Bligh, 45.

As to the 1st, LORD STOWELL in Dalrymple v. Dalrymple (c) said,—The cause being entertained in an English Court, must be adjudicated according to the principle of the English law applicable to such a case: but the only principle applicable to such a case by the law of England, is, that the status or condition of the claimant must be tried by reference to the law of the country where the status originated: having furnished this principle, the law of England withdraws altogether, and leaves the question of status in the case put to the law of Scotland. I will suppose a case in many circumstances resembling the present. In addition to the circumstances stated in the question, let it be further supposed that the father and mother of the claimant, had after their marriage, one or more sons born to them. Suppose then the present claim to be made. The first inquiry having been satisfied, and it being upon that inquiry perfectly ascertained that the claimant is the eldest legitimate son of his deceased parent for the purpose of taking land, and for every other purpose, by the law of Scotland, it will next be requisite to inquire what are the rules and maxims of inheritance which the law of England has impressed upon that land which is the subject of the claim. Let it further be supposed that upon this inquiry it shall turn out that the land claimed is of that description which is called Borough English. This being proved, we think it clear that the claimant's legitimacy by the law of Scotland, his right to inherit by that law will give the claimant no right whatever to the land in England held in Borough English. Take also the case of Ilderton v. Ilderton (d) a case of a claim to dower by a foreign widow, whether she is a widow or not, that is, whether she was the lawful wife of the man who was, during the coverture, seised of the land, is a question which the law of England permits, upon a claim to English land, to be determined by the foreign law, the law of the country where the contract of marriage was made (e): there the comity between nations stops. When her character of widow shall have been fixed according to these foreign rules, the law of England comes into action, and, proceeding inexorably by its own provisions and regulations, decides what are the interests in the English land which her character of widow has conferred upon her. It inquires what are the rules which attach upon the particular land in favour of a widow. If, upon that inquiry it appears that the land is subject to the common law, it will give her a third; if it appears to be gavel-kind, one half, while she remains casta et sola. If the land be customary land of any manor, the custom must be looked into; and she can have only what that custom shall bestow, however strange and capricious that custom may be.

This distinction is very familiar to foreign jurists, and is noticed by them as the difference between real and personal status: the last being those which respect the person, and follow it everywhere; the first being those which are connected with the land and adhere to it, and are as immoveable as the subject to which they are applied.

The answer to the question must be founded upon this distinction: while we assume that B. is the eldest legitimate son of his father, in England as well as in Scotland, we think that we have also to consider whether that status, that character, entitles him to the land in dispute as the heir of that father; and we think that this question, inasmuch as it regards real property situated in England, must be decided according to those rules which govern the descent of real property in that country, without the least regard to the rules which govern the descent of real property in Scotland. The circumstance which dictates the answer we must give is, that in selecting the heir for English inheritance, we must inquire only who is that heir by the local law. If the argument from the comity of nations be shaken off, no man will doubt that a person legitimated per subsequens matrimonium is not the heir of English land. What Lord Coke says, (e) affords the rule "Hæres, the legal understanding

(c) 2 Hagg, 58.

(d) 2 Hen. Blacks, 145.

(e) In England, if the succession to real estate was ruled by the laws of other countries, the inconveniences and difficulties would be endless; if a person married in a country where polygamy was allowed, would each wife be dowable? if a person having several daughters, went abroad and married again in a country where the canon law (which permits a second marriage to be good if there is no knowledge of the existence of the first wife) prevails, and by such second marriage has a son he would be legitimate in that country, but would he succeed to lands in England? Would the son of a second marriage born abroad, where the rule of possessio fratris does not prevail, succeed to the brother of the half-blood in England? these inconveniences would be consequences if the international law regulated the real property of a state. Land is held by title; personality by possession, and who under these conflicting circumstances could by any possibility advise upon a title to land? the difficulties of such an admission would be insurmountable. The laws of gavel-kind and borough English are not affected by the residence of the proprietor in a different part of England from that where those laws are in force; the incidents of the feudal tenure were not personal, but savoured strongly of realty; had they been personal, the kingdom might have been deprived of its defence, therefore, every thing shews that the lex loci, should control the international law with regard to the succession to real estate: and as these inconveniences, arising from the contrary, would prejudice the Queen and the State, therefore, by the law of the civil jurists themselves, international law is in this instance perfectly inadmissible.

of the common law, implieth that he is ex justis nuptiis procreatus for Hæres legitimus est quem nuptiæ demonstrant." Perhaps Lord Coke's expression would have been more precise and accurate, if instead of saying "ex justis nuptiis procreatus," he had said "ex justis nuptiis natus." But this is what is meant, this maxim is in substance, in our opinion, a maxim regarding the land, describes one of its most important qualities, traces out the course in which it shall descend, and is no more liable to be broken in upon by any foreign constitution, than are the degree of interest which the heir shall take in the land, the conditions on which she shall hold it, the proportion which a woman shall obtain as a widow, or the limitations and conditions attached to her estate. I have endeavoured to state the principles, and to shew the course of reasoning which has conducted my learned brothers and myself to the conclusion, that B., the person designated by your lordships, is not entitled to the property in question as the heir of A.

The question is, what the law of England requires, and, as we are advised, the law of England requires that the claimant should actually, and, in fact, be born within the pale of lawful matrimony, we cannot agree that the presumption of a foreign jurisprudence, contrary to the acknowledged fact, should abrogate the law of England, and that by such a fiction a principle should be introduced, which, upon a great and memorable occasion the legislature of the kingdom distinctly rejected: your lordships will perceive that I allude to the statute of Merton.<sup>(f)</sup> It would seem strange to introduce indirectly, and from comity to a foreign nation, a rule of inheritance which may affect every honour and all the real property of the realm, which rule, when proposed directly and positively negatived and refused: a refusal that in England has obtained the approbation of every succeeding age.

Again, it is said that two cases have been decided in this House which are nearly in point, and will prove that the claim of B. should be supported. These cases are the cases of Shedden v. Patrick, and the case of Lord Strathmore.<sup>(g)</sup> These two cases are alike in principle, and establish the same proposition. In the one case the parents lived in a state of concubinage in America, and in the other in England. In both, children were born to them. Afterwards the parties married in their respective countries: by force of their marriages the American issue claimed Scottish land, and the English issue claimed Scottish honours; in both, your lordships decided against the claimants. Now, it is said, these authorities are exactly the converse of the present case. They establish the principle, that the Courts of the country where the lands lie, in a question respecting the heirship to these lands or honours, inform themselves whether the claimant is heir, not by the law of the country where the lands lie, but in the country of the domicile, where the marriage of the parents was contracted; and if he is not heir by that foreign law, his claim is rejected, from which they deduce this consequence, that if he is heir, his claim should be sustained.

It is obvious, that if in the cases to which I am now referring, the claimants had been declared heirs by the Scottish law,—the Scottish law admitting of no heirship without legitimacy, and have been called in aid to bestow upon them that personal character of legitimacy refused to them by their own law; in other words, a law foreign to their birth, to their domicile, and to the marriage of their parents, would have been held to bestow upon them their personal status and character,—a decision certainly contrary to the acknowledged principles upon this subject. The character of illegitimacy attached to the persons of the English and American claimants by their own law, accompanied them every where, and would prevent them being received as heirs any where within the limits of the Christian world. This view, in our judgment, renders these decisions entirely consistent with the principles I have unfolded, and prevents our considering them as objections to the opinion all the judges entertain, that B is not entitled to the property in question as the heir of A.

The Earl of LAUDERDALE then submitted to the House that the following questions should be put to the Judges; and in putting them his Lordship observed,—I cannot easily assent, but it is said, "By the law of Scotland, if the marriage of a mother of a child with the father of such child takes place in Scotland, such child born in Scotland, before the marriage, is equally legitimate with children born after the marriage." My Lords, I hold that this—a statement of the law which is incorrect—is the very question in discussion under the law of Scotland. I contend that the law of Scotland considers the contract of marriage under such circumstances to have taken place before the procreation of the child. When, therefore, your Lordships say that the child was born before marriage, you are making a statement that defeats the law of Scotland, and gives in effect to the learned Judges a different impression of the case from that which a full knowledge of the law of Scotland would give them. My words, I could enlarge upon this if necessary; but, as I am most anxious to save your Lordships' time, I will simply read the questions, which, as I apprehend, would bring before your Lordships and to your knowledge a more distinct view of the law of Scotland upon this subject. 1. If the fact of the legitimacy or illegitimacy of a native of Scotland is at issue in the courts of law in England, is it or is it not a principle of the law of that country, that in judging whether he was born in justis nuptiis, it (the law of England) withdraws and leaves that legal question to the exclusive judgment of the law of Scotland, where his parents are domiciled, where the alleged marriage took place, and where he was born? 2ndly. If, in the judgment of the law of Scotland, a native of that country is born in justis nuptiis, does or does not the law of England, on that comity established by international law, hold him to be possessed of every right which an Englishman born in justis nuptiis enjoys; and, independent of every view of international law, must or must he not in law be deemed to enjoy such rights under the 4th and 25th articles of the union betwixt England and Scotland, approved of and confirmed by the Parliaments of both countries, the former of which provides that there shall be a communication of rights, privileges and advantages which do or may belong to the subjects of either kingdom, except when it is otherwise expressly agreed in the articles, and the latter of which provides that all laws and statutes in either kingdom, so far as they are contrary to or inconsistent with the terms of these articles or any of them, shall from and after the Union cease and become void, and shall be declared to be by the respective Parliaments of the same kingdoms? 3rdly. A, a native of Scotland, domiciled in that country, where he possessed a landed property, lived with a female, B, with whom he had two children, C and D. Some years after the birth of these children A went through a ceremony of marriage. (I cautiously said saying that A was married, and refer to the ceremony of marriage, it being a proposition discussed under the law of Scotland, whether that ceremony of marriage has the effect of establishing a matrimony antecedent to that period, or whether the marriage was only from the moment of the ceremony of marriage with B, by which, according to the law of Scotland, C and D undoubtedly became legitimate at the death of the father A.) C, the eldest son, inherited his estates in Scotland, and some years afterwards purchased freehold estates in England. C afterwards died intestate, leaving no children. His legitimate brother D inherited his estates in Scotland, and was regularly served heir to them. D claims the freehold estates in England, of which his brother died possessed, on the ground that he is the nearest heir to his brother C. In opposition to this claim it is asserted that D, though the legitimate brother of C, cannot inherit his English estates, because, though the law of Scotland holds that the ceremony of marriage which took place is only evidence of that consent which constitutes marriage having been given before the birth of C. and D, and therefore regards them as being born in lawful wedlock, the law of England considers the fact that they were born before the marriage ceremony and, therefore, though it admits their legitimacy, holds that they cannot inherit. By the law of England, must or must not this question be decided according to the law of Scotland, where these two children were born, where the marriage ceremony took place, and where the parties were domiciled: and if it is to be decided by the law of Scotland, assuming that the law of that country is here accurately stated, does it not follow, that C. and D. being born in justis nuptiis, according to the law of that country, D. has a right to inherit the lands in England of which his brother C. died possessed? 4thly. As to what would be the consequences with regard to personal estate, A, a domiciled Scotsman, possessed of estates in that country, cohabited with B, by whom he had a son, C; some years after which a marriage ceremony passed betwixt him and B, which, according to the law of that country, furnished evidence of that mutual consent having taken place antecedent to the birth of C, which constitutes marriage, and gave to his son C. the status of a son born in lawful wedlock. A, some years after this marriage, retired to England, and acquired a domicile there, when he became possessed of a large personal estate; at the death of A, C. was served heir to the Scotch landed property. Is he, or is he not, also entitled to the personal estate in England, consisting of leasehold and funded property, of which his father, supposed to be a domiciled Englishman, at the time of his death, died possessed? 5thly. A, an unmarried man, went from England to Scotland, where he acquired landed property, resided, and was domiciled for many years. Soon after his arrival in that country, he formed a connection with a female M, with whom he lived, and by whom he had a son B. Some years after the birth of this child, a regular marriage ceremony, according to the forms prescribed by the law of that country, took place betwixt A. and M. Assuming, as is laid down by all the great authorities who have written on the Law of Scotland, that B, in consequence of this ceremony, is held to be legitimate by a presumption or fiction of law, that the marriage had taken place betwixt his parents before he was born; or, in other words assuming that the ceremony of marriage which so took place, is, by the Law of Scotland, regarded as evidence, that before the procreation of B, that mutual consent to marry had passed betwixt A. and M, which the law of that country regards as constituting marriage, and that he is therefore held to have been born in justis nuptiis, and as such was in truth served heir to the landed property in Scotland, in which his father died intestate. Under such assumption the learned Judges are requested to say whether B. is, or is not, entitled, as the heir of A. dying intestate was seised? Lastly, in order to obtain information with regard to the practice of the Courts, is there any case in which, under the Law of England, an only son, whose legitimacy is admitted, is nevertheless debarred from inheriting landed property, of which his father dying intestate, was possessed? If such case or cases exist, the learned Judges are desired to give to the House references to the authorities, and by whom they are reported, and to state the principles of law on which such judgments proceeded.

LORD COTTENHAM, C. said (h)—This is a question upon a special verdict. The Law of Scotland was found in the Court below, or supposed to be found by the verdict of a jury. The moment that question of fact was decided by the verdict of a jury, and formed a part of the special verdict, the Court below was called upon to draw the conclusion of law from the finding, right or wrong, contained in that special verdict. The Court below had no power after that special verdict was formed, to new model it. If that were to be done, it would have been necessary the case should have gone down again for the jury to find the fact. If there had been any suggestion of error in point of fact; but the fact being assumed, right or wrong, the Court of King's Bench was called upon to pronounce as to the conclusion of law upon that state of facts. It was suggested that the conclusion of the Court below, being a conclusion in point of law upon that assumption of facts, was erroneous, and in consequence of that, a writ of error being brought into your Lordships' House, I apprehend there is no power in this state of the proceedings to inquire into the fact. Your Lordships have no power to inquire what is the Law of Scotland, if the Law of Scotland is stated upon the record; and the question is, supposing the law as found to be correctly stated, whether the opinion of the learned Judges stated in the Court below, was, upon the assumption of the facts there stated, a correct one.

LORD BROUGHAM, after observing upon the extreme importance of the question, said, in approaching it there are some things not disputed. It is admitted that the validity of a marriage must depend on the law of the country where it is had, and that consequently the parents of the party were validly married. It seems also to be agreed, that, generally speaking, legitimacy is a status, and must be determined by the law of the country to which the party belongs. But it is said by those who support this judgment that whether the party here is legitimate or not is no question before us, the only question being, it is alleged, whether or not he is the heir to an English real estate. This distinction, I confess, appears to me founded on an inaccurate view of the subject. It is true, that the question here arises upon the claim of an heir as such, and that, therefore, the only question may be said to be, whether he is heir or not. But it is also very possible that this question may turn wholly upon another, namely, whether or not the claimant is eldest legitimate son of his father, the person last seised? Nor do I well see how legitimacy can ever come into question in any other way than as connected with the claim to succession, either real or personal, in England or in Scotland either, unless in a single case of a declaration of bastardy, or of legitimacy—a proceeding unknown in the English law. It is therefore, by no means sufficient for deciding this case to say that the question touches not legitimacy, but inheritance: not the personal status of the party, but his right to real property. It may touch both these matters, and the latter may wholly depend upon the former.

LORDS LYNCHURST and DENMAN thought the importance of the case such, and the doubt which existed so considerable, that they ought to be further investigated before the case was determined, to which LORD BROUGHAM assented, and it was determined that the case should be again argued at the bar of the House, in the presence of the judges, with a view to the settlement of the law upon this important question.

The case was accordingly argued again at the bar of the House, in the presence of the judges, whose unanimous opinion was again in favour of the judgment of the court below.

The LORD CHANCELLOR concurred in opinion with the judges.

LORD BROUGHAM said he was disposed to believe that he was mistaken in the inclination which had prevailed in his own mind upon this important question in controversy.

ROLLS' COURT—July 13.

EDWARDS v. LAMPORT.

Injunction—PARTNERSHIP.

Mr. Pemberton moved for an injunction in his cause.

Mr. Hindes stated the case for the plaintiff, as appeared by the bill. The plaintiff had for twenty-five years carried on the business of a meat salesman and carcase butcher on commission, in Newgate-market, and at the same place carried on a very extensive trade in the sale of mutton, he killing on an average 500 sheep per week; about two years ago, wishing to increase his business, and to engage some person to assist him in carrying it on, he applied to the defendant, George Lamport, who then carried on the business of a meat salesman and carcase butcher, in the same market; on a very limited scale on his own account, and it was agreed between them that the defendant should assist the plaintiff in the commission business, and should bring his own business to the plaintiff's shop to be conducted there, and that the defendant should receive by way of remuneration and salary one-third part of the profits of the commission on the meat consigned either to him or to the plaintiff, deducting expenses; and that the plaintiff should have the other two-thirds, but that the defendant should not give any credit without the consent of the plaintiff, nor bear any portion of the debts, or of any loss whatsoever, the whole of which losses should fall upon the plaintiff, and that the defendant should receive for his use the whole profit to arise from his purchasing meat on his own account, the plaintiff participating only in the profits of the commission. Under this agreement the defendant brought his business to the plaintiff's shop, entered into his service as an assistant, and continued so to the 20th of June last. Plaintiff assisted defendant with the loan of cheques to enable him to make purchases of meat upon his own account. Plaintiff had a clerk of the name Brown, who paid defendant £2. a week on plaintiff's behalf, made out the weekly bills, and sent a portion of them to the defendant to collect, and he handed over the monies when collected to Brown, to be paid into the plaintiff's bankers. It was usual also for plaintiff to place in defendant's hands cheques in blank, both as to date and amount, signed by the plaintiff, that they might be paid to the country customers. The settlement of accounts took place at Christmas, 1839, as plaintiff believed, but he could not state positively, the defendant having possessed himself of the plaintiff's books, which he refused to deliver up or to allow plaintiff to inspect. The plaintiff, desirous of advancing the interest of the defendant, assisted him with the loan of cheques, and down to the 15th of June last he gave to the defendant by way of loan three cheques for £100. each, to enable him to purchase meat on his own account, but the plaintiff had nothing to do with the profits from such purchases, he participating only in the profits of the commission, and the defendant repaid the amount of all such cheques except one, which he had not repaid or returned to the plaintiff. The plaintiff also was in the habit of giving the defendant cheques in blank for the purpose of being filled up and sent to the country customers, in respect of the commission business.

In November, 1839, the plaintiff was desirous of retiring from business, and told defendant, that if he could procure a person to take his premises he would wait until Christmas, otherwise he should advertise them, which he did, and plaintiff in May last came to an agreement with Messrs. Chandler to sell them the lease, possession to be delivered on Midsummer-day last. On the 12th of June plaintiff informed defendant of this, who said he was sorry for it.

On the 14th of June the defendant had in his possession, besides the cheque for £100. lent him as before stated, five blank cheques to be filled up for the country customers in respect of the commission business, which he retained. On the 20th of June the plaintiff sent his clerk Brown to the defendant for the books, which he refused to give up, alleging that he was a partner with the plaintiff in the commission business. Brown informed plaintiff of this refusal on the 21st of June, on which plaintiff immediately went with Brown to Newgate-market, where he found his counting-house door locked, and defendant told him, that as he had chosen to let the shop without consulting him, defendant, he should cut down whatever meat Messrs. Chandlers hung up. The plaintiff afterwards endeavoured to obtain his books from the defendant, and fastened up his own shop, but the defendant forced an entrance, and had since been carrying on his business there on his own account, and retained the books, and refused to return the cheques. The bill prayed that the said defendant might be compelled to deliver to the plaintiff the said books belonging to the said commission business, and also the said five cheques, signed by the plaintiff in blank as to dates, as well as to amount; and also the said cheque for £100. dated the 15th of June, 1840; and that the profits of the said commission business from the said last settlement of accounts down to the said 20th day of June, 1840, might be ascertained, the plaintiff offering to allow to the defendant in account one-third part of such profits, and that an account might be taken of all dealings and transactions between the plaintiff and the defendant, in respect of the commission business, since the said last settlement of the accounts thereof; and that the defendant might pay to the plaintiff what upon the taking of such accounts should appear to be due. And that in the mean time the defendant might be restrained by injunction from filling up, negotiating, or in any manner making use of the said five cheques, signed by the plaintiff in blanks as to dates as well as amounts, or any, or either of them; and also from negotiating, or in any manner making use of the cheque for £100., dated the 15th of June, 1840, so retained by defendant as aforesaid, and also from getting in, or from receiving any debts or other monies due to the plaintiff, in respect of the said commission business.

The affidavit of Mr. Brown, the plaintiff's clerk, stated that the defendant last week frequently told him that he could fill the cheques up for any sums he pleased, — that he could fill them up for £16,000., and that he had got a person who would give £8,000. for them.

Lord LANGDALE granted the injunction as prayed.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH—July 22.

(Before Mr. JUSTICE BOSANQUET at his Chambers.)

REGINA v. DUNN.

ARTICLES OF THE PEACE—PRACTICE.—

Whether the Court has power to amend the Articles after commitment? Whether a Jurat must be appended to each affidavit?

The defendant was brought before the Judge by Habeas Corpus, to argue his objections to the commitment. He was attended by Mr. Kirk his solicitor.

Mr. Jones read the certiorari, which had been issued, commanding the justices of the peace for the county of Middlesex to return into the Court of Queen's Bench the articles of the peace that had been exhibited by Miss Angela Burdett Coutts against Richard Dunn, Esq. The return made to the writ was, that the articles of the peace were annexed.

Mr. Dunn expressed his desire to put in a contradictory affidavit.

Mr. Justice BOSANQUET said that any contradictory affidavit should have been put in before, and therefore he could not allow Mr. Dunn's to be read.

Mr. Dunn commented on his case at some length.

Mr. Justice BOSANQUET went through the objections made to the commitment of the defendant, and decided that the Court of Queen's Bench possessed the power to amend and alter a commitment, and that if the articles of the peace were informal, the judges were empowered to alter them if they were exhibited in their own court, and in this view he was borne out by the Master of the Crown-office, who had informed him that he had seen LORD DENMAN upon one occasion alter articles of the peace with his own hand. With respect, therefore, to the objection that the articles had been altered since their exhibit, the Court of Session, in his opinion, had a right to make an amendment; but that should be matter of complaint to them. The next objection was, that the jurat was bad, inasmuch as it stated that the witnesses were severally sworn in court, instead of a jurat being appended to each of the affidavits. This, it was contended, was not a sufficient of each and every of the parties having been sworn, and that it was not sufficient to support an indictment for perjury. He had referred to the practice on this subject, and he did not think the objection was sufficient to make the articles of the peace altogether illegal. Then came the more important question which had been ably commented upon by Mr. DUNN—namely, whether the facts stated in the articles were sufficient to lead to the conclusion that there was ground for supposing that the defendant would do Miss Coutts bodily harm. Looking at all the circumstances set forth, he thought there was abundant ground for entertaining such a supposition, and he was of opinion that any lady circumstanced as Miss Coutts had been could not have acted with more propriety and caution than she had done, and it was his duty to say that Mr. Dunn was remanded.

SPECIAL JURY.

WATERS v. SAPTE AND OTHERS.

DETINUE. — Property deposited with Banker for safe custody—Whether the Banker may detain it for a debt due from the depositor.

Mr. Kelly stated the case for the plaintiff who it appeared was the administrator of the late Mr. Edmund Waters, some years since proprietor of the Opera House, and who died October, 1839. The defendants were Messrs Sapte and Co., the bankers. In 1809 & 1810, the deceased, Mr. Waters, deposited the chests with the defendants, containing will deeds and plate. After his death, the plaintiff took out an administration of the effects. A letter was then written by his solicitor on the subject of the property so in the defendant's possession, and the answer was, an admission the chests being at the bank, and a statement that as there was a debt due from Mr. Edmund Waters amounting to upwards of £1,500. it would be detained until that debt was discharged. The property, it was now contended, was deposited with the bankers for security's sake.

and safe custody, but not as a pledge for any debt that might exist. In 1817 one of the three chests had been delivered up by the bankers, upon a decree by the Master of the Rolls, in a case of "The Earl of Macclesfield v. Vere and others." In the defendants' answer, in that instance, they stated that the boxes were left by Mr. Waters for safe custody; and that they were, further, ready to deliver them to him, upon his request to that effect. This document was put in to show the admissions of the defendants on the subject, and the present proceedings had been adopted to gain possession of the two remaining chests now at the defendants' bank.

Mr. Moody, for the defendants, stated that the answer that had been put in evidence was prior to the existence of the debt on account of which the property was now detained. The chests were allowed to remain during this long series of years as security for any advances that had been, or might be, made to Mr. Edmund Waters. The present defendants were not personally interested in the matter, because the debt was due to those who were no longer members of the firm; but it was necessary to retain the goods, because, if they were improperly given up, the defendants would be liable to the creditors. It was submitted, that the most likely view of the case was, that the chests were left as a pledge, though, perhaps, they were not originally deposited for that purpose. Mr. Edmund Waters was at the time a distressed man, and it was contended to be the only explanation of his being allowed to overdraw his account, by supposing that this property was the security.

ERSKINE, J., said that the defendants were perfectly justified in seeing that the plaintiff made out a title to these chests. The questions for the jury would be three—whether this property had been proved to belong to Mr. Edmund Waters? whether, if so, the defendants had detained it? and whether they had the right to do so, on account of the deposit of the property being made as a security to the former firm of Waters, Smart, and Co.?

Verdict for the plaintiff on all the issues, with 1s. damages, it being understood that the defendants would deliver up the chests immediately.

PERCIVAL v. HORNE AND OTHERS.

PLEADINGS.—Whether the Statute 1 W. 4, c. 68, protects Carriers who shall neglect to have the notice required by that Act affixed in legible characters in the booking-office.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff, soap manufacturer, against the defendants, coach proprietors, to recover a sum of £50 that had been enclosed in a parcel, and left at the defendants' booking-office, to be conveyed to its destination.

Mr. Serjeant Acherley stated the plaintiff's case. It appeared that the plaintiff's son, who was his traveller, being at Newbury, required to send to town a parcel that contained £50 in notes and sovereigns. This he booked at the defendants' office, in that place, paying twopence at the time, and telling the person in the shop that the contents were valuable, and must be taken care of. The act of 1st Will. IV. c. 68, s. 2, enacted, that when any parcel or package containing any of the articles above specified, shall be so delivered, and its value and contents declared as aforesaid, and such value shall exceed the sum of £10, it shall be lawful for such mail contractors, stage-coach proprietors, and other common carriers, to demand and receive an increased rate of charge, to be notified by some notice affixed in legible character in some public and conspicuous part of the office, warehouse, or other receiving house, where such parcels or packages are received by them for the purpose of conveyance, stating the increased rates of charge required to be paid over and above the ordinary rate of carriage as a compensation for the greater risk and care to be taken for the safe conveyance of such valuable articles; and all persons sending or delivering parcels or packages containing such valuable articles as aforesaid at such office shall be bound by such notice, without further proof of the same having come to their knowledge.

Mr. Percival, junior, however, stated that he saw no notice in the booking-office belonging to the defendants. And it was the duty of such persons to have that notice so placed as to be visible to all who entered the office. So far, however, from that being the case, the plaintiff's son, when he heard of the loss of the parcel, asked for the board, and it was ultimately found (as he stated) with its face to the wall, and in a condition to shew that it had been there for some time, being in a dilapidated and dirty condition; and these facts were supported by his evidence.

Mr. Serjeant Talfourd for the defendants, contended that the board containing the notice was always placed conspicuously in the office, and that it was there on the day when Mr. Percival's parcel was booked. That notice stated, that for packets containing money, plate, &c. the proprietors would not be held answerable unless an increased sum was paid for the safe carriage of them. That was not done by the plaintiff's son; and the defendants could not, therefore, be liable for the loss.

Evidence was given for the defendants, that the notice was affixed to the walls of the office so as to be seen by those who entered it to book parcels.

TINDAL, C. J. said it was a question for the jury. If they were satisfied with the evidence given by the defendants' witnesses, the verdict must be for the defendants; but if not, they must find for the plaintiff.

Verdict for the plaintiff—Damages £50.

RUGBY v. MOSS AND HUMPHREYS.

ATTORNEYS' Liabilities.

The plaintiff in this case is a Surgeon, the defendants are Attornies, and the action was brought by the plaintiff to recover damages for his wrongful arrest on a charge of forgery, alleged to have been preferred against him by the defendants. It appeared from the evidence adduced by the plaintiff, that the defendants being anxious to take the person of the plaintiff on a writ of capias ad satisfaciendum, they had instructed one Callam, a clerk in their employ, to devise means for the purpose, who adopted the novel scheme of trumping up a criminal charge against the defendant, by which he might be taken by the police before a magistrate, so that when the plaintiff was taken upon the criminal charge so preferred by him, they might take him upon the civil process as soon as he was discharged by the magistrate.

Mr. Corrie, for the defendants, addressed the jury, and called Callam himself and another witness, the purport of whose testimony was to the effect that Callam, who was only an occasional clerk, had misconceived their intentions, and had of his own accord made the charge in question, which they now said, as they said by a friend when the plaintiff was dismissed from the bar by the magistrate, that they never intended to make any such charge, which, so far from authorising, they were totally ignorant of.

Lord ABINGER summed up the case to the jury, leaving it to them to decide between the principal witnesses on each side, the case being one of credibility, which was a point purely for their consideration. If they attached credit to the plaintiff's witness, and thought that the evidence given by him was sufficient to convince them that the defendants, or either of them, had directed or were cognisant of this proceeding, and that it had been adopted by them as a means of serving the plaintiff with civil process, and, that satisfied, they had then volunteered to discountenance the engine they had used, it would be their duty to find them guilty of the offence against the plaintiff of which he now complained, and give such damages against them, or either of them, as they should think proper under all the circumstances.

Verdict for the plaintiff against both the defendants—Damages £400.

GILLETT AND OTHERS v. GREEN.

LAW OF PATENTS.—Necessity for proving the novelty of the Invention.—HANSON'S CABS.

The plaintiffs are the patentees of a patent granted for the building of cabs, commonly known as those used by Mr. Hansom, to whom the plaintiffs have granted licenses.

The defendant is a cabowner, and this action was brought by the plaintiffs for infringing upon their property in the patent by imitating and pirating the same.

The case occupied the Court during the whole day. At the close of the evidence, Lord ABINGER left it to the jury to say whether the defendant's cab was an imitation of the form used by the patentees; and whether the patent claimed by them was really an invention and a novelty, or whether its principle had not been in fact in common use previous to the granting thereof to them. The plaintiffs claimed their patent as a combination of a seat behind for the driver, and an access in front for the passenger, the result of which was, that the weight would be balanced; and it would be a question for the jury to say whether that was a necessary part of that combination: if an equipose might be produced by a side entrance, combined with a seat behind for the driver, as well as by that in front, his Lordship thought that there was no subject proved for a patent. If otherwise, then the plaintiffs would have the benefit of that finding hereafter. The important point, however, was, whether the seat behind for the driver, and an entrance in front, were new or not. Several of the defendant's witnesses had spoken to having seen tandems and other vehicles driven from a seat behind, and if they were believed, his Lordship thought the plaintiffs had failed in proving the novelty of their invention. Another point was the application by the plaintiffs of a spring to break the fall of the cab to one in which the driver sat behind, above or in front of the carriage, it being admitted by the plaintiffs that it had been already in use in the cabs which were driven from a seat at the side. This appeared to him not to be any novelty or invention for which a patent could be granted, any more than one might be claimed by a man who first applied an old pair of nutcrackers to a species of nut for the first time imported into England.

The jury returned a verdict to the effect that the defendant's cab was an imitation of the plaintiff's patent, which they thought was a new invention, while they could not say the result of the equipose could not have been obtained by any other combination.

PREROGATIVE COURT—July 8.

MACKENZIE v. YEO.

Whether an attesting witness to a Will, who afterwards marries one of the legatees, is a competent witness to prove its validity, where disputed.

In this case Mr. G. A. Barber, deceased, by a codicil to his will, gave to a lady, who had since become the wife of T. D. Mackenzie, £5000. Mr. Mackenzie was one of the attesting witnesses to the codicil, the validity of which is disputed, and he had been examined as a witness; but his competency was now objected to on the ground that he had an interest in the event of the suit, and his answers had been called for on the ground that he was a party in the suit, his wife having propounded the codicil, of which the executors declined to take probate.

The Queen's Advocate, for Mrs. Mackenzie, contended that, being an attesting witness (whose disqualification was never dispensed with), and his interest having accrued subsequent to the death of the testator, he was not disqualified.

Dr. Haggard, for the executors contended that the paper purported to bequeath a legacy to Mrs. Mackenzie, but not to her separate use, therefore her husband had an interest in the suit, and he had jointly executed a proxy with her, and would be liable to the costs.

Sir H. JENNER was of opinion that Mr. Mackenzie was incompetent as a witness, he being liable to be called upon for his answer as a party in the cause.

3 Vic. c. 16.

An Act to indemnify such Persons in the United Kingdom as have omitted to qualify themselves for Offices and Employments, and for extending the Time limited for those Purposes respectively until the Twenty-fifth Day of March One thousand eight hundred and forty-one; and for the Relief of Clerks to Attorneys and Solicitors in certain cases.

[19th June, 1840.]

We think it sufficient for the purpose of this work that we confine ourselves to such sections of this statute as apply to ATTORNEYS and ARTICLED CLERKS, and we direct attention in particular to ss. 8, 9, and 11.

Sec. 6. "And whereas many persons who may have paid the proper stamp duties, either before or within six months after the execution of the contracts in writing entered into by them to serve as clerks to attorneys or solicitors, scriveners or notaries public, in Great Britain, have omitted to cause affidavits to be made, and afterwards to file in the proper office, of the actual execution of such contracts, and have also omitted to cause such contracts, and the indentures thereof, or the assignment of any such indentures, to be enrolled within the time in which the same ought to have been done; and many solicitors, attorneys, notaries public, and others have omitted to take out annual certificates, or to enter the same in the proper office; and many infants and others may thereby incur certain disabilities:" For preventing thereof, and relieving such persons, be it enacted, that every person who shall, either before or within six months after the execution of such contract or indenture, have paid the proper stamp duty in that behalf, who at the passing of this act shall have neglected or omitted to cause any such affidavit or affidavits as aforesaid to be made and filed, or such contract or indenture or assignment to be enrolled, and who, on or before the first day of Hilary Term one thousand eight hundred and forty-one, shall cause such contract or indenture or assignment to be enrolled with the proper officer in that behalf, and one or more affidavit or affidavits to be made, and afterwards to be filed in such manner as the same ought to have been made and filed in due time, shall be and is hereby indemnified, freed, and discharged from and against all penalties, forfeitures, incapacities, and disabilities in or by any act or acts mentioned and incurred or to be incurred for or by reason of such neglect or omission; and every such affidavit or affidavits so to be made, and which shall be duly filed on or before the first day of Hilary Term one thousand eight hundred and forty-one, shall be as effectual to all intents and purposes as if the same had been made and filed within the respective times the same ought, by the laws now in being for that purpose to have been made and filed; and that the respective officer or officers who ought to receive, file, enter, or register such contract or indenture, or affidavit or affidavits, shall not refuse to receive, file, enter, or register the same by reason that the attorney, solicitor, or notary public to whom such infant or other person shall have been articulated or assigned, or have contracted to serve, shall have neglected to take out his annual certificate, or to register the same, but such officer or officers are hereby directed and empowered to receive, file, enter, or register the same, notwithstanding such omission; and that every person who shall have regularly served any attorney or attorneys, solicitor or solicitors, notary public or notaries public, for the term of years required by law, shall not be prevented or disqualified from being admitted an attorney, solicitor, or notary public, by reason of any omission of the person or persons to whom he served for the same term, or for any part thereof, having so neglected to take out his annual certificate, or to register the same, provided that such person is otherwise entitled to be created and admitted to such office by the laws now in force relating thereto.

Sec. 7. And be it enacted, that in case the attorney, solicitor, proctor, or notary to whom any person shall have duly served his clerkship under articles in writing for that purpose shall after such service of the clerk be struck off the roll in consequence of some defect in the service under the articles of clerkship or of the admission and enrolment of such attorney, solicitor, proctor, or notary, the person who has so duly served his clerkship shall not be prevented or disqualified from being admitted and enrolled as an attorney, solicitor, proctor, or notary, nor liable to be struck off the roll if admitted, by reason of any such defect as aforesaid, provided that such clerk or person be otherwise entitled to be admitted and enrolled according to the laws now in force relating thereto.

Sec. 8. And be it enacted, that no person who has been admitted and enrolled and in actual practice as an attorney, solicitor, proctor, or notary, shall be liable to be struck off the roll for or on account of any defect in the articles of clerkship, or the registry thereof, or the service under such articles, or of his admission and enrolment, unless the application for striking him off the roll be made within twelve months from the time of his admission and enrolment.

Sec. 9. Provided always, and be it enacted, that in any case in which the original articles of clerkship shall have been or shall hereafter be lost or destroyed before or after payment of the duty, it shall be competent to either of her Majesty's Superior Courts at Westminster to direct the enrolment of a copy of such articles, upon being satisfied, by such evidence as shall appear to the Court sufficient to prove the loss of such original articles, of the authenticity of the paper proposed for enrolment, and that the duty has been duly paid upon such articles or upon a copy thereof, to be shown by the denoting or other appropriate stamp, as the case may require, and provided such Court shall be satisfied that the clerk has duly served under such articles from the time of the execution thereof, or for such time as shall appear satisfactory to the Court under the circumstances of the case.

Sec. 10. "And whereas by an act passed in the seventh year of the reign of his Majesty King George the Fourth, to allow, until the tenth day of October, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six, the enrolment of certain articles of clerkship, and for other purposes therein mentioned, it was enacted, that it should not be lawful for the Commissioners of Stamps, or any of their officers, to stamp, under any pretence whatever, after the expiration of six months from their date, any articles of clerkship to attorneys or others, as therein specified: And whereas of the word 'months' in the said last-mentioned act, in this respect, without the addition of the word 'calendar,' occasioned mistakes and inconveniences;" be it enacted, that from and after the passing of this act the word "months" used in the said last-mentioned act, so far as the same relates to the stamping of articles of clerkship to attorneys and others therein specified, shall be understood to mean calendar months.

Sec. 11. "And whereas several persons bound to serve as clerks or apprentices to attorneys or solicitors have applied to have the indentures or contracts of such clerkship stamped after the expiration of six lunar and before the expiration of six calendar months from the date thereof;" be it enacted, that it shall and may be lawful for the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes, or any of their proper officers, at any time before the last day of Michaelmas Term, one thousand eight hundred and forty, to stamp any article of clerkship, contract, indenture, or other instrument, whereby any person hath become bound to serve as a clerk or apprentice, in order to his admission as an attorney or solicitor in any of the Courts of Law or Equity, although the period of six calendar months from the date thereof hath now elapsed, upon payment of the proper duty payable in respect of the same, and of the further sum of five pounds by way of penalty, provided it shall be proved, to the satisfaction of the said commissioners, that application was made to them, or to their proper officers to have such articles, contract, indenture, or instrument stamped within six calendar months from the date thereof.

ON THE ENGLISH LAW OF BAILMENTS.

WE have already distinguished the contract made for the carriage of goods from the contract of letting to hire. Lord Holt, in speaking of the former, when made by a person in a public employment, says, "The law charges the person (viz. a common carrier, hoyman, and master of a ship), thus entrusted to carry goods, against all events; but "Acts of God and the King's enemies;" so that a common carrier is an insurer against all perils and losses not within the exception. The expression, Act of God, was thus defined by Lord Mansfield.

FIELD:(a)—"It appears from all the cases for 100 years back, that there are events for which the carrier is liable independent of his contract. By the nature of his contract he is liable for all due care and diligence; and for any negligence he is suable on his contract. But there is a further degree of responsibility by the custom of the realm—that is, by the common law; a carrier is in the nature of an insurer. It is laid down that he is liable for every accident, except by the act of God or the King's enemies. Now what is the act of God? I consider it to mean something in opposition to the act of man; for every thing is the act of God that happens by his permission; every thing, by his knowledge. But to prevent litigation, conclusion, and the necessity of going into circumstances impossible to be unravelled, the law presumes against the carrier unless he shews it was done by the King's enemies, or by such act as could not happen by the intervention of man; as storms, lightning, and tempests." Masters and owners, like other common carriers, are sometimes answerable, although no actual blame may be imputable to them; for in considering whether they or other carriers are chargeable for any particular loss, the question is, not whether the loss happened by reason of the negligence of the persons employed in the conveyance of the goods, but whether it was occasioned by any of those causes which, either according to the general rules of law, or the particular contract of the parties, afford an excuse for the nonperformance of the contract.

By the statute, 26 Geo.3. c. 86, masters and owners of vessels are exempted from responsibility for accidents, "by the King's enemies, the perils of the seas, or the act of God." The only exception formerly made in the common bill of lading, was of the perils of the sea. In Smith v. Shepherd,<sup>(b)</sup> which was an action brought against the master of a vessel, navigating the river Ouse and Humber from Selby to Hull, by a person whose goods had been wet and spoiled; at the trial whereof, it appeared in evidence, that at the entrance of the harbour at Hull there was a bank, on which vessels used to lie in safety, but of which a part had been swept away by a great flood, some short time before the misfortune in question, so that it had become perfectly steep, instead of shelving towards the river; that a few days after this flood, a vessel sunk by getting on this bank, and her mast, which was carried away, was suffered to float in the river, tied to some part of the vessel; and that the defendant, upon sailing into the harbour, struck against the mast, which, not giving way, forced the defendant's vessel towards the bank, where she struck, and would have remained safe, had the bank been in its former situation. At the ebbing, her stern sunk into the water, and the goods were spoiled; upon which the defendant tendered evidence to show that there had been no actual negligence. Mr. Justice Heath, before whom the cause was tried, rejected the evidence; and he further ruled that the act of God which could excuse the defendant, must be immediate; but this was too remote, and directed the jury to find their verdict for the plaintiff; and they accordingly did so. The case was afterwards submitted to the consideration of the Court of King's Bench, who approved of the direction given by the learned judge at the trial, and the plaintiff succeeded in the cause. There does not appear to have existed in this case any bill of lading, or other instrument of contract; and the question, therefore, depended upon general principles, and not upon the meaning of any particular words, or exception.

The decision in this case caused much alarm among Ship-owners, and led to the alteration of the Bill of Lading as formerly in common use, the Legislature having refused to interfere for their protection, and these bills have since, and do now contain the following exception from responsibility, viz. "The Act of God, The King's Enemies, Fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of whatever nature and kind soever;" and in ships homeward bound from the West Indies an exception is added of "risk of boats" so far as ships are liable thereto," but since these exceptions have been added to Bills of Lading, only one case has found its way to a judicial determination. <sup>(c)</sup>

Having considered the meaning of the words "The Act of God," we will now consider the meaning of the extensive phrase "Perils of the Sea." The precise meaning of this phrase has not received any satisfactory explanation. The late Lord Tenterden, in his admirable work on Shipping, <sup>(d)</sup> says

(c) See Johnson v. Benson, 4 B. Monr. 30.;
(d) p. 330.

"In considering the subject, the first question that presents itself to the mind of an English Lawyer is, how is the question of peril of the sea to be decided? The particular manner in which a loss happens, must always be a question of fact; but admitting it to have happened in a particular manner, is the judge, before whom the cause is tried, to pronounce whether that manner be a peril of the sea, or are the jury to declare it by their verdict? In general, the construction of ambiguous expressions in written instruments is the proper province of the judge; but in mercantile instruments it often happens that the judge must have recourse to the usage of trade, and the practice among merchants to obtain a proper knowledge of the meaning of the words. When the meaning of the words is ascertained, it will rarely happen that the judge and jury can differ in the conclusion; and, probably this question, though it might afford matter of speculation, will never become a subject of serious practical inquiry." So that it appears, that even if the decision of this question does strictly and properly belong to the judge, yet his decision will be guided by usage and the course of practice among merchants, which are matters of evidence and of fact. (e) The rule of the civil law is, Inde Labeo prohibet, si quid naufragio aut per vim piratationis perierit, non esse iniquum exceptionem et dari. (f)

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LEGAL GUIDE. ANSWER TO PROBLEM 1.—VOL. 4.

OYER OF INSTRUMENTS.—What is the import of the term Oyer? In what cases, and how is it demandable? In what cases will an Inspection of Instruments be granted to a plaintiff, and in what cases to a defendant?

Sir,—This answer I shall divide into three parts, following the arrangement adopted by you in stating the problem.

1. What is the import of the term OYER? In ancient times previous and preparatory to pleading in bar, the defendant might crave oyer of the writ, bond, or other specialty upon which the action was brought, that is, to hear it read to him, whereupon the whole was entered verbatim upon the record, in order that the defendant might take any advantage of a condition or other part of it not stated in the plaintiff's declaration (3 Bl. Com. 299). But the practice of praying Oyer of the original writ having been much used for delay, the courts came to resolution not to grant such oyer in future, the authorities are cited by Sergeant Williams, in his note to 1 Saund. 318, a, and he infers therefrom that no advantage can be had either of a defective original, or of a variance between it and the declaration, and in Deshons v. Head, LORD ELLENBOROUGH somewhat unwillingly admitted the establishment of the rule (7 East, 384). OYER is now given by delivering a copy of the Instrument, and permitting it to be examined with the original, and in order to render this method as advantageous to an adverse party as the one formerly in use, the courts require that such copy should be minutely accurate, Longmore v. Rogers, Willes, 289-291.

2. In what cases, and how is it demandable? OYER is demandable in all cases where the declaration in an action on a bond, deed, or other instrument under seal, (of which it can only be demanded,) sets out such bond, deed, or instrument, and makes a profert of it, that is, stating the deed or instrument to be brought into court. It is also demandable if the defendant in his plea makes a necessary profert of any deed, and where a plaintiff is entitled to have oyer of a deed it cannot be dispensed with by the court, nor can a defendant be compelled to plead without it even though the deed be lost. But where the deed is in the hands of a third party, the court will oblige him to give oyer and produce it (2 Stra. 1198). When oral pleading was in practice, the deed was actually produced in court, but it is now in fact retained in the parties own custody. OYER cannot be had of a record, but only of deeds, probates, letters of administration, &c. Stephen on pleading, 74, et seq. 2. ATTORNEY. P. 1059. Where a defendant pleaded letter patent to a quo warranto information, and made a profert of them, oyer was refused in another term from that in which the profert was made, Rex v. Amery, (1 T. R. 149). It seems that oyer is—not demandable of an act of Parliament. If a defendant after craving oyer fails to set out in his plea the condition entirely and truly, the plaintiff is warranted in signing judgment as for want of a plea, Wallace v. Duchess of Cumberland, (4 T. R. 371). Where there may be oyer, the party demanding it is not bound to plead without it. But defendant may plead without it if he will upon taking upon him to remember the bond or deed, though if he plead without oyer, he cannot afterwards waive his plea and crave oyer. OYER may be prayed for any time before the expiration of 24 hours after the demand of a plea, though the rule to plead be out, Sparkes v. Simpson, (2 B. & P. 379); and the defendant has as many pleading days to plead after oyer is granted as he had when it was demanded (Wehber v. Austin, 8 T. R. 356).

The demand of oyer is a kind of plea, and should regularly be made before the time for pleading is expired, for if it be not made till after that time, the plaintiff may consider the demand as a nullity and sign judgment, and if oyer is not in strictness demandable, yet if it be given, the party demanding has a right to make use of it. If a defendant would insist upon his demand of oyer, he should move the court to have it entered upon record. On the other hand, if the plaintiff would contest the oyer, he may either counterplead it or strike out the rest of the pleading and demur, upon which the judgment of the court is either that the defendant have oyer, or that he answer without it. On the latter judgment defendant may bring writ of error, for to deny oyer where it ought to be granted is error, but not e converso.

The time allowed for the defendant to give oyer of a deed, &c. to the plaintiff is two days exclusive after it is demanded, and if it be not given in that time, plaintiff may sign judgment as for want of a plea. If given, the plaintiff shall have the same time to reply after oyer given by the defendant, as he had at the time of demanding it, and therefore, demand of oyer will operate as a stay of proceedings until it be given, and on receiving the copy of the deed, &c. the party demanding oyer of it is bound to pay for it at the rate of four-pence per common law-folio. Tidd.

I now come to consider lastly,

In what cases will an inspection of Instruments be granted to a plaintiff, and in what cases to a defendant?

Where a defendant has the custody of a written instrument, ~~which he holds~~ as a trustee, the court will in some instances order him to give an inspection and copy of it to the plaintiff at his expence, for various purposes. Thus where the defendant was a stakeholder, the court ordered him to give the plaintiff at his expence a copy of the articles for Epsom races, and to produce the same at the trial (Barnes, 439). So the plaintiff may have a rule nisi for the defendant to produce a deed before the Commissioners of Stamps to be stamped, and also to furnish the plaintiff with a copy of it in order that he may declare thereon. And where an action is brought by a sailor for his wages on ships articles against the captain in whose custody they are, it seems that under the equity of the statute, 2 G. 2. c. 36, the defendant if required must produce and give a copy of the articles (a) (Abbott on Ship, 389). The Court of Common Pleas will compel a defendant in covenant on a deed which he holds to produce it to the plaintiff for the purposes of the cause, and that although the plaintiff's object in seeking such inspection is to discover some defect in the deed, King v. King, 4 Taunt. 666. If one part of an indenture of apprenticeship be executed by the plaintiff and defendant, and sworn to be in the possession of the latter, held on a notice given by the plaintiff to produce it, that an affidavit of the defendant, wherein it was stated that he had no such indenture in his possession, and that he had not divested himself of it nor destroyed it, and that he did not know in whose possession it was or what had become of it, was insufficient. Because he ought to have stated that it never existed, that he had never possessed it, or that he had not been able to find it. Cooke v. Tanswell (1 Moore, 455). In trover for a written instrument it seems unnecessary to give the defendants notice to produce it, because it may be proved by description. Scott v. Jones (4 Taunt. 865). The Court of Queen's Bench will compel a defendant to produce an unstamped agreement in his custody, in which the plaintiffs claim to be parties in interest, upon the instance of the plaintiffs, in order to their getting it stamped; although the plaintiff be not an instrumentary party, and although the plaintiffs' interest no otherwise appears than upon their own declaration, which proves a claim but not an interest. Bateman v. Phillips (4 Taunt. 157). But the courts will not, at a plaintiff's instance, compel the production of an instrument to be stamped which is the hands of the defendant, and to which the plaintiff is neither an instrumentary or interested party. Taylor v. Osborne (4 Taun. 159, n.) The rule restraining the production of instruments to the application of a party named therein was much too strict; for suppose a person, though no party to a deed, took an estate by way of remainder, he had nevertheless a strong interest in the deed, and was entitled to compel the production. Bateman v. Phillips. A plaintiff in replevin was refused inspection of a deed assigning to the avowant the reversion of the demised premises, such plaintiff being no party to the deed.

(a) In order to enable the plaintiff to frame his declaration correctly, a Judge will order the defendant to show the articles to the plaintiff, and, if necessary, to give a copy of them. By the Statute, 5 & 6 W. 4. c. 19, s. 5, the burden of producing the written contract in cases of dispute with the mariner, is cast on the master and owner.

Where two parts of an indenture of charter party were supposed to have been interchangeably executed, and the part of which the master of the chartered vessel had the custody was lost at sea with the ship, the Court of Common Pleas would not compel the charterer, being sued thereon, to grant inspection and a copy of the other party for the purpose of enabling the plaintiff to declare with certainty. Street v. Brown (1 Mar. 610. s. c. 6. Taun. 302.) The reason for which, I presume, was, because the court will not in general oblige a party to discover the evidence in his support previous to the trial.

Heretofore I have considered of such documents only as are of a private nature, and therefore think it will not be out of the way here to notice the general rule that a party has a right to inspect and take copies of such books, &c. of a public nature as he has an interest in, they being in some degree material to the suit, and the party in possession not being obliged to furnish evidence against himself, as in case of a criminal prosecution. Tidd's P. The books of the sessions are considered as public books, which every one has a right to inspect, and every man has a right to inspect the proceedings to which he himself is a party. Parish books, Custom-House books, books of the Post Office, Bank, South Sea House, India Company, &c. are, to some persons considered as public books, and persons having any interest therein are entitled to inspect them. The tenants of a manor have an interest in the court rolls thereof; therefore are they entitled to inspect them when in the possession of the lord or steward, who for this purpose has not been inaptly described a trustee for the mutual benefit of each, but I apprehend more particularly so for the tenants. Every member of a corporation having an interest therein has a right to inspect and take copies of the books thereof; but inspection, when granted, is confined to the subject matter in dispute. What I have penned immediately preceding, you will observe, applies to either party as the case may be, but those instances in which a defendant is more particularly entitled to the inspection of instruments within my construction of the intendment of this problem are in such actions as are founded in a written instrument not under seal, and in which the defendant is therefore debarred of his right to demand oyer. A distinction formerly taken was that where the plaintiff declared upon a writing the court, upon an affidavit that he had no part, would let him have a copy; but where the declaration was on an agreement generally, and the writing but evidence, they would not grant it. And accordingly where an action was brought upon a special agreement contained in a note, and a rule made to shew cause why the plaintiff should not give the defendant a copy upon cause shown, the rule was discharged, because the contract upon which the action was founded was a parol contract, of which the note was only evidence, and therefore the defendant ought not to have a copy. But at present whenever an action is founded on a written instrument, as a policy of assurance, bill of exchange, promissory note, special agreement or undertaking in writing to pay the debt of a third person (which latter must be found on a good and evident consideration), &c. whether it be stated in the declaration to be in writing or not. A judge, on summons, without an affidavit, will make an order for the delivery of a copy to the defendant or his attorney, and that all proceedings in the action shall be stayed in the meantime. And in a case where the dispute was between the plaintiff, a factor in Smithfield, and the defendant, a grazier, the court, upon the defendant's motion, made a rule for the plaintiff to show cause why he should not produce at the trial the several books wherein he entered the account of beasts sold and of monies received on the defendant's account, and no cause being shown, the rule was made absolute. The rule laid down by Lord Mansfield in such cases was, that whenever the defendant would be entitled to a discovery, he should have it here without going into Equity. (2 Str. 1130.) Barry v. Alexander (M. 25. Geo. 4).

I shall conclude my answer to this problem with requesting to know, through the medium of your valuable Guide, whether, in stating the problem, you had in view that the 20th rule, H. T. 4. W. 4. was to form any part of the answer; because if so, I will send a supplementary answer, embracing such rule and the mode of proceeding adopted under it.

And remain, yours, &c.

ROLLS' COURT—August 1.

HOGGART v. CUTTS AND OTHERS.

VENDOR and PURCHASER — AUCTIONEERS — DEPOSIT MONEY — INJUNCTION — Interpleader—Specific performance.

This case was heard on the 12th of March last, when the following appeared to be the facts as shown by the pleadings.

The plaintiff is an auctioneer in London, and was employed as such by Mr. Thos. Flight, of Bond Court, Walbrook, to sell by public auction certain freehold property at Whetstone, Middlesex, which he, on the 19th of June, 1835, put up to sale at the Auction Mart, London, and John Cutts, of Witham, in Essex, one of the defendants, was the highest bidder, and became the purchaser thereof at £670, and paid to the plaintiff £134. as a deposit. In May, 1837, the plaintiff was again employed as such auctioneer by Mr. Flight to resell the said property by public auction, on the allegation that the defendant, John Cutts, had failed to complete his said purchase, and accordingly the plaintiff on the 12th of May, 1837, again put the same up for sale by public auction at the Auction Mart, when Charles Vickers, of the Stock Exchange, London, stockbroker, another of the defendants, was the highest bidder, and became the purchaser of the said property at £640., and paid to the plaintiff £128. as a deposit upon such last-mentioned sale. It afterwards appeared that the said sales were made in fact on behalf of Winwood Thodey, of the Poultry, London, glover, another defendant, as the owner of the said property, and that Mr. Flight was and acted only as his agent, and did not claim any interest in the said property or the deposits. Disputes then arose between the defendants respecting the sales and the right to the deposits, and the defendant, Thodey, commenced an action at law against the plaintiff on the 11th of Dec. 1837, to recover both the deposits, which were so paid to the plaintiff, which the other defendants resisted, and they respectively claimed an interest therein, and held the plaintiff responsible for the same in case he should pay over the money to the said other defendant, Thodey. In Dec. 1837, the proceedings in the action were suspended by consent, in consequence of the defendant Cutts having filed a bill against the plaintiff and the defendants Thodey and Vickers, praying the completion of the sale made to the defendant Cutts, and to restrain the defendant Thodey, by injunction, from proceeding in his said action; to which bill the plaintiff put in his answer, thereby stating his readiness to act under the direction of this court in the matter, but that the said defendant Thodey had lately again resumed proceedings in his said action, and the plaintiff had been compelled to plead thereto. The plaintiff's attorney then wrote to the solicitors for the defendant Vickers, and who he at that time supposed were also attorneys for the defendant John Cutts, that as Mr. Hoggart was merely a stakeholder, he wished to be informed if it was the desire of those defendants that the action be resisted, or what course was to be pursued; but that nothing had been done for the plaintiff's protection against the conflicting claims; when the declaration in the action was delivered, notice was given to the purchasers' attorneys, who desired that the plaintiff would not pay to the defendant Thodey the deposit which was paid by the defendant Vickers. The plaintiff then obtained a judge's summons to compel the defendants to interplead. On May 16, 1838, a plea was demanded in the action, and the plaintiff obtained an order for a week's time. Mr. Paterson, the plaintiff's attorney, gave notice of these circumstances to Messrs. Brooksbank and Farn, who then appeared as the attorneys for the defendant Cutts, by letter, in which he requested to know his intention, whether to proceed with the suit and to apply for an order for the plaintiff to pay the money into court, and to restrain further proceedings in the action, or whether to defend the action at law. No reply was given to this letter, and on the 23rd of May the plaintiff obtained a further summons for the defendants to interplead in the action, which was duly attended by their respective solicitors before Mr. Justice BOSANQUET. on the 25th of May, who in consequence of a representation made to him of the suit having been instituted by the defendant Cutts, declined to interfere or make any order; and the plaintiff on the following day instructed Mr. Sergeant Talfourd to make the application to the court, but he, on Monday the 28th of May, advised, under all the circumstances, that relief should be sought by the plaintiff in a court of equity. Mr. Paterson then wrote to the respective attorneys of the defendants the following letter:—"In the Common Pleas. Thodey v. Hoggart. As Mr. Hoggart has no personal interest in the disputes existing respecting the sale to Mr. Cutts in the first instance, and the resale to Mr. Vickers of the estate at Whetstone, or in the above action pending against him (Mr. Hoggart) for the recovering of the deposits paid to him on such sales, I hereby give you notice on behalf of Mr. Hoggart that unless a satisfactory arrangement be made immediately between the above plaintiff and the other parties interested respecting the action, and the trial of the questions in dispute, Mr. Hoggart being ready to pay the deposit received by him to the parties who may be entitled thereto, or as the parties jointly interested or any court may direct, I shall, in Mr. Hoggart's behalf, unless I hear satisfactorily from you within two days from this date, file such bill or bills of interpleader against you and the parties claiming to be interested as he may be advised. I think it also proper to state, that in consequence of what passed before Mr. Justice Bosanquet on Friday last, Mr. Sergeant Talfourd was instructed by me on the following day to apply, under the interpleader act, to the Court of Common Pleas in behalf of Mr. Hoggart, to pay the said deposits into court in the said action and for relief; but Mr. Sergeant Talfourd has advised Mr. Hoggart that this is not a case in which he can with safety apply for the required relief under that act; and in consequence of that advice, Mr. Hoggart had no alternative left, unless a proper arrangement is come to by all parties for his protection, than to resort to a court of equity. I also beg to express my surprise that Mr. Cutts has not thought proper to move in his suit for an injunction, he being aware by notice from me to his solicitors that the plaintiff in this action is proceeding therein notwithstanding Mr. Cutts' suit, and is forcing Mr. Hoggart to plead thereto."—This letter brought the following answers to Mr. Paterson:—"May 29, 1838. Cutts v. Thodey. In Chancery. We beg to inform you in answer to your letter and notice of yesterday, that this morning's post has brought a letter from the plaintiff by which we are instructed, and which shall forthwith be done, to advise with counsel on the sufficiency of the answer of the above-named defendant, and whether merits are thereby disclosed so as to entitle the plaintiff on motion to obtain an injunction to restrain that defendant from further proceeding in his pending action against your client the defendant Hoggart. We will inform you what the advice of counsel may be the moment we shall have obtained it. Brooksbank and Farn."—"June 1, 1838. Cutts v. Thodey. The plaintiff's counsel thinks it not advisable to apply for an injunction, and adds, that if your client, Mr. Hoggart, shall think proper to pay over the deposit to the defendant Thodey, he will do so at his own peril, and he will be at the risk of having to pay it over again to the plaintiff, should the contract fail of completion from the inability of the defendant to make out a title. See Borough v. Skinner, 5 Burr. 2639: Edwards v. Hodding, 5 Taunt. 815. Brooksbank and Farn."—" Thodey v. Hoggart. In reply to your favour of the 28th inst. I beg to say, that since the plaintiff in the suit of Cutts v. Thodey does not venture to take any steps in that cause by motion for injunction or otherwise, to raise the question as to the right to the deposits, and since you also inform me that you cannot undertake to pay over to Mr. Thodey the deposits in the event of the bill in Cutts v. Thodey being dismissed, I see no course that I can recommend except that of proceeding with the action, which I much regret. It has been my wish in every respect to bring the matter to a close as speedily as possible, and there seems no other method of doing so than that which I am compelled to proceed with. I have already offered you an indemnity, and repeat that offer, if you will pay over the deposits without any further proceedings. Geo. Cox, Bucklersbury. May 30, 1838."—" Thodey v. Hoggart. The impediment to a satisfactory arrangement of this matter does not rest with Mr. Vickers, our client; he is willing on the one hand to complete his purchase of the Finchley estate if Mr. Cutts will abandon his claim, and a good title be otherwise made; or on the other, to give up his contract on repayment of his deposits with interests and costs. Hall, Thompson, and Sewell, Salter's Hall, May 29, 1838."—No steps were, however, taken by the defendants or their solicitors towards determining between themselves the rights to the deposits, and the defendant Thodey gave the plaintiff notice of trial in the action. The plaintiff averred that he had always been ready and desirous to pay the deposits to the person or persons duly entitled to receive the same. The bill prayed that the said defendants might be decreed to interplead and adjust their several claims and demands in respect of the said deposits between themselves, the plaintiff offering to account for and pay the said deposits to such of the defendants as might appear to be entitled thereto, on being indemnified by the court in so doing, and that plaintiff might be at liberty to pay the same accordingly into the Bank of England, in the name and with the privity of the Accountant-General, to be disposed of as the court should direct; and that the said Winwood Thodey might be restrained by injunction from the further prosecution of the said action so commenced by him against the plaintiff; and that he and the said other defendants respectively might, in like manner, be restrained from all other proceedings at law whatever, touching the matters in question in this suit.

The defendant Thodey by his answer admitted most of the facts stated in the bill, and said, that he had also put in a full answer to the bill of the defendant Cutts on the 20th of April last, and therein set forth the manner in which the defendant Cutts had forfeited all right to his deposit, by his not having complied with the conditions of the sale under which he purchased the premises, the last of which conditions provided that if the purchaser should neglect or fail to comply with the said conditions, the deposit money should be forfeited and become the property of the vendor, who should retain the same to his own use as liquidated damages, and should be at liberty to resell the property; and that the deficiency on such resale, together with the charges attending the same, should, notwithstanding the forfeiture of the deposit as aforesaid, be made good by the purchaser, he agreeing so to do. That by the third of the said conditions of sale the purchaser was to pay down immediately a deposit of £20. per cent. in part of his purchase money, and to sign an agreement for the payment of the remainder on or before the 29th day of September then next, from which time he was to be entitled to the rents and profits; but should the completion of the purchase be delayed from any cause whatsoever beyond that period, the purchaser was to pay interest on the balance of his purchase money at the rate of £5. per cent. per annum from that time up to the time of actually completing his said purchase. And that the defendant Cutts neither completed his said purchase by the 29th day of September, 1835, nor paid any interest on his said purchase-money, nor in fact took any bond fide steps to complete the said purchase, but that he raised many frivolous objections to the title of defendant to the premises, and also divers objections which, by the express conditions of sale, he was precluded from making; and that Mr. Cox, his solicitor, after repeatedly pressing the defendant Cutts to complete his said purchase, and repeatedly giving him notice that if he failed so to do the said premises would be resold under the last of the said conditions of sale, did finally cause the same to be resold in the month of May, 1837, when the defendant Vickers purchased the same under the like conditions of sale as the same were purchased by the defendant Cutts, and especially under the same condition as to the forfeiture of the deposit on nonperformance of the conditions of sale, and with an addition to the 4th condition of sale, that no title should be required as to a certain small portion of land allotted under an inclosure act, or the land in respect of which it was allotted; and that the defendant Vickers has also forfeited his said deposit by refusing to complete his said purchase, which remained uncompleted; and that although the said defendant Cutts by his said bill prayed for an injunction to restrain him, the defendant Thodey, from proceeding in his said action against the said plaintiff, yet he never ventured to make any application for such injunction, in which case defendant would readily have submitted to have the whole question decided by the court, and he therefore felt himself compelled to resume, and did resume proceedings in, and was, until stopped by the order and injunction of the court prosecuting his said action at law against the said plaintiff, and that the said defendant Cutts took no proceeding in the said suit by moving for an injunction to restrain the defendant from proceeding in the said action, and did not reply to the defendant's answer until the 23rd of June last, when he filed a replication and served a subpoena to rejoin, but no witnesses had been examined; and that the said defendant Vickers had taken no steps towards determining the same question as to his deposit, and he submitted that he ought to be allowed to proceed in his said action for the recovery of the said deposits; and that if the defendants Cutts or Vickers wished to dispute the defendant's right to the said deposits, they ought to offer to be permitted to defend the said action at law in lieu of the said plaintiff; and that if they should decline so to do, then that the money in the hands of the said plaintiff ought to be paid over to the defendant forthwith, and that the said other defendants ought to be directed to pay to the defendant the costs of this suit, which has been occasioned by their claims upon the said forfeited deposits.

On the 8th of June, 1838, the plaintiff obtained the usual injunction order, and paid the deposits into court, and the amount was laid out in £3. per cent. Consols. The case now came on for hearing upon bill and answers.

Mr. Pemberton stated the case for the plaintiff.

Mr. Lee, for the defendant Cutts, contended that the sale to him was not forfeited; that he made a valid objection to the title, and denied that the plaintiff had any right to call upon him to interplead. He cited Crawshay v. Thornton. (a)

Lord LANGDALE.—That cause was on remitter.

Mr. Lee contended there must be a demand of the same thing to support a bill of interpleader: but that here that was not the case, as Cutts had no interest in Vickers's deposit, nor had Vickers any interest in Cutts's deposit, and cited Dunlop v. Angove, 2 Ves. I. 310. 308.

Mr. Heathfield followed on the same side, and contended there could be no interpleader between Cutts and Vickers.

Mr. Tinney, on the same side, contended that the plaintiff might have defended the action as to Vickers, because the deposit was only to be forfeited on breach in the conditions of sale—that the defendant Thodey was not in a situation to claim the deposit at law, and that the question must be whether the defendant Cutts is entitled to have his contract performed.

Mr. Rush, for the defendant Vickers, contended that the plaintiff had no right to call upon him to interplead, and cited Moore v.

(a) 9 Myl. & Cr. 1.

Isler, 7 Sim. 383.; Pearson v. Cardon, Russ. & My. 606.

Mr. Wood appeared for the defendant Thodey. He submitted to any order the Court should under the circumstances of the case think fit to make.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply, insisted upon the right of the plaintiff to call upon the parties to interplead, and denied that the defendants could now raise any objection, since they had consented to the money being paid into Court.

LORD LANGDALE, after stating the facts of the case to the payment of the second deposit by Mr. Vickers, observed neither of the purchasers having completed their purchase, and Mr. Thodey represented to the plaintiff that both had failed in doing so, and had consequently both forfeited their deposits, which he called upon Mr. Hoggart to pay over to him, upon refusal, he brought an action against him to recover them. Soon after this Mr. Cutts filed a bill against Mr. Thodey to compel a specific performance of the contract made with him, and Mr. Vickers gave Mr. Hoggart notice that he should hold him responsible in case the contract with him was not performed. In this conflict of interests, Mr. Hoggart filed the present bill, praying that the parties might interplead and settle the disputes between themselves, and asking leave to pay the money into Court, and for an injunction to restrain any further proceedings at law. Upon applying for the injunction, the defendants appeared, and consented that the money should be paid into court, and that the injunction should be granted. His Lordship then observed that the right of Mr. Cutts to a specific performance must be disposed of before the claim to £134. deposit could be settled, and upon that depended the next question, whether Mr. Vickers was entitled to the deposit money of £128. with a compensation for the breach of contract. In the present state of things it did not appear that he could make any order. The plaintiff ought to have some protection. None of the answers objected to the plaintiff's right to bring his bill, and he had reason therefore to expect no opposition; it is now however alleged that the plaintiff had brought himself into the difficulty. The parties had agreed to the arrangement which had been made respecting the payment of the money into court, and the granting the injunction, they therefore had no right to complain.

It is said the demand must be of some debt or duty, that here the defendant Cutts has no interest in the defendant Vickers's deposit, and that the latter defendant has no interest in the deposit of the former; that there is no question between Cutts and Vickers, nor between Thodey and either of them as to the whole amount, and even that till Cutts's claim is disposed of nothing can be done. Thodey insists that Cutts might defend the action, and as to the deposit this may be so, but not as to a specific performance. The first step towards ascertaining the rights of the parties is to enquire whether Cutts is entitled to a specific performance, and I think I ought not to determine any thing in the way of interpleader until that is determined; in the mean time, the plaintiff is not to be put to hazard by this complicated litigation.

His Lordship, after citing the observation of SIR WILLIAM GRANT in Angell v. Hadden (b) said, that having regard to the circumstances, and considering that the rights of the parties could not be ascertained, and that the questions were not ripe for decision, he thought the injunction ought to be continued, and ordered that the plaintiff should have his costs of the action and of this suit out of the fund in court, and that Mr. Cutts should proceed with his suit against Mr. Thodey: liberty reserved for all parties to apply as to the remainder of the fund in court and their costs of this suit.(1)

(1) An auctioneer cannot maintain a bill of interpleader, if he insist upon retaining out of the deposit either his commission or the auction duty, for interpleader is where the plaintiff is the holder of a stake, which is equally contested by the defendants, as to which the plaintiff is wholly indifferent between the parties, and the right to which will be fully settled by interpleader between the defendants. (Mitchell v. Hayne, 2 Sim. & Stu. 63.;) but as to the auction duty, see Farebrother v. Prattent, 5 Price, 303.

If upon a bill filed for an injunction, the Court order the deposit to be paid into Court, it will, it seems, be after deducting the auctioneer's charges and expenses (Annesley v. Muggridge, 1 Madd. 593.). Although perhaps this deserves re-consideration; for the purchaser's deposit may not ultimately be the fund out of which those charges are to be paid, but this is done without prejudice to any question as to so much of the deposit as is retained, (Yates v. Farebrother, 4 Madd. 239.).

Under the interpleader Act (1 & 2 W. 4, c. 58.) by which authority is given to a court of law to make such order between such defendant and the plaintiff, as to costs and other matters as may appear just and reasonable, the Court has gone the length of saying that in the first instance, upon application for a rule to interplead, the fund shall bear the costs, and the party in the wrong shall afterwards make up the fund (4 Bing. N. C. 723). This operates severely against the right of a purchaser entitled to a return of his deposit, see 1 Sug. Vend. & Pur. 76.

LANE V. BURGHART.

The defendant in this case was a tailor—the plaintiffs were creditors of General Bacon. In 1839 the plaintiffs arrested General Bacon for a debt of £275. and they had released him upon his executing a warrant of attorney for the amount of the debt, payable in four half-yearly instalments, upon the defendant guaranteeing their due payment, which he accordingly did. General Bacon did not make good his instalments, and a fiat in bankruptcy issued against the defendant, who obtained his certificate, after which the present action was brought against him by the plaintiffs for the debt of General Bacon, upon his guarantee. The defendant pleaded the fiat and his certificate in bar to the action which now came on for trial. The question therefore was, whether or not this was a debt, proveable under the commission and barred by the certificate. This point was reserved for the opinion of the court above, subject to which, the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount of one of the instalments and interest—viz., £74. 15s.

CASTLE V. IRVING.

MARINE POLICY OF INSURANCE—Whether the term "Sea-worthy" can admit of a qualification—Whether, if a ship is called "Sea-worthy" she ought not to be considered so for all purposes, whatever her cargo or voyage might be?

The plaintiff is a ship-owner; the defendant is the responsible officer of the ALLIANCE MARINE ASSURANCE COMPANY. The plaintiff had effected with that Company a policy of assurance on a brig named the Heath and her cargo from Liverpool to London. This vessel was subsequently lost, and the present action was brought upon the policy for £1000, which the Company had refused to pay. The defendant pleaded that the vessel was unseaworthy, and also that the plaintiff had concealed his knowledge of material facts from the defendant, by which the policy so effected would be invalidated, which latter issue was abandoned to-day, no evidence being offered thereon by the defendant, who relied upon the deficiency of the plaintiff's proof of the first issue, the burden of which was cast upon him. It appeared that the Heath had been built at Hiltop in 1832, and was repaired and re-coppered in 1838, after which she went to the coast of Africa; on her return from that voyage she was sold to the plaintiff for £1400. at Liverpool, his intention being to get her a cargo thence to London, where she might be fully repaired. While the cargo was being shipped, which consisted of soda ash, palm oil, and hides, the attention of the agent for Lloyd's was called to the state of the Heath, in consequence of which she was surveyed and reported to be wanting repairs, but not worthy for the voyage to London, with a cargo not liable to sea damage; in other words, cargo of a different nature from that partly delivered, the soda ash being soluble on the slightest tendency to leak, the result of which would be that if she met with bad weather, her equilibrium would be destroyed, and she would become unseaworthy and unmanageable. Notwithstanding this report, however, the Heath completed her cargo, and certain repairs being performed which were recommended by the surveyor, she put to sea on the 13th of December, 1839. In a few days, however, the weather proved foul, and eventually the report of the surveyor was verified. A heavy sea, shipped on the 16th, forced its way into the hold, the soda ash vanished through the pumps, which were kept constantly at work till the 18th, when the unfortunate vessel being gone wale deep in the water, her crew abandoned her and betook themselves on board another vessel and so reached the land in safety. Other witnesses, besides the surveyor, were examined by the plaintiff to prove the state of the vessel.

Sir F. Pollock, for the defendant, at first intimated his intention of calling witnesses, but the course was afterwards abandoned, and the case went to the jury upon the evidence of the plaintiff alone. He contended that upon the case as stood, the ship must be taken to have been utterly unseaworthy, and not unseaworthy.

Lord ABINGER said he could not exactly understand the meaning of a qualified seaworthy.

ness, as spoken of by the surveyor from Lloyd's, having been his opinion that if a ship was to be called seaworthy, she ought to be so for all purposes generally, whatever her cargo or voyage might be. The question, however, was for the jury to say, whether upon the evidence they thought the Heath, at the time she left Liverpool, was in a fit state to go to sea with such a cargo, and on that particular voyage.

Verdict for the plaintiff—damages £995.

COURT OF REVIEW—July 22.

IN RE BRITTEN.

ARREST.—PRACTICE.—Whether a person in attendance upon the Court as the husband of a petitioner, is privileged from arrest.

Mr. Swanston applied to the Court on behalf of Daniel Britten, the husband of Jane Britten, the petitioner, who had been arrested on a capias disfaciendum, within the precincts of the Court—that as the husband of the petitioner, and a party to the record, he was in attendance on the Court. The petition prayed his discharge.

Mr. Govett, solicitor for the applicant, and Frederick Wallbank, sheriff's officer, were sworn and examined as to the fact of the arrest. Sir G. ROSE said, the applicant was entitled to his discharge from custody as under the protection of the Court, not merely as the husband of the petitioner, but also a party to the petition. Sir J. CROSS said the applicant was neither a party nor a witness, and he knew of no case where a stranger had been discharged by the intervention of any Court. He did not say that he was inclined to oppose the application, but he was not ready to concur with his colleague, and thought the party entitled to instant discharge.

Sir G. ROSE said he had no hesitation in deeming him entitled to his discharge.

Sir J. CROSS said his mind was not free from doubt; but as his learned colleague had looked at the cases, he would, under all the circumstances, acquiesce.

ORDER made as prayed.

July 23.

The sheriff's officer appeared in court and said that the prisoner was discharged within a few hours from the issue of the order of the Court.

Sir J. CROSS said he had yesterday expressed doubt, and desired time for consideration; but he had consented to acquiesce in the order, though the party in question had not been in attendance on the Court professionally, nor as a party litigant, nor as a witness, and though there was no petition, no affidavit, and no notice, and it was stated to be a new case, wholly without precedent. Under such circumstances his acquiescence was reluctantly yielded. He had, since he consented, considered the point, and consulted authorities. Blackstone held that a party who had relation to a suit was protected from arrest (a). In "Ex parte King" (1), Lord Eldon had administered the oath to the officer, and ordered the party to be discharged. He felt it now his duty to say he was perfectly satisfied that the Court had acted yesterday in accordance with the cases he had cited.

Sir GEORGE ROSE expressed his satisfaction that his learned colleague had found he had acted in a right manner. He had had no doubt in the case, as Britten was decidedly a party having relation to the cause before the Court.

The COURT proceeded with the argument, which related to the payment of a dividend to Mrs. Britten out of her husband's estate.

(1) 7 Ves. 312.—LORD ELDON, in that case, (which was a similar application to that here reported) shewed very clearly the law upon this subject. His Lordship said, LORD ROSSLYN's orders were, that the party shall forthwith discharge him, and that seems to be right. There is this difference. Where the application is to affect only the creditor arresting, the Court may order the defendant to be discharged forthwith; but where there are other detainers, the Court must hear those persons, in order to see whether those detainers grow out of the original arrest. Accordingly, LORD ROSSLYN's order in the case from Bristol (ex parte Parker, 3 Ves. jun. 554, ex parte Hawkins, 4 Ves. jun. 691) was, that they do forthwith discharge him; and that is according to LORD HARDWICKE's recommendation to discharge the man from the arrest, intimating that if the party did not, the Court would order that he should do so; and that is the prudent course; for if the Chancellor has jurisdiction to order the discharge, and orders the discharge as the act of the party, there must be, of course,

(a) 3 Black. Com. 288, who says, "suitor's witnesses and other persons, necessarily attending any Courts of Record upon business, are not to be arrested during their actual attendance, which includes their necessary coming and going." See Mr. Christian's note to this passage.—id.—Ed.

an end of all further questions between the party and the sheriff. The case of Kinder v. Williams (4 Term. Rep. 377) does not decide any thing against this application, amounting only to this, that the case was not sufficiently laid before the Court to satisfy them, that the Commissioners of Bankrupt were a court of justice, upon which they state no opinion; and they refuse to interfere, the application not being made in the right place, the court to which the application was made not being a court of which any contempt was committed. LORD NORTHINGTON (see 2 Blacks. 1142) goes a great way to intimate that the Commissioners could themselves discharge, and it deserves great consideration before it is said the creditor shall not be protected; for if the law obliges a man, or gives him an opportunity to demand his debt in bankruptcy, and prescribes the particular mode of making that demand, and that mode requires his personal attendance before the Commissioners, the same protection is necessary as he would be entitled to in attending any suit of his own in a court of justice (Bromley v. Holland, 5 Ves. jun. 2—Moore v. Booth, 3 id. 350). But in this instance, it is not necessary to consider that; for this person, attending in obedience to the summons, if a creditor, stood also in the character of a witness (ex parte Lund, 6 Ves. j. 781). In a case before LORD HARDWICKE (ex parte Kerney, 1 Atk. 54), where an assignee removed, and ordered to account before the Commissioners, and to pay over the balance, was arrested attending the execution of that duty, LORD HARDWICKE, thinking it absolutely necessary, for the purposes of public justice, that he should attend the Commissioners, took it up with a very high hand, as a contempt of his authority, and ordered an examination upon interrogatories, intimating that the party must immediately discharge him. It is clear from Arding v. Flower, (8 Term Rep. 534) that, whatever was the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench before, they then thought the bankrupt's privilege (ex parte Donlevy, 7 Ves. j. 317—ex parte Parker, 3 id. 554.—ex parte Hawkins, 4 id. 691) not founded only upon the act of Parliament (5 Geo. 2 c. 30, s. 5), and I concur in that principle which would require protection for the bankrupt doing those duties; and there are several cases shewing that, without the authority of the act. The question then is, whether the same principle, that would, independent of the statute, protect the bankrupt, ought to protect the witness. In ex parte Ston, (2 Blacks. 1142), LORD NORTHINGTON contains no doubt, that the authority created by the assistance of the Court must have the power vested in them, and that has been followed; so that there is the authority of LORD HARDWICKE, NORTHINGTON, and ROSSLYN. In this case there being several detainers of persons, who found King in custody, I shall follow the order of LORD ROSSLYN in the case from Bristol; that the creditors having the opportunity of being heard, and being heard, or neglecting that opportunity, should follow with discharge the person out of custody. the original arrest cannot stand those detainers cannot stand. There is great good sense in that, for the Court ought to take care that the sheriff should not be left liable to an action, and under such an order it is their duty in obedience to the authority of the Court. I shall, therefore, order, that the several parties, who shall appear to have been served with notice of this motion, do forthwith discharge King out of custody.

The rest of the motion stood over, to give the officers an opportunity of answering the affidavits upon the circumstances of the case. They accordingly by affidavit declared that they arrested King in Guildhall; that he had got some way from it; and they supposed his examination was finished; and they were called upon suddenly for this purpose at Guildhall; and the attorney who he would indemnify them, and they were mind any paper King might shew as a protection.

LORD ELDON said—An attorney desiring an officer to do an act at all hazards is guilty of a contempt, if that person is guilty of a contempt; and no officer shall say, he is indemnified, if he advisedly acts contumaciously to the authority of any Court. Officers must understand, that it is impossible for any person to indemnify them against a contempt. Let the attorney, therefore, make an affidavit.

An affidavit by the attorney was read, admitting, that he told the officer he would indemnify him; but that he merely meant by that to assure the officer, that what he was to do was legal, and to prevent him from being intimidated.

LORD ELDON said the conduct of the attorney was rash; but he did not intend a contempt. An indemnity against the consequences of a contempt is very different from an indemnity against any thing of damage. I should pause long before I should determine, that if the creditor was attending merely to prove his debt, and not upon a summons, he should not be privileged; that being the only way, in which in the case of a bankruptcy, he can sue. Upon the affidavits it does not appear, that the officers were aware that they were acting in contempt of the Court; and the authority, under which they acted, is a considerable alleviation of their conduct. Though I have not the least doubt, that a person attending the commissioners, particularly under a summons, has this protection, and I agree entirely with Lord Kenyon, in Arding v. Flower, yet there has been doubt upon the subject; and the language in the report of Kinder v. Williams is loose. Therefore, letting it now be perfectly understood that this must not happen again, I will not go farther than to order all the costs out of pocket to be paid by the attorney and the two officers.—S. C. 7 Ves. un. 313.

Summer Assizes.

NOTTINGHAM.—August 3.

Special Jury.

BROYAN v. UNWIN, ESQ. AND OTHERS.

CHALLENGING a SPECIAL JUROR for not being indifferent between the parties in the cause—When is the proper time for making the challenge—Whether a special juror can be challenged like any common juror for cause arising or becoming known to the parties after the special jury was struck—TRIAL of the JUROR—CHARTISTS—Right of a MAGISTRATE to search for, and take fire-arms from all persons of suspicious character, or not qualified to have them.

This was an action of Trespass. The plaintiff is a frame-work knitter, residing at Sutton on Ashfield, and the defendant Unwin, is a magistrate of the county, the other defendants are Samuel Willey, Samuel Short, and Thomas Shippam, constables acting under Mr. Unwin's directions. The trespass complained of, and for which the plaintiff sought damages, was that in the evening of the 12th of August, 1839, the defendants, accompanied by a large detachment of military, surrounded his house between seven and nine o'clock, and the defendants broke and entered the house, the military being stationed outside, disturbed and alarmed the plaintiff's family, and searched and ransacked the house without justifiable cause, and took away letters and papers belonging to the plaintiff. The case was tried here at the last assizes before Lord Denman, but the jury, not being able to agree, were discharged without giving a verdict, and was now brought on again.

After eight of the special jurors had answered to their names and were in the box, and the ninth was entering.

Mr. Sergeant Adams objected to him as not being indifferent between the parties. The ground of challenge was, that the gentleman was in a public-house in the town in the course of the morning, and, after drinking two or three glasses of Sherry there, he said, speaking with reference to this cause, that "He was to be on the jury, and he had a bottle of Sherry in his pocket, and he would sooner die than not give judgment against Mr. Unwin."

Mr. Hill objected to any challenge to the jury in that stage of the proceeding. The time for challenging special jurors was when the parties were striking the jury. A list of 48 was made out by the sheriff for every special jury. A copy of the list was furnished to each of the parties to the cause. Each of them struck off 12, and of the remaining 24, the first twelve that answered to their names, when called in court to be sworn, were the jurors to try the cause, unless some of them did not answer, in which case either party might pray a tales.(a) The time to challenge the special jury was passed, and there was no instance of such challenge; indeed, there was an instance to the contrary within his own recollection, in which the defendant challenged a special juror as he was coming to be sworn, and, after argument, the objection was over-ruled.

Mr. Sergeant Adams referred to a case which occurred at Lincoln about 21 years ago, in which a challenge was allowed to a juror as he entered the jury-box, and triers were appointed to try whether he stood indifferent between the parties.

Mr. Humfrey referred to another case in the Court of Exchequer about a year ago, in which the challenge was allowed; and he and Mr. Sergeant Adams argued that it was competent to challenge special jurors for cause arising after the special jury was struck. Any rule to the contrary would be unreasonable and absurd.

LITTLEDALE, J. admitted the challenge.

Mr. Hilditch, the clerk of assizes, and Mr. Saxon, the under-sheriff, were then sworn to try whether the juror stood indifferent between the parties to the cause.

A witness stated he saw the gentleman pull a bottle of Sherry out of his pocket, and heard him make use of the words before stated.

The triers declared that the gentleman was not indifferent to the parties in the cause, and he was dismissed.

Mr. Hill, after explaining to the jury what occurred, said he was glad that there was now a decision on the point. He had always thought it absurd that a special juror could not be challenged like any other juror, for cause arising or becoming known to the parties after the special jury was struck. His only object in resisting the challenge was to come to a decision on the point. He then proceeded to state the circumstances of the plaintiff's complaint. The plaintiff was an humble and industrious man, who brought up his family in comfort, and carried on business as a framework knitter. Mr. Unwin was a magistrate. Under pretence of searching for arms in plaintiff's house, he surrounded it with soldiers on the night of the 12th of August last year, and accompanied by the three other defendants, without warrant or other lawful authority, but at Mr. Unwin's pleasure, entered the plaintiff's dwelling-house, which was commonly called an "Englishman's castle." They ransacked every room in the house. They opened and searched every drawer. They found no arms, but they found letters and papers, most of which Mr. Unwin collected together in a pocket-handkerchief, and carried away, saying, after perusing one, that "that was the very thing that he wanted." So under the pretence of coming in search of arms his real object was, as he said, to come for the plaintiff's papers. He challenged the counsel for the defendant to point out any law that authorised this conduct of Mr. Unwin. It was impossible to produce any law to justify such conduct.

Witnesses were called to speak to these facts, but the counsel for the defendants admitted most of them.

After a short discussion between counsel on both sides, a verdict of Not guilty was taken for the three constables, on the ground that it was their duty to obey Mr. Unwin's directions, given personally, although without warrant.

Mr. Sergeant Adams then stated the case for Mr. Unwin, the only remaining defendant. He said the jury well remembered that great anxiety was felt by the Government on the intended sacred month proclaimed by the chartists to begin on the 12th of August last. A circular was sent by Lord John Russell, then Secretary of State for the Home Department, to the lords lieutenant of counties, and to the magistrates generally, urging them to search for and take fire-arms from all persons of suspicious character, or not qualified to have them. Mr. Unwin received such a circular. He and the other magistrates met frequently, and passed resolutions. The district of Mansfield and Sutton was over-run with chartists, and the plaintiff was an avowed chartist, in correspondence with some of the leaders; and, like some of them, he ought to have been put on his trial for sedition long ago. So suspected was the neighbourhood of Mansfield at the time, that the Secretary of State sent companies of soldiers to be at the service of the magistrates there. The learned counsel read the Secretary of State's circular, and the resolutions entered into by the magistrates; he then produced and read at great length some of the papers taken from the plaintiff's house on the 12th of August, consisting chiefly of a correspondence between him and one Pitkeithley, partly on the business of the plaintiff, but mostly on politics, in which Pitkeithley used language of the most exciting and seditious nature, urging the plaintiff to rouse the working people against their tyrants, the aristocracy, the idle monopolisers and arrogant consumers of the good things produced by the labour of the industrious classes, who were justified in taking from their oppressors whatever was necessary to supply their wants. There was also found in plaintiff's house a large printed placard, signed by the committee and leaders of the chartists, and by C. M. Pitkeithley among others, setting forth grievances, and prescribing what should be done. Witnesses proved the state of the country and the resolutions of the justices in August last.

Verdict for the plaintiff, Damages not found.

THE REGENCY BILL.

4 VICT.

An Act to provide for the Administration of the Government, in case the Crown should descend to any Issue of her Majesty whilst such Issue shall be under the Age of Eighteen Years, and for the care and guardianship of such Issue.

Whereas your Majesty, by your Majesty's royal message to both Houses of Parliament, has been pleased to state that the uncertainty of human life, and the deep sense your Majesty feels of duty to your people, rendered it incumbent on your Majesty to recommend to both Houses of Parliament to consider contingencies which may hereafter take place, and to make such provision as will, in any event, secure the exercise of the Royal Authority; and that your Majesty would be prepared to concur with the two Houses of Parliament in those measures which may appear best calculated to maintain unimpaired the power and dignity of the Crown, and thereby to strengthen the securities which protect the rights and liberties of your people: And whereas, with the most cordial sense of duty and gratitude to your Majesty for the tender concern and regard uniformly and now more especially demonstrated for the happiness of your people and the security of their rights and liberties, we have taken this most important business into our consideration, and being thoroughly convinced of the wisdom and expediency of what your Majesty has thought fit to recommend, we are firmly and resolutely determined to contribute every thing in our power to maintain unimpaired the power and dignity of the Crown, and to strengthen the securities which protect the rights and liberties of the people:

We, therefore, your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal, Commons, in Parliament assembled,

Do most humbly beseech your Majesty, that it may be enacted: And be it enacted, by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that if at the demise of her present Majesty (whom God long preserve) there shall be no issue of her said Majesty who shall become and be King or Queen of this realm whilst under the age of eighteen years, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, the consort of her said Majesty, shall be guardian, and shall have the care, tuition, and education of such issue, until such issue shall attain the age of eighteen years, and shall till such time have the disposition, ordering and management of all matters and things relating thereto; and his Royal Highness Prince Albert shall, until such issue of her said Majesty shall attain the age of eighteen years, and no longer, have full power and authority, in the name of such issue, and in his or her stead, and under the style and title of Regent of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, to exercise and administer, according to the laws and constitution thereof, the royal power and government of this realm, and all the dominions, countries, and territories to the Crown thereof belonging, and use and exercise and perform all prerogatives, authorities, and acts of government and administration of government which belong to the King or Queen of this realm to use, execute and perform, according to the laws thereof, but in such manner and subject to such conditions, restrictions, limitations and regulations as are hereinafter for that purpose specified, mentioned, and contained.

And be it further enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that all acts of royal power, prerogative, government, and administration of government, of what nature or kind soever, which shall be done or executed during the Regency established by this act, otherwise than by and with the consent and authority of the said Regent, in the manner and according to the direction of this act set forth and prescribed, shall be absolutely null and void to all intents and purposes.

And be it further enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that the Regent, before he shall act or enter upon his said office of Regent, shall take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, in the form prescribed and required by an act passed in the first year of the reign of King William and Queen Mary, intituled, "An Act for abrogating the oaths of supremacy and allegiance, and appointing other oaths," and shall also take the oath of abjuration, in such manner and form as is set down and prescribed in an Act passed in the sixth year of the reign of King George the Third, intituled, "An Act for altering the oath of abjuration and assurance, and for amending so much of an Act of the seventh year of her late Majesty Queen Anne, intituled, 'An Act for the improvement of the Union of the two kingdoms,' as after the time therein limited requires the delivery of certain lists and copies therein mentioned to persons indicted of high treason or misprision of treason," as also the following oath: (that is to say)

"I do solemnly promise and swear, that I will truly and faithfully execute the office of Regent of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, according to an Act of Parliament made in the fourth year of her Majesty Queen Victoria, intituled, 'An Act to provide for the administration of the Government, in case the Crown should descend to any issue of her Majesty whilst such issue shall be under the age of eighteen years, and for the care and guardianship of such issue;' and that I will administer the government of this realm, and of all the dominions thereunto belonging, according to the laws, customs and statutes thereof, and will in all things, to the utmost of my power and ability, consult and maintain the safety, honour and dignity of his or her [as the case shall require] Majesty, and the welfare of his or her [as the case shall require] people. "So help me God."

"I do faithfully promise and swear, that I will inviolably maintain and preserve the settlement of the true Protestant religion, with the government, discipline, rights, and privileges of the Church of Scotland, as established by law. "So help me God."

Which oaths shall be taken before the Privy Council then in being, who are hereby empowered and required to administer the same, and to enter the same in the council books.

And be it further enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that it shall not be law for the King or Queen of this realm, for whom a Regent is hereby appointed, to intermarry before his or her age of eighteen years, with any person whomsoever, without the consent, in writing, of the Regent, and the assent of both Houses of Parliament previously obtained; and every marriage without such consent, and such assent of the two Houses of Parliament, shall be null and void to all intents and purposes; and every person who shall be acting, aiding, abetting, or concerned in obtaining, procuring, or bringing about any such marriage, and the person who shall be so married to such King or Queen under the age of eighteen years, shall be guilty of high treason, and suffer and forfeit as in cases of high treason.

Provided always, and be it further enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that the Regent shall not give or have power to give the royal assent to any bill or bills in Parliament for repealing, changing, or in any respect varying from the order and course of succession to the Crown of this realm as the same stands now established by the Act of the twelfth year of the reign of King William the Third, intituled, "An Act for the further limitation of the Crown, and better securing the rights and liberties of the subject," or to any Act for repealing or altering the Act made in the thirteenth year of the reign of King Charles the Second, intituled, "An Act for the uniformity of public prayers and administration of sacraments, and other rights and ceremonies, and for establishing the form of making, ordaining, and consecrating bishops, priests and deacons, in the Church of England," or an Act of the fifth year of the reign of Queen Anne, made in Scotland, intituled, "An Act for securing the Protestant religion and Presbyterian government."

Provided always, and be it further enacted, That if his said Royal Highness Prince Albert shall, at any time after becoming such guardian and Regent, be reconciled to or shall hold communion with the See or Church of Rome, or shall profess the Popish religion, or shall marry a person professing the Roman Catholic religion, or shall cease to reside in or absent himself from the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, then and in any of such cases his said Royal Highness shall no longer be guardian and Regent, and all the powers and authorities which he may have derived under and by virtue of this Act shall thenceforth cease and determine.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS.

It is not our intention in future to occupy the space of this journal, which may be devoted to more useful purposes, with any notices of bills in progress through Parliament. The daily journals give timely information so as to put most persons on their guard, and we find many reform schemes of all sorts, which become in the end abortions, that we think it waste of time and space to take any notice of them. When a new law is made, our Subscribers shall have it.

ESSAY.

ON THE ENGLISH LAW OF BAILMENTS.

CARRIERS BY WATER.

WE have defined the exceptions from responsibility, "The Act of God and Perils of the Sea." We will now enquire what are and what are not losses by "THE KING'S ENEMIES," or by "RESTRAINTS of PRINCES and RULERS."

By "the King's enemies" is to be understood public enemies, with whom the nation itself is at open war; and not merely robbers, thieves, or other private depredators, however much they may be deemed in a moral sense at war with society. Losses, therefore, which are occasioned by robbery on the highway, or by the depredations and violence of mobs, rioters, and insurgents, and other felons, are not deemed losses by enemies within the meaning of the exception (a);

(a) See Jones's Bailments, 103.; Morse v. Slue, 1 Vent. 190, 238.

or it may be understood as IRRESISTIBLE FORCE by such an interposition of human agency—as is, from its nature and power, absolutely uncontrollable. “Nisi hoc esset statutum, materia daretur cum furibus adversus eos, quos recipiunt, coeundi, cum ne nunc quidem abstineant hujusmodi fraudibus” (b). But the word fures here means thieves only, and not robbers, who come with a superior and irresistible force; they are called latrones. A partner who has the care of the joint property is not answerable, “si id latrocinio aut incendio perierit,” but he is answerable, “si a furibus subreptum sit” (c), upon which Gothofred observes, “adversus latrones parum prodest custodia; adversus fures prodesse potest, si quis advigilet. Latrocinium fatale damnum, seu casus fortuitus est; at non furtum” (d). The English Law is more strict in the case of carriers than the civil law; but it is said to have been the same formerly, and not to have charged a carrier in the case of robbery, unless he travelled by dangerous ways, or at unseasonable hours. Robbery by force is deemed irresistible. Robbery (rapina) is, by civil law, defined to be the violent taking from the person of another against his will, of money, or goods, for the sake of gain (e). By the English common law it is defined to be a felonious and violent taking of money or goods from the person of another, putting him in fear, let the value of the thing taken be what it will, above or under one shilling (f), and a loss by robbers or pirates is considered to be a loss by irresistible force. “Si furtum committatur in mari per piratas et latrones, tunc inter casus fortuitos connumeratur (g).” Pirates are indeed universally treated as the common enemies of all mankind, and are subjected to punishment accordingly. Capture by pirates does not divest the property of the owner; but capture by an enemy, in the exercise of war between two nations, does, according to the law of nations, wholly divest the property of the owner, and transfer it to the captor, or the sovereign of his state, at some period (h).

In some cases the insurance is against capture only—and here we must distinguish what is capture from the perils of the sea. This was determined in Green and others v. Elmslie (i), where a carrier ship, while on her voyage, was driven by a gale of wind on the coast of France, and was there captured by the enemy. She did not receive any damage from the wind, and it was attempted to be made out that this was a loss by perils of the sea, and not by capture. Lord KENYON, however, said the case was too clear to admit of argument, it was clearly a loss by capture, for had the ship been driven on any other coast but that of an enemy, she would have been in perfect safety. But suppose that she should be first stranded on the coast by the gale, and in consequence thereof should be afterwards captured by the inhabitants? In that case, it seems, that it would be deemed a loss, not by capture, but by the perils of the sea, upon the same principle, for the gale is the proximate cause of the stranding (k).

“The Restraint of Princes and Rulers,” commonly mentioned in charter parties as an exception or excuse for the non-performance of the contract on the part of the master, is to be understood of an actual, and not of an expected restraint, although the expectation may be reasonable and well grounded, and the master may act upon it with fair and honest intentions (l). This was decided in the following case. The British ship Adelphi was chartered for a voyage from London to Petersburg, or as near thereto as she could safely get, then to load a complete cargo of hemp, and of iron for ballast, and proceed therewith to Woolwich and London, and there deliver the same, on being paid freight at certain rates per ton (restraint of princes and rulers during the said voyage always excepted): thirty running days to be allowed the merchant for loading. Under this contract the ship sailed to Cronstadt (the port of Petersburg), and there took in iron for ballast and a certain quantity of hemp; and the master was proceeding, with all due diligence, to load his full cargo of hemp, by screwing it down in the usual way, when about the 9th day, a rumour was circulated of an embargo being about to be laid by the Russian Government on all British vessels, and the person who was agent for the British factory at Cronstadt, and agent also to the house at Petersburg, who were the agents to the merchant-charterer of this ship, in consequence of instructions received from the British consul-general at Petersburg, desired the captains of such British vessels as were ready to proceed to sea, to do so as soon as possible, as he expected an embargo might take place immediately. In consequence of this, the master gave orders to leave off screwing down hemp, and to fill the ship as fast as possible by hand; and the whole day was employed in this way, and the ship filled as far as could be done by hand. In the evening the ship sailed with something more than half the cargo that she could have carried if the hemp had been screwed down: the merchant had a sufficient quantity of hemp for a full cargo lying by the ship's side in lighters. Many other British vessels sailed the same evening, or the next morning, without full cargoes; some, however, remained, and afterwards completed their lading, and were not detained by the Russian Government. No embargo was, in fact, imposed until six weeks after this time: the ship would have completed her loading within that period.

The master sailed away without any communication with the defendant's agents at Petersburg, who came to Cronstadt, as soon as they had notice of the circumstances, with intention to stop the ship, but arrived too late. The master acted bona fide, and as an honest man, and there was reasonable and well grounded apprehension for his acting as he did. The goods taken on board were brought to London, and there delivered to the merchant. The merchant sued the master for not bringing a complete cargo, according to his contract. It was argued that the master was excused, either by the operation of this clause in the contract, or by that general principle of law, which requires every subject, as a matter of public duty, to save the property and persons entrusted to his charge from falling into the hands of the enemies of his country. But the Court held, that neither of these grounds furnished an excuse in the particular circumstances of this case.

Lord Ellenborough said, "It has been contended that the exception contained in this contract, of restraint of princes and rulers during the voyage, excuses the not taking on board a complete cargo in this case; but, without considering whether this provision respecting restraint of princes, &c., be at all applicable by way of excuse for the non-performance of this part of the master's stipulated duty, viz.:—the taking on board a complete cargo, yet, at any rate, the restraint meant must be an actual and operative restraint, and not a merely expected and contingent one, as this at most only was. But it has been further argued by the defendant's counsel, that supposing the master, in respect of his express contract, not to be otherwise justifiable in regard to the freighter, yet that he is so at any rate on the ground of his paramount duty to the state, which required him to save the property and crew under his charge from the impending peril of an instantly expected embargo; and that in every private contract, however express in its terms, there is always a reservation to be implied for the performance of a public duty, in which the interest of the state is materially involved. That no contract can properly be carried into effect which was originally made contrary to the provisions of law, or which being made consistently with the rules of law at the time, has become illegal in virtue of some subsequent law, are propositions which admit of no doubt. Neither can it be questioned that if from a change in the political relations and circumstances of this country, with reference to any other contracts which were fairly and lawfully made at the time they have become incapable of being any longer carried into effect without derogating from the clear public duty which a British subject owes to his sovereign and the state of which he is a member; the non-performance of a contract in a state so circumstanced is not only excusable, but a matter of peremptory duty,—an obligation on the part of the subject. But in order to found this new public duty, which is to supersede the performance of his former private one, it is necessary that an actual change in the political relations of the two countries should have taken place, and that the danger to result to the public interest of his own country from an observance of the contract, should be clear, immediate, and certain. In short, such a state of circumstances must be shewn to exist as that the contract is no longer capable of being performed by him without criminal compromise of his public duty. Can anything of this kind be said with truth to exist in the present case? No actual change in the political relations of Great Britain and Russia had then taken place. The danger to result from remaining at Cronstadt was neither immediate or certain; in point of fact, it attached only at the distance of many weeks afterwards; and no one can venture to suggest, even in argument, that the loading in question might not have been completed without any criminal compromise of public duty. Indeed, to allow a man to withdraw himself from the performance of a distinct positive contract, upon the ground of some speculative inconvenience, suggested as likely to result from such performance to the general interests of the state, would afford great encouragement to disingenuous subtleties, and refinements upon subjects of this kind, and would render all reliance upon the solemn stipulation of parties in commercial matters precarious and insecure; and which encouragement this Court would most reluctantly lend its assistance to administer. For the reasons already given such an argument has no foundation to rest upon in the present case. Therefore, neither upon this ground, any more than upon the others already considered, is the plaintiff precluded from a right to recover." (m)

PROBLEM XVI.—VOL. IV.

COVENANTS.

PERSONAL REPRESENTATIVES. — How are EXECUTORS or ADMINISTRATORS affected by Covenants made by or in favour of their testator or intestates?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LEGAL GUIDE.
ANSWER TO PROBLEM 4. —VOL. 4.

CONTRACTS—VENDOR AND PURCHASER.

In what cases will equity permit the contracting parties to make time the essence of the contract?

Time will, in equity, be deemed of the essence of the contract in all cases where it can be collected from the terms of the contract, that the parties intended that the time for its completion should be strictly adhered to. But where, upon an agreement for the purchase of an estate, the parties entered into a stipulation, that an abstract of title should be delivered immediately, and that in case the contract was not completed by a given day, the purchaser should be released from his contract, and the abstract was not immediately delivered, but communications on the subject of the title were continued between the parties until the time limited by the contract had expired—held that under the circumstances the benefit of the stipulation as to time was waived by the purchaser. Hipwell v. Knight, 1 You. & Coll. 401.

(m) Atkinson v. Ritchie, 10 Ch. 222.

For a long time it was considered that equity would not admit of a stipulation, making time the essence of the contract. LORD ELDON found this to be the case when he entered the Court (see 1 Jac. & Walk. 420.); but his Lordship successfully combated it (see 7 Ves. 265.); and the rule is now well established, that, even in equity, time may be made the essence of the contract. Levi v. Lindo, 3 Mer. 81.; Withy v. Cottle, 1 Turn. 79. But it is not decided that where there is no special stipulation to that effect, it can be made so by a subsequent notice that it will be so considered. Reynolds v. Nelson, 6 Mad. 26.

Time may be made the essence of the contract, but may be waived by conduct, Hudson v. Bertram, 3 Mad. 449. as the right to a strict performance may be clearly waived at law. Carpenter v. Blandford, 8 Barn. & Cress. 575 (1).

Time is of the essence of the contract, where the subject of contract is of a nature liable to daily fluctuations in value, as a transferable government security, Doblet v. Rothschild 1 Sim. & Stu. 590. or the value of which is daily diminishing, and which is liable to immediate determination, as a life annuity, Withy v. Cottle; or in which the purchaser's object would generally be defeated by delay, as the sale of a manufactory or commercial establishment, Wright v. Howard, 1 Sim. & Stu. 190.; or the good-will of a public house, Coslake v. Till, 1 Russ. 380. In such cases it is obvious that adequate compensation cannot be given by the application of the ordinary rule upon which the Court acts; and the laches of the vendor, therefore, discharges the purchaser. But the mere allegation of the purchaser, that he wanted the estate for a place of residence, has been held not to be sufficient to make the time stipulated for the delivery of possession essential. Boehm v. Wood, 1 Jac. & Walk. 419.

In all the preceding cases, the complaint of delay proceeds from the purchaser. The case of a sale of a reversion, however, presents a contrary case, (being the exact converse of an annuity). Such a sale is usually made under the pressure of embarrassment, for the purpose of obtaining immediate pecuniary aid; and the contract, therefore, could not be enforced by a purchaser who was not ready with his money on the day. Newman v. Rodgers, 4 Bro. C. C. 391

R. J. T.

We have also an answer to this Problem by E. A., in which he says:—

The latest decided case on this subject, I believe, is that of Taylor v. Brown, before the Master of the Rolls, in November last, who is reported to have held, that where time is not of the essence of a contract to purchase, and the contract is to be performed within a time which is undefined, and unnecessary delay is occasioned by one party in completing his title, the other has a right to limit the time for the completion thereof—and where time is not of the essence of the contract, and no notice of a limited time for a completion of the title is given by the purchaser, but negotiations take place between the solicitors of the vendor and purchaser, with reference to the title, and then the purchaser, whilst the vendor is endeavouring to procure and adduce more satisfactory evidence of the title, suddenly by letter declares that the contract is at an end. That the purchaser was bound to complete this contract, on a good title being shewn, and he was ordered to pay the costs of the suit up to the hearing, the litigation up to the hearing having arisen out of the question, not whether a good title had been shewn, but whether the defendant's letter did or did not put an end to the contract.

TITHES.

RATING THEM TO THE RELIEF OF THE POOR.

CIRCULAR LETTER from the SECRETARY to the POOR LAW COMMISSIONERS to the Churchwardens and Overseers through the Kingdom.

“Poor Law Commission-office, Somerset-house.

“Gentlemen,—The judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench has been delivered in the case of “The Queen v. the Hon. and Rev. William Capel, Clerk.” The Court has decided that the tithe-owner is to be rated for his tithes, upon the same estimate of their net annual value as is provided for all other rateable hereditaments, by the 1st section of the Parochial Assessment Act (6 and 7 William IV., cap. 96) and that the tithe-owner is not entitled, under the proviso in that section, to any deduction or allowance corresponding with the profits of occupiers of lands, houses, &c.

“While the question as to the extent of the tithe-owners' responsibility was in dispute, and with a view to prevent unnecessary litigation in the multitude of appeals which were then to be apprehended, the Poor-Law Commissioners recommended, by a minute of the 8th of September, 1838, that a single case should be selected in some one parish for argument, and that in all other parishes provisional arrangements should be adopted between the overseers and the tithe-owners, which would allow of an eventual settlement of the payments to be made by the tithe-owners in conformity with the principle of any decision which might be obtained upon the selected case.

(1) But where the contract is under seal, a subsequent agreement not under seal made before breach of the agreement, enlarging the time for performance of the contract, is invalid at law (Ripplinghall v. Lloyd, 2 New. & Man. 410.) And in Stowell v. Robinson, (3 Bing. N.C. 928.) where the agreement was not under seal, it was determined that a subsequent parol agreement to alter or enlarge the time is void.—ED.

"The case of 'The Queen v. Capel' was eventually selected to try the question in dispute, and in accordance with the recommendation contained in the minute of the Poor Law Commissioners, the rates were in many parishes laid on the net annual value of tithes, and a portion only of such rates was collected, an arrear being allowed to remain proportionate to the amount of the deduction which the tithe-owners claimed.

"But rates on the whole net annual value being now, by the decision in the case of 'The Queen v. Capel,' determined to be correct, it has become the duty of overseers to proceed to collect from the tithe-owners any arrears which may have been allowed to accrue; and in future rates to assess the tithe-owners on the whole net annual value, and to collect the whole rate so assessed.

"By order of the Board,

"EDWIN CHADWICK, Secretary.

"To the Churchwardens and Overseers of the Poor."

VICE-CHANCELLOR'S COURT—July 20.

WILLIAMS AND OTHERS v. THE EARL OF JERSEY.

NUISANCE.—ACQUIESCENCE.—INJUNCTION to restrain ACTION at LAW.—DEMURRER for want of Equity.

The plaintiffs in this case filed their bill against the defendant for a decree for quiet enjoyment of certain copper works, and to restrain the defendant from proceeding with an action at law.

It appeared by the bill that by a lease, dated the 25th March, 1736, made between Bussey Mansell of the one part, and Thomas Coster, Joseph Percival, Samuel Percival, and Henry Barnes, of the other part, certain lands situate in the parish of Lamsamlet, in the county of Glamorgan, part of the Briton Ferry estate, were demised to the last named parties for 51 years, subject, among other covenants on the part of the lessees, to a covenant to build one new copper smelting house for smelting, making, and refining of copper, or any other metals, and to contain 202 furnaces at the least, and another covenant to deliver up the demised premises at the end of the term in a sufficient state and condition for smelting, making, and refining of copper or other metals, by them usually made. The lessor covenanted to allow the lessees to dig on his land for clay to make bricks, required for the furnaces, or for erecting new furnaces, or other conveniences for smelting copper, and also to supply them with coal for the works. Under this lease the White Rock Copper Works were erected and established, and the smelting of copper ores and the manufacture of copper had been ever since carried on at the White Rock Works to the present time. The Earl of Jersey was seized of the White Rock Copper Works, as part of the Briton Ferry estate to 1818, when he sold it to the present owners. By another lease, bearing date the 1st day of September, 1755, and made between Louisa Barbara Mansell, of the one part and Chauncey Townsend of the other part, and which is recited in and confirmed by Act of Parliament, 8 Geo. 3, certain other hereditaments, situate on the river Tawe; also, part of the said Briton Ferry estate were demised to the said Chauncey Townsend for 99 years, for the purpose of erecting copper works thereon, in pursuance of which the Middle Bank Works were erected, and are now held under the defendant, George Earl of Jersey, who became seized or entitled to the reversion and inheritance as part of the said Briton Ferry estate. On the 25th March, 1828, the defendant himself executed one or more leases of the said Middle Bank Copper Works and of the Upper Bank Copper Works, with full liberty to the lessees to make and erect any new works or buildings for the smelting of copper ores and the manufacture of copper as they might see fit. The said White Rock Copper Works, the said Middle Bank Copper Works, and the said Upper Bank Copper Works, are respectively situate on Kilrey Bank, and considerable competition in the trade and manufacture of copper had existed between the works of the plaintiffs and those held by tenants of the defendant, and that for more than 100 years it had been the established custom at Swansea and the neighbourhood to allow the erection of copper works, and the use and practice of smelting of copper ores therein without any restriction whatever, and without any complaint on the ground of any alleged nuisance being committed thereby; and that although the said copper works of the plaintiffs had been extended, and the manufacture of copper there greatly increased of late years, yet by the erection of chimnies and other processes the quantity of smoke and vapour arising therefrom, and which was alleged by the said defendant, had increased and corrupted his farms and lands, which had been prevented from increasing. It also appeared that the plaintiffs had, for several years, occupied other works and manufactories for the smelting of copperat Swansea, called the Rose Works, the Landore Works, and the Morfa Works. The Rose Works were erected in 1780, and were standing upon land formerly belonging to John Bennett Popkin, Esq., deceased, then of Charles Calland, Esq., deceased, and then of the trustees of his will; and that the Landore Works were erected also in 1780, and were standing upon land formerly and now belonging to the same person respectively, jointly with the Duke of Beaufort; and that the Morfa Works were standing upon land belonging to the Duke of Beaufort, all which copper works are situate on the right or Swansea bank of the river Tawe; and that they entered into the possession and occupation of the Rose Works in the year 1821, and the Landore Works in the year 1838, and that in 1830 they erected the Morfa Works, and have ever since been in the occupation thereof, and had carried on the process of smelting copper ores and the manufacture of copper. That the defendant, George Earl of Jersey, since 1814, had been seised of the Briton Ferry estate, situate on the left or Kilvey bank of the said river Tawe, and on the side of the river opposite to that of the plaintiffs' copper works, and claimed title to the Briton Ferry estate through the said Bussey Mansell, afterwards Lord Mansell, deceased; and that the smelting of copper ores or the manufacture of copper had been practised and carried on at the said works ever since the erection thereof, down to the present time, by tenants of the said Bussey Mansell, and the several persons claiming under him, including the defendant, George Earl of Jersey, and the enlargement of such works had at various times been matter of actual contract, to which the aforesaid predecessors in estate of the said defendant had been parties, and the plaintiffs and their predecessors in the said Rose Works and the Landore Works were induced by the acquiescence of the said defendant, George Earl of Jersey, and of his predecessors in title and estate, in the erection and establishment of the said last mentioned copper works, and in the smelting of copper ores, and the manufacture of copper therein, to lay out very large sums of money in the improvement and extension of the said works, and in the machinery employed therein, and such expenditure, whilst the same was in progress, was well known to the said defendant, George Earl of Jersey, and his said predecessors in title and estate. That the said copper works, called the Morfa Works, are erected upon land of the Duke of Beaufort, which was derived by way of exchange by virtue of indentures of lease and release from the predecessor of the defendant, and are by indenture, bearing date the 21st of May, 1810, and made between Charles Smith and Henry Smith, of the one part, and Henry Charles Duke of Beaufort, of the other part. After reciting a lease dated the 1st of January, 1808, and made between George Lord Vernon (a predecessor of the defendant), of the one part, and Charles Smith and Henry Smith, of the other part, whereby a messuage, lands, and hereditaments were demised for 99 years, determinable upon the death of the survivor of three lives, at the yearly rent of £2.; and reciting that part of the last mentioned land and premises being a convenient spot for the purpose of erecting copper works, the said Charles Smith and Henry Smith had agreed with the said Duke to underlease the same to him for that purpose, and reciting that for the mutual convenience of the said Duke of Beaufort, and the said George Lord Vernon, and the Hon. William Augustus Henry Villiers Mansell, who was then entitled to the reversion of the said premises in fee simple, expectant on the death of the said George Lord Vernon, it had been agreed between them to exchange the hereditaments thereby intended to be demised for other lands and hereditaments belonging to the said Duke of Beaufort, lying intermixed with the lands of the said George Lord Vernon and William Augustus Henry Villiers Mansell, in the parish of Lansamlet, in the said county of Glamorgan, the said Charles Smith and Henry Smith demised the last mentioned piece of land unto the said Duke, his executors, administrators, and assigns, from the 29th September then last, for the term of 97 years, wanting two days, if the said lives or any of them should so long live, at the yearly rent of £112. That in lieu of the last mentioned piece of land so demised to the said Duke, it was agreed between the said Charles and Henry Smith, and the said George Lord Vernon, and William Augustus Henry Villiers Mansell, that Charles and Henry Smith should have the land taken in exchange by the said Lord Vernon. That the said Duke of Beaufort then proceeded to take measures for carrying into effect his avowed object in obtaining the said piece of land, which contained 26 A. 2 R. 6 P., by means of such exchange as aforesaid, and in order thereto he entered into certain agreements with John Vivian, Esq. for demising to him 18 acres, part of the said land, and with Messrs. Lockwood and Co. for demising to them the residue of the same land, consisting of 8 A. 0 R. 6 P. for the erection of copper works thereon, and that the said John Vivian did accordingly, in 1810 and 1811, erect upon the said 18 acres extensive copper works, which have ever since been used without interruption or disturbance, for the smelting of copper ores and the manufacture of copper; and by two several indentures of lease, bearing date respectively the 16th of February, 1815, the same lands were demised by the said Duke in conformity with the said agreements, and by which leases full liberty was given to the respective lessees to erect copper works without any limit or restriction; but the lease to Messrs. Lockwood and Co. was afterwards surrendered to Henry, now Duke of Beaufort, they not having erected any works, and those lands were, by an indenture of lease bearing date the 5th day of December, 1831, demised by the said Henry Duke of Beaufort to the plaintiffs, with full liberty to make and erect such and so many buildings and furnaces for the smelting of copper ores and the manufacture of copper as they should find needful; and the plaintiffs did, accordingly, in 1828, erect and build upon the 8 A. 0 R. 6 P. of land, copper works and buildings for the smelting of copper ores and the manufacture of copper, being the aforesaid copper works called the Morfa Works, and that during the progress of such last mentioned works and buildings the said defendant well knew that the same were being erected and made, and were for the smelting and manufacture of copper, and he was well aware of the deleterious effect on vegetation produced by such manufacture; nevertheless the said defendant allowed the plaintiffs to proceed in the erection of the last mentioned works and to expend large sums of money therein, and in completing and finishing the same with the requisite machinery, and plant, without making any objection thereto, and he acquiesced in and encouraged the erection of such works and the aforesaid expenditure, and that ever since the smelting of copper ores and the manufacture of copper, had been carried on in the Morfa Works without any interruption, or disturbance, or without any complaint by or from the defendant. That the defendant had lately commenced an action at law against the plaintiffs in the Court of Queen's Bench, for the purpose of recovering large damages against the plaintiffs, and that the Earl filed his declaration in such action, which consisted of 14 counts, and the first of such counts is in the words following, viz.:—"For that, whereas before and during, and at the time of committing of the grievances after mentioned, certain farms, dwelling houses, messuages, and premises called Lloyw, Creon, Talycoha, Uchaf, Talycoba, Ischa, Tyrest, Gwan, Llestie, Padew, Glaes, and Sir Robert Powell, in the parish of Llausamlet, were in the possession of Charles Henry Smith, as tenant for the Earl, the reversion being in the Earl, yet defendants knowing, &c., to wit, on the 1st of January, 1830, and between that day and the commencement of the suit, kept and continued certain erections and buildings, furnaces, coppers, boilers, flues, and chimnies, before then wrongfully erected, and set up, and made for the purpose of heating, boiling, and smelting copper and other ores upon certain lands contiguous and near the said several farms, &c., and did erect and build certain other erections, &c. for the like purpose upon the said land so contiguous, &c., and did heat, boil, melt, and smelt in and upon and with the said several erections, &c., divers large quantities of copper and other ores, by reason whereof divers large quantities of deleterious and noxious matters, and smokes, vapours, and fumes, issued, arose, and were emitted from the said erections, and spread and diffused themselves in, upon, through and over the said farms, &c., and the trees, and the grass and herbage then growing and being upon the lands, and the air upon, over, and about same, and thereby the several farms became, and were corrupted, and the said farms and the said lands, and the soil thereof, and the walls of the dwelling houses became and are impregnated, filled, and covered with arsenic and other deleterious matters, and deposits, and the trees, and grass, and herbage became and are stunted, blackened, fouled, and injured, by means of which the said Earl is injured in his reversionary estate and interest," and the said Earl lays his damages at £20,000., which action was still pending. The bill prayed that it may be declared that the plaintiffs are entitled to use and practise the smelting of copper ores and the manufacture of copper at their said several and respective copper works hereinbefore mentioned and described, without any molestation, interruption, or disturbance; from or by the said defendant, George, Earl of Jersey, or his heirs or assigns, and that the plaintiffs may be quieted in the use and enjoyment of their said works, and for an injunction perpetually to restrain the said defendant from molesting or disturbing the plaintiffs in quiet and peaceable use and enjoyment of their said copper works, and the practice of smelting copper ores, and manufacturing copper thereat, either by prosecuting the said action at law against the plaintiffs, or by commencing any other action at law against them with reference thereto; and that, in the meantime, the said defendant might also be restrained from further prosecuting the said action at law against the plaintiffs, and from commencing any other action at law against them in respect of the matters aforesaid.

To this bill the defendant filed a DENIAL on the 6th July last.

That the said bill did not contain sufficient matter of equity, whereupon the Court could ground any decree in favour of the said plaintiffs, or give the said plaintiffs any relief against the defendants.

Mr. K. Bruce supported the bill.

Mr. Tennant supported the denial.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said, that if he had known the contents of the two deaths referred to by the learned counsel for the plaintiffs before had addressed the court, he would not certainly have heard any of the arguments in support of the bill. Those two deeds made a very strong case for the plaintiffs. It was there-shewn that the Duke of Beaufort obtained land in exchange, for the very purpose of carrying on the copper works upon the estate. I thought, therefore, this demurrer could not be sustained. Supposing there had been no motion at all brought, but that simply the Earl of Jersey had given notice to the plaintiffs to abstain from carrying on the works, the plaintiffs would have been entitled to come to a court of equity under those two deeds, and ask for a decree for quiet enjoyment of the lands; or if, on the contrary, the Earl of Jersey had thought fit to file a bill in this court to restrain the plaintiffs from carrying on the copper works, and the present plaintiffs should have filed a cross bill, setting forth the same facts as the present bill did, the court could do no otherwise than dismiss the Earl's bill, and make a decree for quiet enjoyment in the cross bill. Although he admitted the authority of the case, Edwards v. Edwards (a), cited by the learned counsel who argued in support of the demurrer, yet he thought that case not applicable to the present, as this did not only sought to restrain an action at law, but further prayed for a decree for quiet enjoyment of the lands in question.

Mr. K. Bruce then moved for the common injunction to stay the trial of the action at law, and asked leave to give a notice of the motion to extend the common injunction.

Order made accordingly.

RAINY v. VERNON.

Auctioneer's charges for Commission and expenses.—Whether an Auctioneer is entitled to commission upon the sale of property that he has advertised for sale by public auction, and the Vendor's Solicitor makes a sale by private contract.

This was an action brought by Mr. Rainy, auctioneer, of Regent-street, to recover from the defendant the amount of his commission upon certain ground rents, which the plaintiff had employed him to sell by public auction.

Sir W. Follett, for the plaintiff, stated that the defendant, who was the owner of some land and rents, had endeavoured to effect a sale of them, but did not succeed. He then applied to the plaintiff to sell them, who advised that they should be submitted to sale by public auction, in lots, as the mode most likely to produce the highest price, as the division would produce a greater number of purchasers, to which the defendant assented, and gave the plaintiff instructions accordingly. The plaintiff prepared particulars of sale, and advertised the sale to take place in the usual manner on the 14th of March, 1838. In the intermediate time several proposals were made to Mr. Rainy to treat by private contract; and one party made an offer to purchase a considerable portion of the ground-rents, at £8,200. which was 22 years purchase, less £72. The plaintiff communicated this offer to Mr. Vernon, who refused it, not thinking proper to abate the odd £72. Mr. Luxmore, who made the offer, then determined to wait the issue of the auction. Another offer of £20,000. was made to the plaintiff for the whole by Mr. Baker, a solicitor, whose client afterwards became the purchaser. This the plaintiff also communicated to the defendant, who also refused it. A few days before the time appointed for the sale, Mr. Baker went to the solicitor of the defendant, and they both went to the defendant, and on the 10th March, and concluded a bargain for the whole at £21,500. The auction was in consequence declared at an end, and the plaintiff claimed his commission upon this sale by private treaty, which the defendant refused to pay, by reason that he had not effected the sale; and the plaintiff brought the present action to recover the amount, and the defendant paid into Court a sum of money in the nature of compensation for the plaintiff's labour.

Evidence was given establishing the facts as stated for the plaintiff, and showing the custom and established usage of the trade, that under the circumstances the plaintiff was entitled to his regular commission as if he had sold the property.

LORD DENMAN left the case to the jury—whether there was such a custom or usage, and whether the defendant must be presumed to have known it.

Verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount of his commission.

MORRIS v. KING.

WARRANT of ATTORNEY.—SCIRE FACIAS.—

Whether execution may issue upon a judgment more than one year old, with the consent of the defendant, without a scire facias to revive.

In this case the defendant had signed a warrant of attorney, to secure an admitted debt due to the plaintiff, and on the 31st October, 1834, judgment was entered up. On the 1st May last, execution was issued, previous to which the defendant, in the presence of the attornies for both parties, signed the following consent, to save the expence of a scire facias:—

“ I admit that there is due to the plaintiff, on my warrant of attorney, £1144. 12s. 5d. for principal and interest, and I consent to his issuing execution on the judgment signed thereon, notwithstanding there may have been no execution within a year and a day.”

A fiat in bankruptcy had issued against the defendant, but the assignees did not appear, although they in fact were the moving parties.

Mr. Butt obtained a rule nisi, to set aside the writ of execution, with costs, on the ground of irregularity, it being an execution issued upon a judgment more than one year old, without a scire facias having previously issued to revive the judgment.

Sir W. Follett now showed cause against the rule, and said the question was, whether, with the defendant's written consent, the execution was not regular. The case of Morris v. Jones (a), determined that under such circumstances a scire facias is unnecessary.

Mr. Butt supported the rule, upon the ground that the consent was not such as is required by law. It should have been in the warrant of attorney to justify an execution upon a judgment more than a year and a day old, without a scire facias having previously issued, and cited Hiscocks v. Kemp (b).

LORD DENMAN mentioned Heath v. Brindley (c), and observed, that supposing the plaintiff had told the defendant he was going to issue a scire facias, and the defendant had requested him not to do so, as he would consent to execution, would not that be sufficient?

Mr. Butt submitted that it would not in this case, it being given immediately before the fiat was issued, and was done with the view to a performance.

LORD DENMAN said—I do not see why the arrangement made between these parties, to save expense, may not be carried into effect. It is a proceeding between debtor and creditor, and we have no third parties before us whose interests might be involved, as was the case in Heath v. Brindley. There is no fraud shewn on the part of the defendant.

The rest of the Court concurred.

MOXHAY v. COLEMAN.

CHARTER PARTY.—GUARANTEE for its performance by the Captain.

This was an action on a guarantee for the performance of the covenants in a charter-party.

The plaintiff was a biscuit-baker and ship owner. The defendant was a partner in the house of Sir C. Price and Co., bankers. One Captain Gillies, a master-mariner, having agreed to freight a vessel called the Asia, belonging to the plaintiff, from London to the East Indies, the defendant, who had a share in the adventure, agreed to guarantee the performance of the charter-party by Captain Gillies. The ship in question had been purchased by the plaintiff for £5,000, after which he expended a considerable sum upon repairs of her. By the terms of the charter party Captain Gillies bound himself to pay £4,000. per annum freight, to deliver up stores at the end of the voyage; to defray necessary expenses; and if the ship sustained any damage from her voyage, to repair the same at his own expense. The ship sailed in the beginning of 1828, and reached her outward destination in safety. On her homeward voyage, however, she stranded in Table-bay, and suffered considerable damage. Upon arriving in port of London, she was taken to the yard of Messrs. Green, Ingram, and Co., to be repaired, but it did not appear distinctly whether by direction of plaintiff or of Captain Gillies. Some repairs were done to her to the amount of £1,500., but upon a further examination of the timbers they were found to be so defective, that it was advisable to sell the vessel for what she would fetch to break up. It would have cost from £4,000. to £5,000. to repair the damage done. The vessel having been insured both at the Mutual Marine Indemnity office and at a Scotch office, to the amount of £7,000, the vessel being valued at £10,000., sums were received from those offices for the average loss amounting to £2,990.; and the present action was brought to recover the amount of the difference between that sum and the sum it would have cost to repair the damage done. The declaration originally included the amount of freight (£4,000.) and the value of some stores; but upon these points the plaintiff's claim was subsequently satisfied; and therefore the matter in dispute was confined to the claim for repairs. The defence set up was that the plaintiff had declined to have the ship repaired, because he found that she was rotten, and that he had therefore, by his conduct released Captain Gillies from this part of his contract.

Verdict for the plaintiff—Damages £1,251.

INTERLINEATIONS UNATTESTED, how far admitted.

In this case the deceased had made a codicil to his will, by which he had given a legacy of £50. to two servants. Upon the will being brought to Court for probate, an interlineation appeared in the codicil of the words "each of," which the servants were given £50. a piece, and without those words they could only claim £50. between them. This interlineation was unattested, nor could it be ascertained when it was made.

Dr. Curteis moved for probate, on behalf of the executors, with the interlineation.

The residuary legatee consented to the motion. Sir H. JENNER thought the probability was, the interlineation was in the hand-writing of the deceased, that it was made before he executed the codicil, and that consequently the statute was satisfied.

Probate granted with the interlineation.

JOSEPH GARDENER'S CASE.

VESTING ORDER.—Whether the vesting order can be dismissed without the consent of the creditor obtaining it?—Or, whether the Court can declare it null and void?

Mr. Nichols applied to dismiss a vesting order obtained by a person named Smith, under similar circumstances.

It appeared that Gardener had been sued in the Small Debt Court at Gloucester, and had been taken in execution, and some time afterwards Smith, who was at the time the detaining creditor, obtained a vesting order under the compulsory clause. Proceedings were subsequently brought in the Court of Queen's Bench, and the execution and judgment had been set aside with costs.

Mr. Commissioner LAW said he was as ready as any man to apply common sense to an act of Parliament, but there was a difficulty in the case. The 37th section provided that no vesting order could be vacated without the consent of the creditor who had obtained it, and it was quite clear he would give no consent in this case. It was supposed that the proceedings on vesting orders could be "immortal," and after considerable debate the only amendment that could be proposed was that they should be dismissed on the consent of creditors.

Mr. Nichols remarked that unless the court inferred this case was likely to be "immortal" as consent could be got from Smith. There was now an action pending against Smith for the imprisonment Gardener had undergone, and the application was made lest the existing vesting order should be any obstacle to the trial.

Mr. Commissioner LAW declared that the only way to get rid of the vesting order was to pronounce it ipso facto null and void. It was quite clear the act would not assist the party, and that common sense must be consulted in granting the application. He would grant a rule nisi on an affidavit of the attorney of the law proceedings mentioned in the affidavit of Gardener.

JOHN GIBLETT'S CASE.

OVERSEER committed to NEWGATE for Defalcation.—Whether upon the Insolvent applying to be heard upon his petition such defalcation shall be considered a breach of trust?

We have before noticed the facts of this case (a). The insolvent now came up from Newgate to be heard upon his petition, and was opposed by Mr. Woodroffe, on the part of the overseers of the parish of Northolt, near Harrow.

He had applied some time ago to be discharged on sureties, but the application was refused.

Richard Henry Bowery, clerk to Messrs. Richards and Woodbridge, of Uxbridge, who were the solicitors for the present churchwardens of Northolt, stated that the insolvent was the late overseer of the parish, and had been committed to Newgate for a defalcation in his accounts. He had been a small farmer in the parish. In April last, the accounts of the insolvent were audited, and he admitted the balance against him to be £56. 5s. 3½d. In May he was summoned before the justices at Uxbridge, and the balance demanded. He then said he had made use of the money, and could not pay it. A warrant of distress was issued against his goods, but his landlord had distrained, and a warrant for his commitment to Newgate was made out, and since the 11th of June he had been confined.

The insolvent pleaded poverty.

Mr. Woodroffe contended that the insolvent had committed a breach of trust, and the excuse of poverty could not be allowed. His learned friend seemed to regret that the insolvent had been elected to the office; he had, however, been appointed in rotation. The parish had felt it their duty to oppose by way of example, and it was no excuse to plead poverty for robbing a parish of 56l., neither was it to plead a large family. He asked for a judgment for the offence committed.

Mr. Cooke addressed the court on the part of the insolvent, urging his great distress, his large family, and the misfortune he had in being appointed the overseer. The poor man had neglected his business, had lost his wife, and had now seven children in the poor-house. He submitted that a mere deficiency did not constitute a breach of trust. The insolvent had been two months in Newgate, a period which satisfied some felonies, and he had been subject to the same regulations as the other prisoners, debarred from the visits and enjoyments of persons confined for debt.

Mr. Commissioner LAW said the only question he had to decide was, whether the insolvent had committed a breach of trust. If he knew, when he spent the money, that it was not his own, he was committing a fraud; and the circumstance of his being a poor man made it clear to him that he knew he was spending what was not his own, and he considered himself bound to say that the insolvent had broken the trust reposed in him. He adjudged the insolvent to an imprisonment of six months from the date of the petition.

The insolvent was remanded to Newgate.

Mr. Woodroffe said that he was instructed to deny the power of the court to entertain the case on the commitment, but he considered that the insolvent had a locus standi to be heard.

INSOLVENT DEBTORS' COURT—Aug. 12.

The vacation was appointed to commence on Saturday next; but there is now a great number of cases to be heard, and the sittings cannot be concluded until the latter part of next week. There has been no diminution of business since the "Abolition" of Imprisonment for Debt, and the measure which her Majesty two years ago, on the prorogation of Parliament, was made to hail with "lively satisfaction," has not realised the benefits vaunted by its promoters. Too much praise cannot be rendered to Mr. Commissioner Law, for his great exertions. His health, it is feared, will be impaired, as he has frequently sat in Court to seven, eight, and nine o'clock at night, and then only a portion of his labours have been performed. He has more than once said that the vacation will, till nearly its conclusion, be no holiday to him. The other Commissioners will shortly return from their respective circuits, and the Court will sit once a week to hear bail cases.—Morning Herald.

SHARP v. KEED.

FALSE IMPRISONMENT.—Power of the Commissioners of Land and Assessed Taxes over their Collectors when defaulters, under 3 Geo. IV. c. 60.—Whether they can arrest and imprison a defaulter who has absconded, and is living in another district.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendant, to recover damages for alleged false imprisonment. The defendant pleaded not guilty.

Mr. Andrews stated the case for the plaintiff.

In 1837 the plaintiff was appointed collector of the land and assessed taxes for one of the parishes in Cambridge, and in May, 1838, he absconded with £600. of the public money unaccounted for. The defendant is one of the commissioners for the affairs of taxes in the Cambridge district, and he and three other commissioners, shortly after the plaintiff absconded, issued a warrant for his apprehension, and another warrant for the seizure and sale of his goods. The plaintiff not being found, the commissioners offered a reward of £50. for his apprehension. In May last, Stearn, a police officer, had discovered that Sharp was residing at Cheltenham. He forthwith saw the defendant, and asked if he should go and take him at Cheltenham. The defendant replied he thought it very advisable, but he would not guarantee any expense at the same time he thought the £50. reward was still in force. The officer went to Cheltenham. One Mr. Porter was described to him as living in the town, and answering the account he had given of the defaulter, and this Porter of Cheltenham proved to be Sharp of Cambridge. Stearn produced his warrant, took him into custody, and brought him to Cambridge, where he lodged in Her Majesty's gaol. After the plaintiff absconding the commissioners sold his property which realized £150., thus reducing the amount of his debt to the Crown to the sum of £450. Mr. Andrews, for the plaintiff, contended that the arrest at Cheltenham was wholly illegal. The statute under which the warrant issued, 3 Geo. IV. c. 60, only empowers commissioners "in their respective districts to imprison defaulters." The Cambridge commissioners have no jurisdiction beyond the 14 parishes of the town, the arrest was unlawful, and the subsequent detention unjustifiable. Besides, the plaintiff was imprisoned under a warrant which directed him to be detained until he paid the sum of £600., whereas only £450. was now due to him.

ALDERSON, B., was clearly of opinion that the defendant was not liable. The warrant was a good and valid warrant at the time it was executed by the defendant and the other commissioners; and with respect to the verbal instructions supposed to have been given by the defendant to the constable, it only amounted to this, that the defendant left the officer to act upon his own responsibility, reminding him, indeed, of ward, but refusing to pay any of the expenses to be incurred. Besides, even if he had desired the constable to arrest the plaintiff at Cheltenham, he must be understood to have meant it to be done by legal means, which would be by applying to the Cheltenham commissioners for their aid. With respect to the plaintiff having paid a portion of the £600., that afforded no ground of action, as he was not now detained for the whole term, but for the balance; and he would be entitled to his liberty as soon as he had paid the residue.

Verdict for the defendant, with liberty to the plaintiff to move to enter a verdict for him if the court above should think that, under the circumstances, it ought to be so entered.

HOPKINSON AND ANOTHER V. SNOW AND ANOTHER.
IN STOCK COMPANIES.—METROPOLITAN PARCELS DELIVERY COMPANY.—LIABILITY OF DIRECTORS AND SHAREHOLDERS FOR GOODS SUPPLIED FOR THE USE OF THE COMPANY.

This was an action brought by the plaintiffs, William Hopkinson and Thomas Burrowes, against the defendants, John Rowe Snow, Samuel Baldwin, John Chancellor, John Nunn, and Thomas Nunn, to recover £143. 14s. for goods sold and delivered by the plaintiffs to the defendants, at their request.

The defendant, John Rowe Snow, pleaded non assumpsit, upon which issue was joined.

The other defendants suffered judgment by default.

Mr. Petersdorff opened the pleadings, and stated that the plaintiffs were corn-factors, and the defendants were shareholders in a company, called the Metropolitan Parcels Delivery Company, that had been established in London, and the question was the amount of damages to which the parties, who had let judgment go by default, were liable, supposing the defendant Snow, could be held to be liable to the action. The defendant Snow was the principal projector of the Company—a place was taken for carrying on their business, in the Goswell-street-road, where the plaintiffs had supplied corn to the value of £143. 14s.

John Cubley deposed that he was a shareholder in the company in question, and had held himself out as a director, he gave orders to the plaintiffs for the loan.

Mr. Ogle objected that the evidence of this witness ought not to be received, inasmuch as he was interested in the cause. The effect of the evidence would tend to shift the responsibility from himself to another.

GURNEY, B. said, that at the same time the witness would fix himself. He did not think he ought to reject the evidence.

The witness then proceeded to state that corn to the amount now sought to be recovered by the plaintiff was sent to the company's station in Goswell-street.

Cross-examined—Witness had ten shares in the Metropolitan Parcels Delivery Company. It was first formed in September, 1839. Some of the proprietors of the company held a meeting at the Exeter Hall Hotel, and they considered it a good speculation, and resolved that the company should be formed forthwith. They did not commence business until January, 1840. They took a station at 331, Strand, the lower part was intended for parcels. They began on the 1st January to carry parcels, and had horses and carts. The Strand station was the central one. They had another at Whitechapel, and there were five out-stations. Witness signed the deed about November last. The house in the Strand was taken by a provisional committee of directors, Snow, Nunn, Hunt, and Adams. Witness met Snow at the meetings of this committee.

Mr. Charles Gwillim Jones deposed that he was a solicitor in Gray's Inn-square, and was concerned for the parties who sought to establish the Metropolitan Parcels Delivery Company. The defendants, Snow, Adams, Cubley, Hunt, and other gentlemen were present at the first meeting that took place upon the subject. The defendants, Baldwin and Chancellor, came in subsequently. The first meeting took place in September, 1839, at Exeter Hall, Strand. Resolutions were passed at that meeting, that the company should be formed forthwith, and Mr. Snow, Mr. Mann, Mr. Adams, and some other gentlemen, were appointed as a committee to act on behalf of the company, and to carry out its objects. It was resolved that a capital of £50,000 should be raised by 5000 shares of £10 each. Mr. Snow took an active part in the proceedings all along. He took 30 shares, and gave a check for £60 for the amount of the deposits upon them. He was also at every meeting of the committee up to the month of October, when Baldwin and Chancellor took shares. They took Sadler's repository, and kept horses there, when Snow attended and took an active part. Witness thought Snow attended the meeting in the first week of April last, but he did not attend afterwards.

Cross-examined by Mr. Ogle—The company is not now in existence. It is joined with the London Parcels Delivery Company. Should say that the company was insolvent in the month of May. In the month of October the defendant Snow resigned his appointment of trustee, and from that time he did not attend any of the meetings. A deed of partnership was drawn up, but Mr. Snow refused to sign it; but he did not assign as a reason for not doing so that he had no interest in the company; but of the 5000 proposed shares, not more than 400 were taken up; and at a meeting of the shareholders that was held in April, the defendant wished to know how he could get rid of his shares, as he said a fresh call of £2 had been made, and he did not pay it. The resolutions for the formation of the company, and the conditions upon which it was to be established, were then read. Baldwin kept Morley's Hotel, and is a man of property. Chancellor is an omnibus master, and a respectable man.

Mr. Petersdorff said this was the case for the plaintiff.

Mr. Ogle then addressed the court, and said that his defence to this action was one purely of law, and he was prepared, confidently, to submit, that the defendant, Mr. Snow, was not so connected with this company as to render him liable to the payment of this debt, that had no doubt been incurred on their behalf. He submitted that, although the defendant held shares in the company, he would only have been liable, supposing the company had been established upon its original footing of 5,000 shares being issued. Instead of that, however, it appeared that only a very small number of shares had been issued, and there was no proof that the defendant was aware of this deviation from the original plan, and still consented to continue his liability; and, besides that, it appeared that the defendant had refused to sign the deed of partnership, and after the month of October he withdrew himself altogether from the management of the affairs of the company. He contended that Mr. Snow was not a partner, and unless he was a partner in May he was not liable. Fox v. Clifton (a) is in point.

GURNEY, B.—Is there a provision that the company shall not be formed till a certain amount of capital is paid, although a partnership has commenced? Vice v. Lady Anson (b); Pitchford v. Davis (c). The case is not proved.

Mr. Ogle said the case of Pitchford v. Davis, was an action of a precisely similar character against a shareholder in a projected company, and on which it had been distinctly laid down by Lord Abinger and Mr. Baron Parke, that a shareholder could not be made liable for the contracts that were entered into, unless it was shewn that the principles upon which the company was originally established had been fully carried out in every respect, or that the defendant, as a shareholder, was aware of any deviation that had been made in them.

GURNEY, B., expressed his opinion that the present one was of exactly that character. The defendant said that he consented to become partner of the company if 5,000 shares had been sold. But as 400 had been disposed of, and the company began business with a capital of 800*l.*, instead of what they would have derived from the 5,000 shares, he did not admit his liability as a shareholder.

Mr. Petersdorff thought that the evidence was sufficient to warrant the belief that the defendant was aware that all the original conditions had been fulfilled when the company was established, and that he was liable as a shareholder in the undertaking.

GURNEY, B., thought the evidence was sufficient. The question was, whether the directors, having carried on the company upon a totally different principle to that proposed by the resolutions for its formation, and to the prospectus that had been issued, could bind the defendant to their acts.

Mr. Petersdorff said in that case he had better elect to be called.

GURNEY, B., then said that if he pleased to might elect to be nonsuited, but if the case went to the jury, he should feel it his duty to direct them to find for the defendant.

Mr. Petersdorff asked to have leave, as it was a question of law, to move the court to enter a verdict for the plaintiff.

GURNEY, B.—No, I will not do that; if you will not be nonsuited I shall direct the jury.

Mr. Petersdorff.—"I elect to be nonsuited."—Plaintiffs called.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

E. A.—Your question savours too much of our Bread and Cheese, which by answering we must sacrifice. Time with us is of no small importance, and it is too much to ask us to give it away. Do, pray, bear that in mind. You are a very industrious man, and for this once shall not be disappointed.

In the case of the Countess of Portland v.

Prodgers, which you have cited, it was decided that the will of Lady Sandys, her husband being by Act of Parliament banished for life, was valid: for, in such case, the wife might in all things act as a feme sole, and as if her husband were dead, and that the necessity of the case required she should have such power. Now, in such case, the wife may sue and be sued as a feme sole, both at law and in equity. See also Derry v. Duchess of Mazarine, Salk. 116. Your question, however, goes to the fact of the husband being transported—(where is the difference?)—and the authority of Newsome v. Bowyer. It really is a misfortune that talented men like you will not purchase books upon which reliance may be placed. The work you refer to, from which you gain the authority, is dated 1838, but it contains no mention of the case of Carroll v. Blencowe, 4 Esp. N. P. C., where it was held by LORD ALVANLEY that a married woman, whose husband had been transported for seven years for felony, might maintain an action as a feme sole, it appearing by the record and conviction that her husband had abjured the realm, and though the term of his transportation had expired, yet if in fact he had not returned the right of action still remained. But as to whether she can be treated as a feme sole, after the term of transportation has expired, see 2 Bos. & Pull. 233; see also Sparrow v. Carruthers, 2 Black. Rep. 1197, cited Wilmot's Case, Moor, 851.

ESSAY.

WE have before noticed SIR WILLIAM JONES's objection to LORD HOLT's class of Bailments, viz. that in truth the 4th sort is no more than a branch of the 3rd, and that a seventh might, with equal reason, have been added, since the fifth is capable of another subdivision. (a) There can be no doubt but that it may be divided, not only as Sir William Jones suggests, into locatio operis faciendi, where work is to be done upon the goods, and locatio operis mercium vehendarum, where they are to be carried, but into as many different subdivisions, as there are different modes of employing labour upon goods: in fact the civilians in their division of hirings, enumerated another class—viz. Locatio custodiæ, or the hiring of care to be bestowed in guarding a thing bailed, which Sir William Jones has not noticed.

The fifth of Lord Holt's classes of bailments is as we have seen, locatio operis faciendi, that is to say, where goods are delivered to be carried, or something is to be done about them for reward, to be paid to the bailee. And this, cannot be reasonably treated as a branch of the third, which is locatio rei, that is to say, where goods are lent to the bailee, to be used by him for hire; for there exists between them this essential difference, viz.: that in cases falling under the third class, or locatio rei, the reward is paid by the bailee to the bailor: whereas, in cases falling under the fifth class, or locatio operis faciendi, the reward is always paid by the bailor to the bailee.

It is true that in Latin both classes are described by the word locatio, which probably gave rise to Sir W. Jones's opinion that both ought to be included under the same head; but then in the third class, locatio rei, the word locatio is used to describe a mode of bailment, viz. by the hiring of the thing bailed; whereas, in the fifth class, locatio operis faciendi, the same word locatio is used, not to describe any mode of bailment, but to signify the hiring of the man's labour who is to work upon the thing bailed; for as to the thing bailed, that is not hired at all, as it is in cases falling within the third class. If, indeed, LORD HOLT had been enumerating the different sorts of hirings, not of bailments, he would, no doubt, like the civilians, have classified both locatio rei and locatio operis under the word hiring, since in one case goods are hired, and in the other labour. But he was making a classification, not of hirings but of bailments; and since in cases of locatio rei there is a hiring of the thing bailed, and in cases of locatio operis, no hiring of the thing bailed, it was impossible to place, with any degree of propriety, two sorts of bailment under the same class, one of which is and the other of which is not a bailment by way of hiring. (b) We think, therefore, that LORD HOLT's classification may be taken to be the correct one.

We will now turn our attention to the class called by civilians Locatio custodiae; that is to say, the hiring of care to be bestowed in guarding a thing bailed, called also Deposits for Hire; of this class are WARE-

HOUSEMEN, WHARFINGERS, and AGISTERS of CATTLE.

BAILERS of this class are responsible for losses by ordinary negligence (c). LORD KENYON in Cailiff and another v. Danvers (d), said, a WAREHOUSEMAN is only obliged to exert reasonable diligence in taking care of the things deposited in his warehouse, he is not like a carrier, to be considered as an insurer, and liable for all losses happening otherwise than by the Act of GOD, or the King's Enemies. So, in Finucan v. Small (e), LORD KENYON held, that where goods are bailed to be kept for hire, the bailee is bound to take the same care of them as he would of his own; and, therefore, if they are stolen by the bailee's servants, without gross negligence on his part, the bailee is not liable. To support an action in such a case against the bailee, Lord Kenyon said positive negligence must be proved.

If the goods be destroyed by Vermis, as in the case of Cailiff and another v. Danvers where they were destroyed by Rats, which in custody of the warehouseman, and the latter took all possible care of keeping Cats to destroy the vermin, Lord Kenyon said that the warehouseman having exerted due and common diligence for the preservation of the goods, was not liable to any action for the damage which he could not prevent.

The principal points to be considered regarding warehousemen are—When their liability begins and when it ends. This was determined by LORD ELLENBOROUGH in Thompson v. Day, (f) in which case the Lordship said the whole question turned upon the single point of, when the warehouseman's liability commenced, and the agency of the carman ended? For until the goods were delivered to the warehouseman, the carman as to be considered as the agent of the person sending them; but when the warehouseman took them into his own hands, the moment the warehouseman applied his tackle to them, from that moment his liability commences. And it is no defence that the goods were injured by falling into the street, by the breaking of the warehouseman's tackle, although the carman who brought the goods refused the offer of slings for further security. His Lordship observed, the tackle is used by the warehouseman and he is bound to see that they are of sufficient strength and for the purpose, and he should not apply tackle unless that could be performed which he was bound to do; if the slings were necessary, the refusal of the carman or his declining the use of them, will not exempt the warehouseman: he ought to have insisted on the carman's using them; and if he refused, the warehouseman should have repurchased those goods and refused to accept them. The damaged pack of linen was in the crane, and lifted from the cart; it was in the possession of the warehouseman, being so in point of law he was liable for loss.

SUPPLEMENTARY ANSWER TO PROBLEM 1.—VOL. 4.

OF INSTRUMENTS.—What is the import of the term Oyer? In what cases, and how demandable? In what cases will an Indorsement of Instruments be granted to a plaintiff, and in what cases to a defendant? What is the effect of obtaining admission of Documents before trial.

—Prior to the passing of the law amendment act, 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 42, it was a cause of complaint, and certainly very just complaint, that the expences often very considerable were incurred by parties in bringing witnesses to the court to prove hand-writing, the execution of deeds, the sending of letters, the service of notices, the examining copies of documents, and a variety of other matters of a similar nature, which turned out not to be in dispute, and which would have been admitted by the other party, had he been called upon so to do; or, at least, which he ought to have admitted; they not being matters which his line of defence made it necessary to dispute. In order, in all cases, to give the other party the opportunity of admitting such matters as these, and in some measure to constrain him to make the admissions where it is reasonable he should do so by a kind of penalty, in case of his refusal, the twentieth rule of Hilary Term, 4 Will. 4, was promulgated by the judges of the three courts, in pursuance of the said act, 3 & 4 W. 4 (vide Gray's Co. Att. Pract. 91). That rule is as follows:—

“Either party after plea pleaded, and a reasonable time before trial may give notice to the other, either in town or country, in the form hereto annexed, marked A, or to the like effect, of his intention to adduce in evidence certain written or printed documents; and unless the adverse party shall consent by indorsement on such notice within 48 hours, to make the admission specified, the party requiring such admission may call on the party required by summons, to shew cause, before a judge, why he should not consent to such admission, or in case of refusal, be subject to pay the costs of proof. And unless the party required shall expressly consent to make such admission, the judge shall, if he think the application reasonable, make an order, the costs of proving any document specified in the notice which shall be proved at the trial, to the satisfaction of the judge, or other presiding officer, certified by his indorsement thereon, shall be paid by the party so required, whatever may be the result of the cause.

Provided that, if the judge shall think the application unreasonable, he shall indorse the summons accordingly.

Provided also, that the judge may give such time for enquiry or examination of the documents intended to be offered in evidence, and give such directions for inspection and examination, and impose such terms upon the party refusing the admission as he shall think fit.

If the party required shall consent to the admission, the judge shall order the same to be made.

No costs of proving any written or printed document shall be allowed to any party who shall have adduced the same in evidence on any trial, unless he shall have given such notice as aforesaid, and the adverse party shall have refused or neglected to make such admission, or the judge shall have indorsed upon the summons that he does not think it reasonable to require it.

A judge may make such order as he may think fit respecting the costs of the application, and the costs of the production and inspection, and in the absence of a specific order, the same shall be costs in the cause."

It is to be observed, that the full-court has no jurisdiction to order the admission of documents under this rule, and if a judge at chambers refer the parties to the full court, they will hear the case argued, and intimate their opinion to the judge, but will not pronounce judgment (Smith v. Bird, 3 Dowl. 611); and with respect to the second provision, the rule, where a judgment and other documents required to be admitted were abroad at Brussels, an order was made under this rule, on the terms that the defendant should have a fortnight's time to inspect them, and that the plaintiff should pay the costs of such inspection, to be taxed by the prothonotary (S.C. Id. 641).

As observed by Mr. Bagley in his work on the Practice at Chambers, p. 307, it is not compulsory in any case on the party intending to produce documents in evidence to adopt the course pointed out by this rule; and, therefore, when it is considered unadvisable to inform the opposite party of the nature or contents of the documents proposed to be offered at the trial, the premature disclosure may be avoided: but in that event, the costs of proving it fall inevitably on the party producing it in evidence. On the other hand, when no solid objection exists to putting the adverse party in possession of the nature of the documents proposed to be offered in evidence, and any considerable expence is likely to be incurred in proving them, it seems judicious in all cases to require their admission in the manner prescribed, for whether the judge shall decide that the required admission is reasonable or unreasonable, the party producing the document in evidence will not be entitled to the costs of proof in any event, unless he has availed himself of the rule. If a judge, upon hearing the parties, intimates his opinion that a document ought to be admitted, it is generally assented to, but if it should still be refused, the only event in which the party refusing can escape from the obligation to pay the costs incurred in proving the document, is where the party producing such document has failed in proving it to the satisfaction of the judge who presided at the trial as testified by the absence of this indorsement on the document. It is altogether in the discretion of the judge before whom the summons is made returnable to say when it is reasonable to call for the admission of the document specified; but it is presumed that it would not be considered reasonable to require the admission of any document, when it appeared from the pleadings that the validity of such document was clearly in issue; as where non est factum is pleaded to an action on a specialty or forgery to an action on a promissory note or bill of exchange, nor does it seem reasonable in general to require an admission of the execution of a private instrument to which the party called upon to admit is in no respect privy. Even in such instances, however, although the judge should be of opinion that it is unreasonable to require the admission unless the party producing the document applies for its admission under this rule, he cannot recover the costs of proof although the issue should be determined in his favour. The judge cannot, it seems, order an admission of documents against a party's consent (See Smith v. Bird, 3 Dowl. 641; 1 Hodges. 96. S.C.; Stracy v. Blake, 7 C. & P. 404).

The following observations are made with the view that this rule may be better understood.

In the first place, the rule does not apply to any documents which are not in the possession or power of the party, and of which he consequently cannot give the inspection contemplated by the rule; the production of these must be compelled by subpoena duces tecum in the usual manner; and the costs of proving them will be allowed, although no notice to admit has been given. But if the party in whose possession they are will give them up to the party who intends to adduce them in evidence, or will permit the other party to inspect them in pursuance of a notice, it will be advisable to give the notice, as the admission may possibly be made required.

Secondly, It is to be observed, that the rule contemplates the doing of two things; first, giving notice, and affording the opportunity of inspection; and, secondly, if the admission called for be not given, the application to the judge to compel the party to pay the costs of proof which may be the result of the cause; and it is necessary to point out that each of these things has its separate object and effect, and that an advantage is obtained by the notice, even though the summons be not taken out, and a different one by the summons; and, therefore, it will be advisable to give the notice though there may not be time to take out the summons, for if the notice be not given, the party producing the documents in evidence can have no costs of proof though he succeed in the cause; but if the notice be given, though it be not followed up by a summons, the party will be entitled to the costs of proof if he succeed in the cause. The object of the summons is different; it is, to compel the party adducing the documents in evidence to pay the costs of proof if he fail in the cause, have the costs of proof out of the pocket of the successful party who unreasonably refused to admit them. It is as was before observed, in no case can a judge compel a party to admit a document, though when he is hearing the application, he merely judges whether or not the refusal of the party called upon be unreasonable. If he thinks the admission ought to be made, and that the refusal is unreasonable, he does not order the admission to be made, he merely orders the party refusing to pay the costs of proof even though he succeed in the cause. If he think that the refusal of the admission is reasonable, he merely indorses the summons to that effect, and then the costs of proof abide the result of the cause like the costs of any other evidence. It must, however, be also observed, that the judge's order that the party refusing do pay the costs of the proof is not final, for where such an order is obtained, the party who obtained the order, if he fail in the action (and in that case only is it material), must obtain a certificate from the judge who tried the cause, that the documents, &c. were proved to his satisfaction; this certificate is given on the back of each document, if he do not obtain this certificate, the order is of no avail, but if he do obtain it, he will then be entitled on the taxation of the costs to have the costs of the proof deducted from the costs of his successful opponent.

Where the witness who is to prove a document, is a material witness to prove another part of the case, and must be called, even though the admission of the document were made, it is apprehended that it is not necessary to give the notice or call for the admission, for the object of the rule being to save expence, it would seem to follow that it is not applicable where no expence could be saved, and this is countenanced by the language of the former rule (Hil. 2, W. 4, R. 7), which is not expressly revoked, and with which the present rule is not inconsistent, being merely an extension of it. The language of that rule is, "that the expense of any witness called only to prove the handwriting, &c., shall not be allowed unless, &c." In cases where there is an objection to allow the inspection of a document by an adverse party, this observation is worth attention. In country causes, the notice to inspect and admit is usually given by the agent in town (who has the document sent to him for the purpose of the inspection) to the agent of the opposite party, who, if he consents to the required admission, indorses the notice accordingly, if otherwise, the summons is usually resorted to, and from what has been stated, a party called upon to make admissions will know how he ought to act, being aware of the consequences of a refusal; and it will always be advisable when the notice to admit is met with a refusal to take the opinion of a judge on its reasonableness or unreasonableness. (See Gray's Co. Att. Pr. 93, et seq.)

Having said thus much on the admission or refusal by the party required, I now arrive at the proceedings at the trial after such admission. If on a summons, to admit the handwriting of the defendant, his attorney refuse to admit it, and the usual order is made, the judge at the trial will certify for the costs of a witness, who is called to prove such handwriting; if the witness on his examination in chief depose to no other fact (Stracy v. Blake, ub. sup.) Where a plaintiff was non-suited in consequence of a refusal by the defendant's counsel at the trial to admit certain documents in evidence, which had been agreed to be admitted by the defendant's attorney's agent, the court granted a new trial with costs, to be paid by defendant (Doe Tindal v. Roe, 5 Dow. 420). A variance in the date of a note declared on, and of one admitted by a judge's order, is immaterial, where it does not appear that the defendant had been misled (Field v. Henning, Dowling, 450; 1 M. & H. 21, s. c.) Where defendant had, by judge's order, admitted a document, described as a counterpart of a lease, and at the trial, the instrument turned out to be a lease with only a counterpart stamp; he was held to be precluded by his admission from taking the objection (Doe Wright v. Smith, 3 New. & P. 335); vide Archb. Prac. 7 Ed. by Chitty, p. 214. E. A.

Law Reports.

VICE CHANCELLOR'S COURT.

IN RE MRS. TAYLOR.

CUSTODY of INFANTS ACT, 2 & 3 Vict. c. 54.
(a) Right of a married Woman who has absented herself from her Husband's house to have access to her children under this Statute.

We have in a former volume reported this case when the application was made in November last by Mr. K. Bruce, on behalf of Mrs. Taylor, (b) for an order of access to her children under the provisions of the recent Statute, 2 and 3 Vict. c. 54. The application was the first made under that statute.

Mr. K. Bruce now appeared to support the petition of Mrs. Elizabeth Henrietta Taylor, praying that the court, under the provisions of the act, would make an order, directing that she may have the custody of such of her infant children as are under the age of seven, and that she might be permitted access to those who were above that age; her husband, Mr. John Donnithan Taylor, having for some time past denied her all intercourse with her children. It appears that Mr. and Mrs. Taylor were married in 1830, when the former was 33 years of age, and Mr. Taylor 19. There was issue of the marriage six children, five of whom were now living, two of them being under the age of seven, and the other three being in advance of that age. The circumstances which led to the separation which unfortunately took place between the parties, as related by Mrs. Taylor, appear to be these:— During the month of October, 1837, and shortly subsequent to her confinement of her last child, a Miss Holah, the governess of her children, both when they were residing at St. Leonard's and subsequently at the family residence, Southgate, Middlesex, hinted to, and gave Mrs. Taylor reason to believe that an intimacy of an improper nature had taken place between Mr. Taylor and one Hannah Morris, who was then living in the family as nurse; Mrs. Taylor being in great distress of mind in consequence of this communication, she imparted the knowledge thereof to Mr. Christopher Arthur Harris, a married man, who had arrived at her house at Southgate, on a visit, on the 19th October, 1837, and who it appears was the first cousin of Mr. Taylor, and with whom it was stated both Mr. and her husband were on terms of the greatest intimacy and friendship, and who was in the constant habit of visiting the family at their house at Woodlands. Upon the information being given to Mr. Harris, it was alleged that Miss Holah reiterated her former statements to Mr. Harris, who then advised Mrs. Taylor to meet him the next day at the house of Mr. and Mrs. Farquharson, mutual friends of Mr. and Mrs. Taylor, residing in Grafton Street, Fitzroy Square. At this period, Mrs. Taylor had written a letter to the trustees of her marriage settlement, stating the criminal charge which was brought against her husband, and requesting them immediately to interfere on her behalf. That letter was subsequently on the same day forwarded to Mr. Harford, one of her trustees. In the course of that day, the 20th October, 1837, the meeting took place at Mr. Farquharson's house, at Grafton Street, when it was stated that Miss Holah again re-asserted the charges against Mr. Taylor. Mr. Harris, upon that occasion, proposed to Mrs. Taylor that she should take the advice of a friend of his (Mr. Harris's) upon the subject, and a Mr. Andrews was accordingly introduced to Mrs. Taylor for that purpose. Upon Mr. Andrews being consulted as to what could be done in the matter, he suggested that she could obtain a divorce, but that if she returned again to her husband's house, knowing and believing her husband to be guilty of the criminal conduct imputed to him, she never could do anything afterwards, let the conduct of her husband be what it might, as her turning home under such circumstances would constitute condonation on her part. Mrs. Taylor, as she stated, believing and confiding in the advice of Mr. Andrews, and under the idea that she were then to return home she never could see any means to alleviate her situation, and being in a very afflicted and excited state of mind, without any previous preparation, determined to send the letter she had written to the trustees, and not to return home again to her husband's house; and on the same day she went, accompanied by Mr. Harris, and took up her residence at the house of a Mr. and Mrs. Schneider, living in Beaver Hall, Southgate, and who were on terms of intimacy with Mr. Taylor's family, riding home in her carriage Miss Holah, with two of her children, who had accompanied her to town that morning. During this transaction, Mr. Taylor appears to have been absent from home, in Northamptonshire, and returned to Southgate on the afternoon on the 20th of October. Mrs. Taylor's abandonment of her home led to a correspondence between Mr. Harris and Mr. Schneider, on the part of Mrs. Taylor, and her friends on the behalf of Mr. Taylor, wherein it would seem Mrs. Taylor's friends claimed for her a total separation from her husband, and a separate maintenance of £1,500 a year. Mr.

Taylor indignantly denied the truth of the charges brought against him, and even made an offer through one of his friends to Mrs. Taylor's advisers to have a reconciliation with his wife, without any conditions, to receive her back again to his home, and to the comfort of being with her children, but that offer was rejected; but it would appear that the fact of that offer was not then communicated to her. It would seem that Mrs. Taylor's advisers did not make any difficulty about her relinquishing access to her children in their proposals for a separation, but as soon as Mrs. Taylor understood, that, if a separation was to be effected, it was the determination of Mr. Taylor to deny her all access to her children, she immediately wrote him a letter, in which she solemnly asserted she never entertained the slightest intention of giving them up, and offered for their sakes to consign to oblivion all that had taken place. That letter it would appear was returned unopened, matters having now taken by far too serious an aspect. A formal offer was then made by Mrs. Taylor, through her solicitor, to return home to her husband, but he now refused to receive her without a total retraction of the charges with which she had accused him, but which Mrs. Taylor considered she could not conscientiously perform, as she had then no ground to gainsay the truth of what Miss Holah had imparted to her. Mrs. Taylor finding that her husband would not receive her back, or allow her access to the children, in July, 1838, instituted a suit in the Consistory Court against her husband for a restitution of conjugal rights, to which Mr. Taylor put in what was termed a defensive allegation, alleging that Mrs. Taylor had alienated herself from him voluntarily, and that she had set up a false and groundless charge of adultery against him, having for its object the obtaining of a separation, and a large separate maintenance. Dr. Lushington, the judge of the Consistory Court, rejected the allegation, as no legal defence to the suit, and pronounced a sentence in favour of Mrs. Taylor for a restitution of conjugal rights. Mr. Taylor thereupon appealed to the Court of Arches, but Sir Herbert Jenner confirmed the sentence of the Court below. Mr. Taylor being, nevertheless, dissatisfied with the decision of the Court of Arches, had since appealed to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and that appeal was now pending. During the whole of this time Mrs. Taylor alleged that she had been denied all access to her children, with the exception only that she had seen them once at the house of her sister-in-law, Mrs. Walker, at Southgate. It was then stated, it would appear, that subsequently Miss Holah denied the greater part of what it had been alleged she had communicated to Mrs. Taylor, and wholly admitted that Mr. Taylor:

was altogether guiltless of any improper familiarity with the nurse Morris. Mrs. Taylor, upon learning this, avowed she could no longer place any confidence on what Miss Holah had stated to her, and feeling that she had been grossly deceived by the misrepresentations of Miss Holah, she at once withdrew the charge against her husband altogether. Matters were in this position when, in October, 1839, this petition was presented to this Court. It appears that Mrs. Taylor had expressed to her husband in the most ample and humble manner her sorrow for having imputed the criminal charges to her husband, she being thoroughly persuaded that Miss Holah had practised the most gross deception upon her. It further appears that Mr. Taylor, since the separation, and long previously to the institution of the suit in the Ecclesiastical Court had given up his house at Southgate, and had retired to France, taking his children with him, in which country they are now resident, being committed to the care of Miss Holah, who still continues their governess. This is a brief outline of the facts contained in the affidavits first made by Mrs. Taylor in support of the petition. To these Mr. Taylor filed affidavits in reply, which contained the most solemn denials on the part of Mr. Taylor and Hannah Morris that there was the slightest shadow of truth in the criminal accusation which had been brought against them, and they also contained the positive denials of Miss Holah, of the statements it had been alleged she had made to Mrs. Taylor. But Miss Holah, in order to explain what really did occur, stated that she had told Mrs. Taylor of the impertinence of Hannah Morris, in saying, one day, whilst the infant was crying in the absence of its mother, "That if she had known Mrs. Taylor was to meet Harris, she could not have been surprised, as she cared more for Harris than her child." Miss Holah also stated in her affidavit that it was Mrs. Taylor who first mentioned to her about the criminal conduct imputed to Mr. Taylor, and that Mrs. Taylor told her Harris said he could prove it. In confirmation of this, it did appear that Harris had on several occasions said he could prove it, and had even stated a particular occurrence in Mr. Taylor's bed-room which he said he had seen by reflection in a looking glass. One thing was quite apparent upon the evidence—namely, that Hannah Morris had been always treated by the family with much familiarity. It also appeared from the affidavits, that Mr. Taylor had made every effort to bring about an unconditional reconciliation with his wife, and had even sent a friend of Taylor, in his first affidavit in reply, stated, that he found in his wife's escritoire an open box, containing letters written in the Italian language relating to intrigues with women, in which Harris had been engaged, when he was residing in his earlier days in Italy. Mr. Taylor further stated, that his mind had been much irritated by reports which he had heard of Harris constantly visiting with Mrs. Taylor in a wood, from which the children were excluded; but, at the same time Mr. Taylor expressed his complete conviction that Mrs. Taylor had not been guilty of any improper conduct of that sort. Affidavits were then filed in reply to Mr. Taylor's affidavit, in which Harris took a prominent part. It seems Harris had dared Mr. Taylor to prove that any impropriety of conduct had ever existed between him and Mrs. Taylor, and had written a letter to Mr. Taylor in which he designated him as a scoundrel and a coward. Harris solemnly denied every thing that had been stated with regard to him and Mrs. Taylor, and retaliated on Mr. Taylor, by charging him with irreligion, and in giving utterance to blasphemous expressions in their private conversations; and, as regarding the Italian letters, he said they had been given to Mrs. Taylor to put up by her husband's directions, and that Mrs. Taylor did not know their contents—Mrs. Taylor never read them, and did not understand the Italian language. Others of these affidavits in reply, contained charges imputing to Mr. Taylor great and uncontrollable hastiness and violence of temper, acts of cruelty and violence towards his wife, and also towards his domestic animals. Four instances only were mentioned. The first was that he threw back about the room when in a fit of passion, and by frightening his wife by driving on some occasion an unbroken horse in his carriage; a third was that of ill treatment to a favourite horse of Mrs. Taylor's, in order to annoy her; and lastly, cruelty towards a horse of his own, although he was a great sportsman, fond of hunting and of horses. It was also charged against him that he had interdicted all intercourse between his wife and her family, in consequence of his being lost nearly £10,000. by the bankruptcy of his father; and it was, moreover, averred that Mr. Taylor and Miss Holah were teaching the children to disrespect their mother, and to exclude her name from their prayers. Affidavits were filed in reply to these on behalf of Mr. Taylor, positively denying the truth of all these charges, and the clergyman of the Church which Mr. Taylor was in the habit of attending, by his affidavit stated, that Mr. Taylor was constantly and uniformly attentive to his religious duties, and

was thought to be sufficient and more from the prayers, in order to prevent their asking questions, which would be painful to answer with regard to their mother. It further appeared that although Mr. Taylor was, at times, of rather a nasty temper, yet that generally he was a most kind-hearted, generous man, most doatingly fond of his children, and that he had been throughout a kind and affectionate husband and father. It seems also that Harris had since these unfortunate differences arose between the parties, become bankrupt, that there were large debts, that no dividend had been as yet paid, or was likely to be paid, and that he had not obtained his certificate. The learned counsel who supported the petition contended that it was admitted on all sides that Mrs. Taylor's whole conduct was unimpeachable in every respect, and that the error she had committed by being induced, at one time, to believe that her husband had been guilty of improper intimacy with Morris, which charge she afterwards, when she was convinced she had been deceived as to the truth of it, most willingly and submissively withdrew, and expressed her deep and poignant sorrow at what had taken place, was not an offence for which she should forever be punished by denying her all access to her children. The Ecclesiastical Courts had already twice decided that she was entitled to be restored to her husband and to her children. They submitted, that under all the circumstances of this case, Mrs. Taylor was entitled, as a matter of right, to have access to her children; and it was therefore hoped the court would make an order to that effect, which order might be enforced either personally against the father, or by sequestration of his property.

KING v. BURRELL.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATION ACT, s. s. 15, 48.
—LIABILITIES of OVERSEERS to Penalties for not making out and signing proper alphabetical lists of the Burgesses.

This was an action of debt to recover a penalty of £50. from the defendant, one of the overseers of the parish of St. Margaret, in the Borough of King's Lynn, for not making and signing a proper burgess list for that parish, which was tried before Lord Chief Justice TINDALL, when a verdict was found for the plaintiff, with leave for the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit or to arrest the judgment. A rule Nisi had been granted, and now came on for argument. It appeared that the parish of St. Margaret's by a local Act of Parliament was divided into nine wards, and there was an overseer of the poor for each ward. By the Municipal Corporation Act, sec. 15, the overseers were directed to make out a burgess list in the manner in the act mentioned, and to sign such burgess list, and deliver the same to the town clerk on the 5th of September. Then by the 48th sec. it was enacted that, if any overseer should neglect or refuse to make out and sign such list, he should be liable to a penalty of £50. It appeared that in this parish each overseer had made out a list for his own ward, so that there were nine lists, to eight of which was affixed only the name of the overseer whose list it was, but the defendant had wholly omitted to sign the list which he had delivered to the town-clerk. The plaintiff charged this as a wilful omission, but the defendant said it was accidental.

Mr. Kelly shewed cause against the rule, and contended that, whether the omission was wilful, or arose from negligence, still the defendant was equally liable to the penalty, and that such was the intention of the legislature, in order to compel overseers to do their duty.

The Attorney-General for the rule contended that, if it was to be considered that overseers were liable to this penalty for every act of omission which arose purely from negligence or inadvertence, it would be a most hard case upon a man who might be perfectly innocent of any design in the matter. The legislature could only have intended to visit a party with so heavy a penalty for a wilful act. But that here there was no omission, for that the signatures of eight of the overseers (that forming a majority of the entire number) made one entire list, and, therefore, the Act of Parliament had been complied with.

Lord DENMAN said this was an action brought, under the Municipal Corporation Act, by the plaintiff against the defendant, one of the overseers of the poor of the parish of St. Margaret's, Lynn, to recover a penalty of £50., for not making out and signing an alphabetical list of the burgesses of the said parish. This declaration was founded on the 15th section of the Municipal Reform Act, which provided for the manner in which overseers were to make out lists in their respective parishes. It required that the overseers should make out and sign such burgess lists, and deliver them to the town clerk. The 48th section created the penalty, and enacted that, if any overseer of any parish should neglect or refuse to make out, sign, and deliver such list, he should forfeit £50. It was upon these sections this action was founded. It is important to observe that these two sections are the only security for carrying this act into effect.

There was nothing but the provisions of these two sections to provide a punishment for an individual who refused or neglected to perform his duty. The whole was left unprovided for but for these two sections. He then came to the question of the meaning of these provisions. The declaration properly stated that the defendant had neglected and refused to make out and sign the list of his parish. This was an infraction of the provisions of the 15th section, and an offence within the meaning of the act. Then it was said that the defendant was entitled to a nonsuit, because there was no neglect, or, if there was any neglect, that it was not wilful, and then a further argument was raised, that the declaration was bad on other grounds. In the first place it was said that he had in truth made out and signed the lists, and upon this subject the facts were, that this parish was divided into nine wards, and there was one overseer for each ward, and each of the overseers acted for his particular ward; and it appeared that eight of these overseers had signed a list for his ward, but that the defendant, who acted for the ninth ward, did not sign the list in question. This was said to bring the case within the words of the 48th section, and certainly they appeared to him to apply directly to a person so acting. It was said, in answer, that inasmuch as they all gave in their lists, and he made his name appear in the lists, although he did not sign it, that might be taken as a signature by him, by analogy to the cases on the statute of fraud. He must own that it appeared to him that nothing could be more clear than the words of the Act of Parliament, that signing could not but be understood as placing the name at the bottom of the list, and that placing it in any other part was not a compliance with the Act of Parliament, but constituted a breach of its provisions. It was then contended that they could not be said to be wilfully done, and the fact that there was no such allegation on the record had been put forward as a ground for the motion in arrest of judgment. It appeared to him that it was unnecessary to state or prove any such thing. The intention of the law was, that parties entrusted with a duty of this kind must know what were the provisions of a statute relating to that duty, and that if they neglected to comply with those provisions, they must be punished for their neglect. It was a wise and prudent precaution on the part of the legislature, for if in every such case there must be an inquiry as to whether the act was done from corrupt motives, there would be no end to such inquiries, and the legislature to be so punished. Then it was said it might be pushed to an inconvenience; but he must say he did not think this could be borne out. It was said, supposing a party desirous of doing the act, but prevented by a superior force, he did not wilfully omit it, but he apprehended that a party who could prove that fact would show he had not contravened the Act of Parliament. Then it was said, that a strict construction of the act would make him liable to a penalty, if the list was not alphabetical. He did not think that the true construction of the act; it did not mean the perfect collocation of every letter of every word, so as to be alphabetical according to the meaning of that phrase when used by a dictionary compiler, but a list so framed as to be capable of easy reference by the means of an ordinary alphabetical arrangement. The declaration was then said to be bad, for though it charged the defendant with not making out and signing a list, it did not say that in fact the list was not made out, each of the other overseers having made out and signed his portion, and all the portions together being said to constitute one list. He thought that no objection to the declaration—it seemed to him that each party was to answer for his own act, and the act of all the rest could not make one individual more or less guilty than he was by his own act. Supposing it had been signed by the majority of the overseers, yet if the defendant had neglected his own duty in respect of it he would be punishable for that neglect, and it was unnecessary to aver that the other overseer had or had not signed the list. It was possible that the majority of the overseers might have signed the list, and so not have contravened the Act of Parliament; and as the act of the majority was in every case the act of all, it was insisted that this was a sufficient answer to the action. If that was really a good defence in point of fact, it must be assumed now that that defence was negatived, for otherwise the act of this particular defendant would be excused, and yet on the facts the jury had found a verdict against him. On these grounds he was of opinion, first, that it was the duty of all the overseers to sign the burgess list of their parish; and secondly, that if any one of them was proved to the satisfaction of a jury to have neglected that duty, he would have incurred the penalty imposed by the act. Thirdly, that the fact of other persons having signed particular portions of the list, while he had in truth not signed his part, such part being necessary to make the rest complete, would not excuse him from the penalty.

DAVIES v. CHAPMAN.

EVISE of Testator's FREEHOLD lands in cer-

Lord Ashburton, by will, duly attested to pass real estate, devised as follows:—"I give, bequeath, and devise all my freehold lands, manors, estates, and real property whatever, situate in the county of Devon, to my wife, Lady Ashburton, to hold and enjoy the same for the term of her life: and whereas it appears to me that one part of my said freehold lands, namely, those lands which I hold in the parishes of Walkhampton, of Buckland Monachorum, and of Meary, were held for a considerable period of time by my father's ancestors in the male line, bearing the name and arms of Dunning, as hereditary proprietors of the same; I therefore consider it just and equitable that those lands should continue to be held, if possible, by persons of the same name and family; and although I have no son or daughter, nor other heir male known to me, yet whereas it is possible that some distant male heir may exist, although unknown to me; I therefore give, bequeath, and devise the said lands which I hold in the above parishes, and extend to that person who may, at the moment of my wife's death, in case of her surviving me, or at the moment of my own death, in case of my surviving her, be my nearest relation and male of the name of Dunning, or in case the same be dead, and the heirs male of his body in fee, &c.: and if no person can produce a valid claim to the same by this devise within three years, &c., in that case I hereby reserve that special proviso, &c. &c. I declare that the said lands were in the possession of my father in Devon." The testator then bequeathed his freehold lands, manors, estates, and real property whatever, situate in Devon, to his wife, &c., after the death of his wife, &c. &c. The will was proved in the High Court of Chancery, and the same was confirmed by the Lord Chancellor.

will then contained a bequest of all the testator's leasehold estates in Devon to his wife, till the expiration of his interest therein in 1845, with a provision in case of her death before that period, and appointed her his executrix. The testator died 23rd of March, 1823, leaving Lady Ashburton surviving him. At the time of his death the testator was possessed of the leasehold lands in question, which were situated in the parish of Walkhampton and Buckland Monachorum, and which were held by him for the residue of a term of one thousand years, created in 1650, and neither at the time of his death, nor of making his will, had he any other lands, either freehold or leasehold, in either of those two parishes. He had certain freehold lands in the parish of Meary as well as in other parts of the county of Devon, for none of which, however, was any defence taken in this ejectment. There was also certain leasehold estates in other parts of Devonshire, held under a term that would expire in 1845. Lady Ashburton, on the decease of her husband, took possession of the leaseholds in question, and held them till her death in July, 1835, previous to which she devised them to the defendant Lord Cranstoun. In the mean time one John Dunning made out his claim to the property devised in favour of the next collateral heir male to the testator, and died in May, 1839, leaving Richard Dunning, his eldest son, and heir-at-law. The present ejectment was brought by this Richard Dunning as such heir-at-law, and the other two plaintiffs as executors and residuary legatees of John Dunning, to recover the leasehold lands in question, on the ground that after the death of Lady Ashburton they had by force of the devise in the will of Lord Ashburton passed to John Dunning, as next collateral heir male.

Mr. Fitzherbert appeared for the lessor of the plaintiff, but he was stayed by the court, which called upon the defendant to support his defence.

Mr. Butt appeared for the defendant, who claimed under the devise made by Lady Ashburton, and disputed the right of the collateral male heir to take any thing but the freeholds in the parishes specified by the testator, Lord Ashburton, in his will. He cited Davis v. Gibbs (a), Hobson v. Blackburn (b), Thompson v. Lady Lawley (c).

Court was unanimously of opinion that the case was beyond all doubt. The simple question was, did the testator mean to devise any particular lands which might be accurately ascertained? If any such could be identified, then, even though they might be inaccurately described in the will, such as in this instance was the case in respect of the tenure, the rule of law was clear, and gave effect to the devise. It had always been held that falsa demonstratio non nocet. Now, here was simply a falsa demonstratio, by applying the term "freehold" instead of "leasehold" to this property, which having been held by those who bore the name and arms of Dunning in the male line for more than two centuries, the testator, as an act of justice, devised them all to his collateral male heir of that name, if any such should appear within three years after his demise. Such a person did appear, and it was clear that he was entitled to all the lands, as well leasehold as freehold, in those parishes, though the devise specified them to be freehold. In Comyns' Digest (e) it is said, "If the thing described is sufficiently averred it is sufficient, though all the particulars are not true; as if a man conveyed his house in D which was R. Cotton's, when it was Thomas Cotton's."

COURT OF REVIEW.—July 25.

FIAT v. MATTHEW WOTHERSPOON.
Ex parte JAMES BATESON, Assignee of the Bankrupt.

COMPOSITION — STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS —

Whether a Composition made more than ten years since, and the whole not paid before the Bankruptcy, the ORIGINAL DEBT is revived, and can be proved under the Fiat.

This petition involved a question of very high importance to commercial men. It stated that on the 1st of January, 1829, the bankrupt Henry Donaldson entered into partnership with merchants in Liverpool for seven years, which was carried on under the firm of Donaldson and Wotherspoon up to the death of the said Henry Donaldson, which took place on the 8th of March, 1830, and subsequent thereto by the bankrupt under the same firm, Messrs. Donaldson and Wotherspoon, opened a banking account amount of the balance due on the composition. The affidavit of Mr. Lace was to the effect that all his letters to the bankrupt had reference to the full debt owing by the bankrupt to Fletcher, Roscoe, & Co., and not to the balance of the composition.

Mr. Dixon supported the petition, and contended that the assignees of Fletcher, Roscoe, & Co. could only be admitted to prove for the balance of the composition, upon the principle that an acknowledgment of a debt without a promise to pay a particular sum would only carry nominal damages.

Rose, J. said, the question is what assumpsit is to be raised.

Mr. Swanston, for the respondents, contended that as the composition had not been paid the original debt still existed—that the composition was not binding—there was only one debt—and the payments had been made on account of the original debt upon which a composition had been proposed, but never carried into operation.

Cross, J.—You may take it that the whole debt is distinctly admitted; the question is, whether the promise to be implied is a promise to pay.

Mr. Anderdon, for the petitioner, said this was a very important question, and the recent decisions in the courts at Westminster had established the principle under Lord Tenterden's Act, that a party must, in addition to acknowledging the debt in writing, state the sum he would pay, and the bankrupt's letters had reference to the composition.

Rose, J. was of opinion that the letters of the bankrupt must be taken to refer to the original debt, which was consequently revived, and the Commissioners were correct in admitting the proof.

Cross, J. said, the bankrupt's letter of the 18th of Feb. 1832, which appears upon the petition, says, "the balance shall be arranged;" this is a distinct and unqualified acknowledgment of the original debt. The receipt referred to the composition, yet as that had not been paid, there was but one debt, and that was the original sum due.

Petition dismissed with costs. The costs of all parties to come out of the estate.

BUDD AND ANOTHER, EXECUTORS OF C. R. BROUGHTON, ESQ. v. EDWARDS.

COMPETENCY of a WITNESS—HUSBAND and WIFE.

This was an action brought to recover the amount of two checks, and also a bill of exchange, alleged to be given by the defendant in 1824. The defendant pleaded the Statute of Limitations, and several other pleas. The principal question in the cause was as to an alleged part payment in goods, so as to take the case out of the statute.

Mr. Luddy, the only witness for the plaintiffs to prove the facts, was called. He was objected to as incompetent, and was examined as to his interest. It appeared that the testator by his will had bequeathed to Eliza Ann Morton, the wife of the witness, all the property, furniture, goods, silver, and credits which should appertain to him at his decease. The witness produced a release which he had executed to the plaintiffs.

Mr. Thesiger, for the plaintiffs, argued that the release made him a competent witness.

III. And be it enacted, that the officers, clerks, and messengers who shall be appointed as herein-before directed, and the present officers, clerks, and messengers of the said court, shall receive by way of salary or additional salary for the performance of their several duties such annual sums as the Lord Chancellor and the commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury shall from time to time fix and determine; and that the same, and the expense of copying and writing for the said court or any of the officers thereof, shall be paid and payable under an order of the said Court of Chancery out of the interest and dividends of the Government or Parliamentary securities which may at any time be standing in the name of the accountant-general of the High Court of Chancery to an account entitled "account of monies placed out for the benefit and better security of the suitors of the High Court of Chancery," and to an account entitled, "account of securities purchased with surplus interest arising from securities carried to an account of monies placed out for the benefit and better security of the suitors of the High Court of Chancery," or either of them (but subject and without prejudice to the payment of any salaries and other sums of money by any Act or Acts of Parliament now in force directed or authorised to be paid thereout); provided that nothing herein contained shall authorise the diminution of any of the several salaries to which the present officers, clerks, and messengers are now entitled.

IV. And whereas the emoluments of some of the officers of the said court may be diminished by the operation of this act, or by the rules and orders to be made thereunder, for which they may claim to have compensation made; be it therefore enacted, that it shall be lawful for the commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury for the time being, or any three or more of them, and they are hereby required, within the space of six calendar months after any such claim shall arise and be made, by examination on oath or otherwise, (which oath they and each of them are and is hereby authorised to administer), to inquire whether any, and if any what, compensation ought to be made by any officer or person claiming such compensation, the said commissioner having regard to the conditions on which the appointment of any such officer was made, or to any notice which at the time of such appointment may have been given to such officer that such officer was to be holden subject to any provision by Parliament for the abolition or regulation thereof, but with full power for the said commissioners to investigate and determine whether, from the nature of the said offices or the mode of accession thereto, any such conditions or notice could have been properly made or given and also having regard to the holding of any office, place, or situation by such officer under this act; and that in all cases in which it shall appear to the said commissioners that compensation ought to be granted it shall be lawful for the said commissioners, or any three or more of them, by warrant under their hands, to order and direct that such annual or other compensation shall be made to the persons so claiming such compensation as aforesaid, or any of them, as to the said commissioners in their discretion shall seem just reasonable; and all such compensations, whether annual or in gross, shall be issued and paid and payable by the said accountant general of the said Court of Chancery, by virtue of an order or orders for that purpose to be made by the said Court of Chancery, out of the interest and dividends that have arisen or may hereafter arise from the Government or Parliamentary securities now or hereafter to be placed to the said two accounts in the Bank of England standing in the name of the said accountant general of the said Court of Chancery, and entitled "account of monies placed out for the benefit and better security of the suitors of the High Court of Chancery," and "account of securities purchased with surplus interest arising from securities carried to an account of monies placed out for the benefit and better security of the suitors of the High Court of Chancery," (but subject and without prejudice to the payment of all salaries and sums of money by which any act or acts now in force are authorized to be paid thereout): provided always, that an account of all such compensations shall, within fourteen days next after the same shall be so granted, be laid upon the table of the House of Commons, if Parliament shall be then assembled, or if Parliament shall not be then assembled, then within fourteen days after the meeting of Parliament then next assembled.

V. And be it enacted, that in the construction of this act the expression "Lord Chancellor" shall mean also and include the Lord Chancellor, Lord Keeper and Lords Commissioners for the custody of the great seal of the United Kingdom for the time being.

VI. And be it enacted, that this act may be altered, amended, or repealed during the present session of Parliament.

POSTAGE RETURNS.

Returns showing the effect of the late reductions in the rates of postage have just been printed by the order of the House of Commons. The steady progressive increase of the number of letters is highly satisfactory, especially under the present dull and depressed state of trade. Even with the short and limited experience of the working of the penny postage, we may augur that the phenomena of the number of letters standing still or retrograding, with an increasing population and increasing trade, are passed away.

One return shows the number of chargeable letters passing through the General Post in London since the first reduction was made: and those for the corresponding period of 1839. The result stands thus:

|-----------------------|-----------------------|
| FOUR WEEKS ENDING.    | FOUR WEEKS ENDING.    |
| Total No. of Letters. | Total No. of Letters. |
| 5th Jan. 1,500,916    | 4th Jan. 2,102,281    |
| 2d Feb. 1,543,375     | 1st Feb. 3,004,266    |
| 2d March 1,557,880    | 29th Feb. 3,338,074   |
| 30th March 1,604,356  | 28th March 3,372,667  |
| 27th April 1,656,316  | 25th April 3,404,900  |
| 25th May 1,619,765    | 23d May 3,461,278     |
| 22d June 1,649,020    | 20th June 3,665,193   |

The second return relates to the London district post. It appears that in the first four weeks after the reduction from 2d. and 3d. to 1d. 1,302,555 letters passed through this post. In the four weeks ending June 20, these numbers had increased to 1,702,344, or above 30 per cent. Before any change whatever, the average weekly number of letters was 254,225. The weekly average at the present time is 423,086, so that the metropolitan local letters have increased upwards of 60 per cent. It is a safe prophecy to say that if this ratio of increase continues, not many months will elapse before the reduction in this post will be actually profitable to the revenue.

The third return shows the progress of the weekly numbers for the whole of the kingdom, in monthly intervals:—

| Week ending                         | Number of Letters. |
|-------------------------------------|--------------------|
| 24th Nov. 1839, (before any change) | 1,585,973          |
| 22d Dec. 1839 (4d. rate)            | 2,008,687          |
| 23d Feb. 1840 (1d. rate)            | 3,199,637          |
| 22d March, 1840                     | 3,069,496          |
| 26th April, 1840                    | 2,954,866          |
| 22d May, 1840                       | 3,138,035          |
| 21st June, 1840                     | 3,221,265          |

The week ending 26th April being Easter week, and consequently an universal holiday week, accounts for the slight falling off in the week. Excepting this week, and the first week after the reduction to 1d., it will be seen that the numbers have been increasing for the last three months. It may be as well to remind our readers that the fourpenny rate came into operation on the 5th December, the penny rate on the 10th January, and the stamps on the 6th May.

pose from the seller. In such cases the custody of the warehouseman has been sometimes considered as in the nature of a transit; and questions have arisen as to the power of the seller to countermand an order that may have been received by the warehouseman upon discovering the insolvency of the buyer (b). Upon such a question it is important to ascertain whether, according to the nature and subject-matter of the contract, any other act on the part of the seller is to precede the actual delivery of the goods. If nothing is to precede it, and the order has been handed by the buyer to the warehouseman, and he has made the usual entry in his books, changing the name of the proprietor (c), or even if he has not made such entry (d), the handing of the order to the warehouseman is a constructive taking possession by the buyer, and the order cannot be countermanded. A fortiori it cannot be countermanded if the buyer has actually removed from the warehouse a part of an entire quantity of goods sold at one fixed and entire price (e). But if any thing is to be previously done on the part of the seller to ascertain the amount of the price, or to ascertain and perfect the specific subject of the sale—such, for instance, as weighing the goods (f)—an order for delivery may be countermanded before such previous act has been done. Thus where a person contracted to sell all his starch then lying at the warehouse of another, at a certain price per hundred weight, to be paid for by a bill of exchange, and a certain number of days was allowed for the delivery, and the seller wrote an order to the warehouseman to weigh and deliver all his starch to the buyer, and the buyer handed the order to the warehouseman, who weighed a part which the buyer removed, and then the buyer failed before the residue was weighed, it was held that the seller might lawfully countermand the delivery of the residue (g). So where a quantity of oil in casks was sold, and according to the course of trade the casks were to be searched by the seller's cooper, the quantity of impure matter to be ascertained by a person attending on behalf of both parties, and the casks to be filled up at the seller's expense, it was held that the order which had been delivered to the warehouseman, might be countermanded (h) before these things were done. On the other hand, upon a sale of ten tons of oil, being part of forty tons contained in one cistern, where nothing remained to be done except to draw off the ten from the forty, it was determined that the seller could not countermand the order after it had been placed in the hands of the warehouseman (i). But although something may remain to be done so that the delivery be not complete, yet if the buyer sell the goods to a third person, and the wharfinger certify to such third person that he has transferred the goods to his account, who thereupon pay the price, the wharfinger thereby makes himself responsible to the third person, and cannot defend himself against his claim on the right of the first seller to stop the goods (k).

But a second vendee, who neglects to take actual or constructive possession, is in the same situation as the first vendee towards whom he claims. His title is defeated on non-payment of the price by the first vendee (l), unless, indeed, he take up a bond fide indorsement to him of a bill of lading, for valuable consideration. It very frequently happens that common carriers are also warehousemen, so that it requires great nicety to decide in what character the party is chargeable, for the responsibilities of the two characters are very different, he may in one character be liable for a loss, from which he would be exempt in the other: as for instance a common carrier is liable for losses by fire without any negligence of him or his servants, or as LORD HOLT describes a common carrier is that kind of bailee who is liable, though there be no actual negligence, but a warehouseman is not liable for loss by fire, unless he has been guilty of ordinary negligence. This was determined in Garside v. the proprietors of the Trust

(c) Harman and others v. Anderson and others, 2 Camp. 243, per Lord ELLENBOROUGH.

(l) Craven v. Ryder, 6 Taunt. 638; Dixon v. Mante; Small v. Moates, 9 Bing. 574.

Mersey Navigation,<sup>(m)</sup> where a common carrier, from Stourport to Manchester, undertook to carry goods from the former to the latter place, and to forward them from thence to Stockport. Upon arrival at Manchester the goods were deposited in his warehouse, to await an opportunity of sending them on to Stockport by the Stockport carrier, there being none there at that time, to whom they could be sent on. Before he had an opportunity of forwarding them, they were destroyed by an accidental fire. It also appeared, that, according to the course of business, when goods were sent from Stourport, to go beyond Manchester, any carrier to the place of their destination be at Manchester ready to receive them, they are immediately delivered upon payment of the carriage from Stourport to Manchester, and if not, the defendants kept them in their warehouse till a carrier arrived, to whom they might be delivered, making the above payment, the defendants not charging any thing for lodging and keeping the goods in their warehouse. Some time before the goods in question were delivered to the defendants, their agent told the plaintiff, that if he would send all his goods by them, they would forward them to Stockport by the first carrier that should come there, without insisting on being paid the carriage before they delivered them, and would settle with him when they met. LORD KENYON said—"If the defendants were considered merely as warehousemen, there could be no pretence to say that they were liable for such an accident as the present. The case of a carrier stands by itself upon peculiar grounds; he is held responsible as insurer; and the reason given in the books (whether well or ill founded was immaterial) is, to prevent fraud. But I do not see how we can couple the character of the carrier with that of the warehouseman, in which last the defendants are not liable here, they not having been guilty of laches." And BULLER, J. observed, that the keeping of the goods in the warehouse was not for the convenience of the carrier, but of the owner of the goods, for when the voyage to Manchester was performed, it was the interest of the carrier to get rid of them directly, and it was only because there was no person ready at Manchester to receive these goods, that the defendants were obliged to keep them. And THE COURT held that the defendants were not liable, because their duty as carriers had terminated, and their duty as warehousemen had commenced before the loss, and it made no difference that they received no distinct compensation as warehousemen.

But if at the time of the fire and consequent loss, the carrier's duty had not been completed, as in Forward v. Pittard,<sup>(n)</sup> where the deposit was made in a warehouse at an intermediate place, in the course of his own route, or as in Hyde v. the Trent Navigation Company,<sup>(o)</sup> where the carrier, after the arrival of the goods at their place of destination, was still bound to deliver them to the owner, and before such delivery, he had put them into his own warehouse for safe custody, where they were consumed by fire, in such and the like cases he would be liable, because his duty as carrier was not completed; and although he is acting as a warehouseman, and makes a distinct charge for warehouse-room, and also for the cartage of the goods from the warehouse to their destination, he is nevertheless considered as a carrier, the delivery of the goods to the owner being always by usage considered the proper duty of a carrier.

There are also cases where goods are sent to be left at the warehouse of the carrier, till called for by the owner: in these cases the duty of the carrier ends when the goods arrive at his warehouse, and his duty as

BANKRUPTCY.

CREDITORS' ASSIGNEES — What are their rights, duties, and liabilities?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LEGAL GUIDE.

ANSWER TO PROBLEM 11. —VOL. 4.

INTERESSE TERMINI—What is it?

Interesse Termini is the interest in a term, which a lessee has before entry (Co. Litt. 46 b. 270 b.) A bare lease without entry does not vest any estate in the lessee; but only gives him a right of entry upon the tenement, which right is called his interest in the term (2 Blacks. Com. 144). What this interest is will best be shewn by pointing out in what respects it falls short of the estate vested in the lessee upon entry.

Before doing this, it is to be remarked that the right under consideration is not affected by the death of either the lessor or the lessee; but that, if the lessee dies before entry, his executor or administrator may enter: or the lessee or his executor may enter though the lessor dies before. If the lease is made to several persons, and one of them dies, his interest survives (Com. Dig. Est. G.) It is grantable to another (Co. Litt. 46 b.)

As above observed, the lessee before entry has only his right of entry: but when he has actually entered, and so accepted the grant, the estate is then vested in him, and he is possessed of the term of years (2 Blacks. Com. 144). Now, since a release, which enures by enlargement, cannot work without a possession, — either an actual estate in possession or a vested interest in the releasee.—it is evident that one who has only an interesse termini cannot receive a release of the reversion; after entry he can, for then he has possession by force of the lease, and the release made to him by the lessor, or by his heir, “is sufficient to him by reason of the privity which by force of the lease is between them, &c.” (Litt. § 459). But such release will operate to extinguish the rent. Lord Coke, in his commentary on the above passage of Littleton, puts this case, “If a man make a lease for years, to begin presently, reserving a rent, if before the lessee doth enter, the lessor releaseth all the right that he hath in the land; albeit, this release cannot enlarge his estate; yet, it shall, in respect of the privity, extinguish the rent. And so it is, if a lease be made to begin at Michaelmas, reserving a rent, and before the day, the lessor release all the right that he hath in the land. this cannot enure to enlarge the estate, but to extinguish the rent in respect of the privity.” (Co. Litt. 270 b.)

An interesse termini cannot be the subject of a surrender; for a surrender is, properly, a yielding up of a less estate to him who has an immediate estate in reversion or remainder; but as this is a mere right, and not an estate, so there is no reversion wherein it may drown. By a surrender in law, however, it may be drowned as by accepting a new lease (Co. Litt. 338 a.). For the reason just before expressed, viz. because it is not an estate, it cannot be the subject of a confirmation (Co. Litt. 296 b). Lastly, it may be observed, that he who has only an interesse termini cannot maintain any action of trespass (1). GUILFORD.

(1) Our correspondent has not applied his talents to the solution of this Problem with that assiduity he should have done.

An interesse termini is merely an executory interest; and the right to enter under it, except when depending on an estate tail, cannot be barred or affected before the time when an entry would be authorized by the lease, grant, or limitation, conferring the interest. When that period is arrived, and the actual right to the possession is accrued, it may be barred like any other right of entry; but although it may then be barred, it cannot, until it is executed in possession by the entry of the person entitled under it, be so vested so as to prevent it from being transferred to a stranger, 4 Bac. Ab. Tit. Lease 195. And though such an interest cannot before entry be enlarged by a release from the lessor, on account of there being merely an interest and no actual estate in the lessee; yet a release to the lessee before entry from the lessor, of all right that he has in the land, will, in respect of the privity between them, extinguish the rent. Co. Litt. 270 b, and the lessor may, for the same reason, expressly release the rent to the lessee before entry. Id. 46, b. On the same principles, it should seem that a release to the lessor by the lessee before entry would be held to extinguish his interesse termini. And it has been decided that an assignment of it by him to the lessor will have that operation; Salmon v. Swann, Cro. Jac. 619. But it was determined in the recent case of Doe v. Walker, 5 Barn. & Cress. 111. that it will not merge in the freehold subsequently acquired. In 1788, a lease for 21 years was granted to J. W., which would expire at Michaelmas, 1809. In 1799, T. W., the lessor, granted another lease to J. W. of the same premises for a term of 60 years, to commence at Michaelmas, 1809; in the year 1800 T. W. died, having devised the same premises to J. W. for life; in 1806, J. W., by lease and release, conveyed away the legal estate of his life interest in the premises to a trustee in trust for him. J. W., therefore, had the legal estate for his own life from the testator's death in 1800 until 1806, when the legal estate was conveyed to his trustee; and it became a question, whether the term of 60 years was merged in the life estate; in other words, whether the term to commence in futuro in 1809, merged in the existing life estate. It was holden in the Court of King's Bench, that the reversionary term was not merged; for that being only an interesse termini, it did not acquire the character of an estate till after J. W. had conveyed away the legal interest for life; the two estates were not in him at the same time; there was, therefore, no merger of the interesse termini; but there was a merger of his lease for twenty-one years in the life estate; the Court observing that J. W. had nothing but his life estate until Michaelmas, 1809, and nothing but the term of 60 years after that period.

A DISCUSSION OF THE SMALL TENEMENTS ACT,
1 & 2 VICT. c. 74.

SIR,—As you have presented your readers with a copy of this useful act of Parliament (a). I take the liberty of offering the following remarks on such parts of it as have called for discussion in the practical working of its provisions.

Although the first sec. does not require that rent should have been actually paid to bring a case within its provisions, yet, I apprehend that it will always be necessary to obtain some acknowledgment of tenancy, an occupation as a servant will not, it is generally considered, bring a case within the act, and some doubt exists whether it applies so as to bring a mortgagor within its provisions, the inclination of opinion is, however, that it does: as the act being of a remedial and salutary nature, must be liberally construed. And in cases where a clear tenancy at will is established in a satisfactory manner (see Jones v. Jones, and Nicholl v. M'Kea, 10 B. & C. 718, 721), possession may be certainly recovered under it. But in cases where the only evidence to prove the tenancy is an agreement in writing, such writing must of course be stamped before it can be received in evidence, but whenever a tenancy can be sufficiently proved without reference to an unstamped agreement, a prima facie case is made out against the tenant; and if, in rebutting the complainant's case, the defendant relies on such written contract, the onus of producing it in evidence will be cast upon him.

As the words used in the statute are, "any person by whom the same shall be then actually occupied," it of course extends to empower justices to eject under-tenants.

The proof of the holding and the determination of the tenancy must show an undoubted right to recover possession, and will generally be the same as is required in ordinary cases; but from the wording of the statute, it appears that the tenant is put to the proof of that not being the case, in case he appears to the notice; in case of his default in appearing, the landlord must enter into such proof.

The 1st section of the statute authorizes the execution of the warrant of possession within a period to be therein named not less than 21 nor more than 30 clear days from the date of such warrant, between this and the form of the warrant, a discrepancy is perceptible, the latter running "on any day within — days," &c., now, I apprehend, that in all cases, it will be proper to pursue the directions contained in the body of the act, and not those of the form in the schedule. Clear days here mentioned mean twenty-one days exclusive both of the day of issuing the warrant and the day of entry.

In section 2 the words, "summons" and "notice" are indiscriminately used to describe the same instrument, but no difficulty under all the circumstances can, I presume, result from this.

The bond mentioned in section 3 requires stamping before it will be admissible in evidence.

A question frequently arises as to the evidence which a landlord ought to produce; in some instances the justices allow him to give evidence, in others not; but as the act allows, nay requires, that the complaint should be made by him on oath, I do not exactly see how they are, generally speaking, to avoid examining him upon the complaint as in other cases.

The form of the summons, which is anything but well-worded, must be strictly followed. I have seen many instances where the veriest alteration imaginable has had the effect of quashing the whole proceedings: as an instance, the summons states, "I shall on ——— next," &c.; now it is very evident, that as seven clear days' notice is required, the word "next" after the day of the week is superfluous; but in the case alluded to, the complainant had inserted the day of the week, viz. Monday, leaving out the word "next," which occasioned the defendant's solicitor to object, and that successfully, against the case proceeding. I may add that on a subsequent occasion the same party was defeated in a similar manner for not following the form, inasmuch as the word "next" was left out. The difficulty, however, is now overcome by stating that "on Monday week next," &c.

The notice or summons may be served by the landlord if his evidence is admitted by the justices, but in general a disinterested party (probably the constable, who will have occasion to execute a warrant if granted) would be preferable. There is no fear of litigation under the 6th section. In conclusion, perhaps, I may be allowed to advert to the omission of a limited scale of fees to be taken by clerks to justices and others under the act. In many cases a party is certain of losing his rent, and to add to this grievance he is generally found to be saddled with a sum which would swallow up a half year's rent, in case he did receive it, for fees, which in many instances are demanded to a most unreasonable extent.

FRANKS v. PRICE.

DEVISE.—L MITATIONS.—REMAINDERS OVER.

DEVISE of lands to testator's daughters, J. L. and R. A. for life; remainder to his sister for life; remainder to M. H. and N. H. for their respective lives, and if either of the two should die without leaving issue male, the whole to the survivor for life. If M. H. should die after testator's daughters and sisters, before N. H. leaving issue male, a moiety of the estate was to go to the first and other sons of M. H. in tail male; and in default of such issue, to N. H. for life; remainder to the use of the first and other sons of N. H. in tail male; and in default of such issue, to testator's right heirs. If N. H. after the death of testator's daughters and sisters, should die before M. H. leaving issue male, a moiety of the estate was to go to the first and other sons of N. H. in tail male; and in default of such issue to M. H. for life; remainder to the use of the first and other sons of M. H. in tail male; and in default of such issue, to the testator's right heirs. In case M. H. and N. H. should both die without issue male, or such issue male should die without issue male, the estate to go to the use of such person as, at the death of the survivor, should be testator's right heir. Testator's daughter, R. A., his sisters, and M. H. all died without issue in the lifetime of J. L. Upon her death, held, that N. H. took an estate tail in the whole of the property.

This suit, which has been some years before the Court, was at length disposed of.

The bill was filed by the heirs at law of Moses Hart, to recover an estate at Topsfield in Essex, the facts will more satisfactorily appear by the following case, ordered by the Master of the Rolls, for the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas.

Moses Hart, being seized in fee of certain messuages, lands, and hereditaments, at Topsfield, in the county of Essex, by his will, dated the 20th of April, 1756, and duly executed and attested, gave, devised and bequeathed his said messuages, lands, and hereditaments at Topsfield, in Essex, to trustees and their heirs, in trust, as to one moiety of the premises, for his daughter, Judith Levy, for life; and as to the other moiety for his daughter, Rachael Adolphus, for life, with divers remainders and cross remainders to the issue of Rachael Adolphus; and for default of such issue to testator's three sisters for their lives, and the life of the survivor, and from and after the decease of his daughters, and of the issue of his daughter, Rachael Adolphus, and the decease of his three sisters, to the use of Moses Hart and Nathaniel Hart, the sons of his brother-in-law, Solomon Hart, for and during the term of their respective natural lives, share and share alike; and in case either of them, the said Moses Hart and Napthali Hart should depart this life without leaving issue male of his body lawfully begotten, then as to the whole of his said estate to the use of the survivor of them during the term of his natural life; and if Moses Hart should (after the death of Judith Levy and Rachael Adolphus, and of the children of the said Rachael Adolphus, if any, and the decease of testator's three sisters), depart this life before Napthali Hart, leaving issue male of his body, then and in such case, the testator devised one moiety of his estate to the use of the first and every other son and sons of Moses Hart, severally and successively in tail male; and in default of such issue to the use of Napthali Hart for the term of his natural life; and after his decease, to the use of the first and other sons of Napthali Hart, severally and successively in tail male; and in default of such issue, to the use of testator's right heirs: And if Napthali Hart should (after the death of Judith Levy and Rachael Adolphus, and the children of the said Rachael Adolphus, if any, and the decease of the testator's three sisters), depart this life before Moses Hart, leaving issue male of his body, lawfully begotten, then and in such case the testator devised one moiety of his said estate to the use of the first and every other son and sons of Napthali Hart, severally and successively in tail male; and in default of such issue, to the use of Moses Hart, for the term of his natural life, and after his decease, to the use of his first and other sons, severally and successively in tail male; and in default of such issue, to the use of testator's right heirs; and in case Moses Hart and Napthali Hart should both die without leaving any issue male, or such issue male should die without leaving any issue male, then in such case, the testator devised his said estate to the use of such person or persons as should at the death of the survivor of them, the said Moses Hart and Napthali Hart be his, the testator's right heir or heirs.

The testator, Moses Hart, died without having revoked or altered his said will.

The heirs at law of the testator living at the time of his death, were his said two daughters, Judith Levy and Rachael Adolphus, his grandson, Henry Isaac Franks, and his two granddaughters, Philah Franks and Priscilla Franks; Henry Isaac Franks being the only son of Frances Franks, a deceased daughter of the testator, who married Isaac Franks; and Philah Franks and Priscilla Franks, being the only children of Philah Franks, the wife of Aaron Franks, another daughter of the testator, who also died in his lifetime.

On the death of the testator, Moses Hart, Judith Levy and Rachael Adolphus, by virtue of the will, entered into possession of the said messuages, lands, hereditaments, and premises, at Topsfield, and received the rents thereof in equal moieties, until the death of the said Rachael Adolphus, in the year 1773, without issue, whereupon Judith Levy took possession of Rachael Adolphus's said moiety of the estate, and received the rents of the whole of the estate from that time to the time of her death.

The devisee, Moses Hart, and the testator's said three sisters, survived the testator, and all died in the life time of Judith Levy; and the devisee, Moses Hart, died without having any issue.

The said Judith Levy died in the month of January, 1803; and thereupon, Napthali Hart entered into possession of the said estate; and in Hilary Term, 1821, suffered a common recovery thereof to the use of Stratford Price, his heirs and assigns, and the estate was held, and the rents thereof were taken accordingly, until about the month of March, 1830, when a receiver was appointed of the same by the Court of Chancery, who is now in possession of the estate.

The said Henry Isaac Franks died in the lifetime of Napthali Hart without having been married, leaving Jacob Henry Franks, the only son of Philah Franks, the wife of Aaron Franks, his heir-at-law.

Philah Franks, sister of the said Priscilla Franks, married Moses Franks, and also died in the lifetime of Napthali Hart, leaving Dame Isabella Bell Cooper, the widow of Sir William Henry Cooper, Baronet, her only child and heir-at-law.

On the 28th of December, 1828, Napthali Hart died without having had any issue; and the heirs-at-law of the testator living at the time of the death of Napthali Hart, were the said Jacob Henry Franks, Priscilla Franks, and Dame Isabella Bell Cooper.

The questions for the opinion of the Court were, first, Whether Napthali Hart took any, and what estate in the messuages, lands, and hereditaments at Topsfield, under the testator's will.

Secondly, Whether Jacob Henry Franks, Priscilla Franks, and Dame Isabella Bell Cooper, the heirs-at-law of the testator living at the time of the death of Napthali Hart, took any, and what estate, in the messuages, lands, and hereditaments, at Topsfield, under the said will.

Thirdly, Whether Judith Levy, Rachael Adolphus, Henry Isaac Franks, Philah Franks, and Priscilla Franks, the heirs-at-law of the testator, living at the time of his death, took any and what estate in the said messuages, lands, and hereditaments, at Topsfield.

This case was argued in the Court of Common Pleas, on the 13th May, 1838 (a), when the Judges gave the following certificate:—

(a) See 5 Bing. N. C. 37, where all the cases are shown.

We are of opinion, that upon the death of Moses Hart, without issue, Napthali Hart became, and was seised under and by virtue of the testator's will, of a vested estate in tail male in remainder (expectant on the determination of the estates limited to Judith Levy, Rachael Adolphus, and her children, and the testator's three sisters) in all the messuages, lands, and hereditaments, at Topsfield.

It having been intimated to us by the counsel on both sides, that in the event of our opinion on the first question being such as is above stated, they do not desire to have our opinion on the matters referred to in the second and third questions, we forbear to say any thing in answer to them.

N. C. TINDALL.

J. A. PARK.

J. VAUGHAN.

T. COLTMAN.

Lord LANGDALE now gave judgment. His Lordship said, that by the rules of law, where an estate for life was given to a party, and after failure of his issue to the right heirs of the testator, then the law would give to the father such an estate as the issue would have taken, and prevent the gift ever taking effect by implication. The words of the will did not import contingency, the remainders over were not to take effect till the other gifts were spent; but it was said that there were other words which did import contingency; the first was the gift to Moses Hart and Napthali Hart during their joint lives; the second, the death of either without issue; the third was the death of either in the lifetime of the other leaving issue; this was provided for; and the fourth was the death of both, without leaving issue, in which event the trustees were to convey the estate to the heirs of the testator. It was not, however, intended that this ultimate limitation should take effect till the failure of issue of both Moses and Napthali Hart, and this had been done in such a way that the remainder over had been defeated. If such was the case with respect to one moiety, it was said it did not apply to the other. He thought, however, that the same question governed the whole. It had also been argued that the limitations were equitable, and that they ought to be carried into effect by the trustees according to the intention of the testator, since some of the trusts were executory; they were, however, to take place upon condition, and it did not appear that the Court had the power to direct any conveyance by way of settlement. Upon the whole, therefore, he concurred with the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas, and he did not consider that he ought to send it to any other court. The bill, therefore, must be dismissed, but without costs.

DOE DEM HICKMAN v. HICKMAN.

ATTORNIES.—Upon changing the attorney in a cause, whether upon tender and payment of his Costs as taxed by the Master by a third person, he is bound to deliver up the deeds and papers belonging to the client to such third person upon his simple demand, unaccompanied by a letter of attorney.—
RULE in such cases.

In this case a rule had been obtained to shew cause why an attachment should not issue against an attorney for not delivering up certain deeds and papers to Mr. Hickman, the plaintiff, for whom he had been concerned in the cause, and why he should not pay the costs of the application.

Mr. Sergeant Acherley now showed cause against the rule. It appeared that Mr. Hickman, the lessor of the plaintiff, had some dispute with his attorney in the cause, and had resolved to employ another. For this purpose he had obtained the bill of costs of the former, which the master taxed at £46. 4s.; and he obtained a judges order, that upon payment of that sum the attorney should deliver up the deeds, papers, and writings, in his possession, belonging to Mr. Hickman.

Mr. Hickman then sent a Mr. Tilling to the attorney, who paid the £46. 4s., and served him with a copy of the judge's order, at the same time, and demanded all deeds, papers, and writings, belonging to Mr. Hickman, which the attorney refused to deliver to Mr. Tilling. The learned serjeant contended that a sufficient demand had not been made, as Mr. Tilling had no distinct authority from Mr. Hickman to make it.

TINDAL, C. J.—The rule is, that the demand may be made by a third person upon the authority of a letter of attorney only, a copy of which must be served with the demand, and the original produced.

Mr. Sergeant Storks, in support of the rule, contended that this case did not fall within that rule as the order of the judge served upon the attorney was, in effect, of equal authority, with a letter of attorney.

TINDAL, C. J. said—an attorney cannot be brought into contempt upon such slight grounds—the demand is certainly not sufficient.

MORTIMER v. McALLAN.

STOCK BROKERS and JOBBERS—Liability of Principal for Stock transferred to him.

his Broker (a Stock Jobber), who not being in possession of any Stock of his own, procured another person, under false pretences, to obtain such transfer from a third party—Construction of the Statute 7 Geo. 2. c. 8.

We have before very fully reported this case in its several stages (a). We need now, therefore, only say, that the action was brought by the plaintiff to recover from the defendant £4531. 5s. as the value of £5000. stock which the plaintiff had sold and caused to be transferred to the defendant, and for which he, the plaintiff, had not received value from the broker.

The defendant pleaded that the stock had been so caused to be transferred under and by virtue of a contract for the sale thereof to the defendant since the passing of the Stock Jobbing Act, 7 Geo. II. c. 8. (b); viz. on the 7th of October, 1839, by the plaintiff, in consideration of £4531. 5s. to be paid to the plaintiff, and that at the time of making such contract the plaintiff was not actually possessed of or entitled unto in his own right, or in his own name, or in the name or names of a trustee, to his use of the stock so contracted to be sold, or any share in the same stock, by means whereof the contract became null and void.

To this plea the plaintiff put in a general demurrer.

The case was argued on the 14th of May 1st.

Mr. Cresswell supported the demurrer, and contended that the question in the case turned entirely upon the construction to be placed upon the statute 7 Geo. 2, c. 8, s. 8, but the Court called upon the counsel of the defendant to support the plea.

Sir William Follett appeared to support the plea, and detailed the facts of the case (which we have before shewn), and contended that the statute made such a contract void in all cases. Taylor, the defendant's broker, had failed to pay for this stock, and, dying, shortly after, the present action was brought to ascertain the nice question, who should be the loser by his fraud, he having been long long since furnished by the defendant with the necessary funds to make the required investment. In the first place, the contract for the transfer was void and illegal, under the 7th Geo. II. c. 8, s. 8; and secondly, that though the transfer had actually taken place, still the plaintiff could not recover the value of the stock so transferred, inasmuch as the action was bottomed on the original contract, which the legislature had prohibited by the above act. For the plaintiff it had been urged that the act was only meant to check what are now termed "time bargains," and that this, which was a bond fide transaction, as far as the sale from the plaintiff to the defendant went, was not one of a class prohibited by the legislature. This, however, could not be so, for the first sections of the act related to "time bargains," while the eighth section had a special operation upon those contracts for the sale of stock by parties who are not actually possessed of stock at the time. Such contracts are expressly and pointedly prohibited, and declared void to all intents and purposes; and it is difficult, therefore, to see how the case can be altered by a subsequent transfer. It was nothing very absurd to suppose that the legislature meant to put an end to speculation and jobbing transactions; and this was a case where the plaintiff might have gained or lost to a great extent in one day by a sudden rise or fall in the funds.

PARKE, B. said, the great doubt in the case is, whether the legislature meant to prohibit the transfer.

Sir W. Follett—Upon that depends the second point upon which the defendant relies; and it is not easy to perceive how that fact can make any distinction, if the original contract out of which the transfer arises was void under the act. There are various Acts of Parliament prohibiting certain matters, on which cases have occurred, all of which go the extent of holding that the execution of the contract, by delivery of the prohibited goods for instance, does not entitle the party infringing the law to recover. The manufacture of bricks is limited by Act of Parliament to certain moulds, and in the case of Law v. Hodgson, (c) shows that a brickmaker cannot recover the price of bricks, even after delivery, if made contrary to the Act of Parliament. So also in the case of a printer, Beasley v. Bignold, (d) where an action was brought for the price of a book, which did not bear the name of the plaintiff as printer, it was there held that he could not recover. Then, again, a publican cannot recover from a candidate the amount of his bill for goods supplied to voters in contravention of the enactment against treating. In all these cases the plaintiffs were defeated, simply because it appeared that their claims were founded on contracts rendered void and illegal by the legislature. The Court had moreover decided in Cope v. Roland, (e) that an unlicensed broker cannot recover for work and labour; and why should the transfer of the stock here enable the plaintiff to recover the value of stock, the contract for the sale of which is almost admitted to have been illegal. If it were to be so held now, the Court would be stepping out of its province, for it would virtually repeal a statute, the utility of which was beyond all question, as ought its proper construction to be. He also cited Hitchins v. Lander, (f) and observed that Lord Tenterden had held, that even at the common law no valid contract of sale could be made for goods, which the vendor was not possessed of or entitled to at the time of sale. (g)

Mr. Cresswell replied, and contended that it did not necessarily follow that the Legislature meant to do more than prohibit all executory contracts, for it would have gone on to specify the transfer of stock; and that, even supposing the contract to be void by the 8th section of the statute, still when the stock was transferred and accepted, a new contract to pay the price for it was raised by implication of law as the statute only declares the contract shall be void, and does not extend to every transfer made in pursuance of such contract.

LORD ABINGER said, he never had any doubt that the case was not within the statute, but that the Court would take time to consider.

PARKE, B.—This day gave the judgment of the Court, and said as the Court had already decided the question on the motion made for a new trial (h), they were bound to abide by that decision.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

COURT OF REVIEW.—Aug. 6.

Fiat against Wm. MUNROE the younger and THOMAS MUNROE—Petition of JONATHAN ACKROYD and EDWARD ACKROYD—Fiat issued by the Act of the Bankrupt to prevent a Creditor having Execution—Whether the Court will annul it.

This case occupied the Court four days. The application petitioners are Jonathan Ackroyd and Edward Ackroyd, of Halifax, in the county of York, trading under the style or firm of "James Ackroyd and Son." The petition stated, that on the 1st of July last a fiat in bankruptcy issued against Wm. Munroe the younger, and Thomas Munroe, of Milk Street, London, merchants, trading under the firm of Munroe and Brother, upon the petition of Wm. Fawcett, and it alleged that such fiat was fraudulently issued. That the petitioners were creditors of Messrs. Munroe upon a bill of exchange for £709. 5s. for goods sold which became due on the 10th of April last, and was dishonoured. On the 30th of March, Messrs. Munroe applied by letter to the petitioners to renew the bill, and the petitioners referred to their attorney, and expressed their willingness to give time upon having security, which Messrs. Munroe refused to give. The bill became due and was dishonoured, and on the 10th of April Messrs. Munroe applied by letter to the petitioners to renew the bill for half the amount at six months, offering payment of the other half. The petitioners again referred to their solicitor, who still refused to give time but upon security, and unless it was given an affidavit would be made under the statute for the abolition for arrest for debt on mesne process, so as to force Messrs. Munroe into bankruptcy; and on the 21st of April last the petitioners did make an affidavit in the Court of Bankruptcy, and on the same day caused a copy of such affidavit, with a notice requiring immediate payment of the debt, to be served upon Messrs. Munroe, and on the 14th of May, Messrs. Munroe and Mr. Fawcett, the petitioning creditor, gave the bond required by the statute.

On the 16th of May the petitioners commenced an action in the Common Pleas against Messrs. Munroe for this debt, and after various vexatious proceedings of great length and intricacy, the action was tried on the 17th of June last, and the petitioners had a verdict for £715. 5s. and costs—execution to issue on the 2nd of July. An error was subsequently discovered in the writ of Distringas Juratores, and a writ of error was sued out by the attorneys for Messrs. Munroe. The attorney for the petitioners, however, obtained a judge's order to amend the distringas and the jury pannel by the venire upon payment of costs. The petitioners tendered £5. for those costs of amendment, which was refused, and they taxed their costs of the action at £49. 15s.

The petition then alleged that on the day of such taxation, and before the Master had determined to detain the allocatur (by reason of the taxation and payment of costs of the amendment not having been made), the attorneys for Messrs. Munroe induced Mr. Fawcett to strike the docket, but that such docket was not struck with the bond fide intention of issuing and prosecuting a fiat in bankruptcy thereon, for the just and fair distribution of the estate and effects equally and fairly among the creditors; but on the contrary it was struck for the purpose of counteracting the judgment which had been obtained by the petitioners, and for the purpose of giving time to Messrs. Munroe unduly to pursue their lives of a large quantity of goods, and likewise £1020., and for the purpose of enabling them to defeat and defraud their bond fide creditors.

The petition also alleged that a large quantity of goods had been obtained by Messrs. Munroe from Mr. Liggins, of Wood Street, warehouseman, who claimed to be a creditor for £1000. in respect of such goods. Mr. Liggins did on the 10th of January last lodge a foreign attachment at the Lord Mayor's Court on a large quantity of goods, in value £4000., which Messrs. Munroe had procured on credit from various persons, and at Messrs. Munroe, with the view to obtain possession of the goods and to litigate their liability for the debt of £1000., which they intended was due from other persons, obtained a writ of Certiorari, and removed Mr. Liggins's petition into the Court of Queen's Bench, and Messrs. Munroe obtained an order of that court for the payment of £1020. into court in lieu of bail; Messrs. Munroe then brought an action of trover for the goods against the packer in whose custody they were, but who refused to deliver them up under notice from Mr. Liggins.

Mr. Liggins subsequently received his £1000. from other parties, the writ of certiorari was quashed, &c., writ of proceedings issued, the proceedings in the action of trover were stayed, and, as alleged by the petition, after the docket was struck, the goods, in value £4000., were released, as well as the £1020. in court, to Messrs. Munroe, upon certain conditions that were complied with. This £1020. it appeared Messrs. Munroe had borrowed from Messrs. Raleigh and Co. of Manchester, and that they had also advanced £3125. on account of the goods released; and that immediately after the settlement last mentioned, the goods, in value £4000., and the £1020., were assigned to Messrs. Raleigh and Co., who obtained the latter out of court, and possession thereof was given to the petitioners, and on the 8th of May, Messrs. Munroe wrote the petitioners that they had committed various acts of bankruptcy.

On the 30th of June, Messrs. Munroe made an offer to the petitioners of a composition of 6d. in the pound, which was declined. On the 1st of July the fiat was issued, but had not been opened, nor had Messrs. Munroe been declared bankrupts, and the petitioner alleged that bond fide creditors had been delayed by the above-mentioned proceedings from suing out a writ, and that the petitioners had signed final judgment in their action, and had obtained a judge's order for payment of debt and costs, or that Messrs. Munroe should surrender themselves. The petitioner prayed that the fiat might be annulled with costs, and for an order affecting the attornies for abuse of process of the court.

The affidavits in support of this petition were very voluminous.

Mr. Fawcett deposed that he was a bond fide creditor for goods sold in January last to the amount of £327. 10s. 6d., for which Messrs. Munroe gave him a bill of exchange that was afterwards dishonoured and remained unpaid.

The affidavits of Messrs. Munroe and their solicitors denied fraud or collusion in issuing the fiat, or that it was issued to defeat the rights of the creditors, but that it was issued in a due course with a bond fide intention of prosecuting the same, and to cause an equal distribution of the estate of Messrs. Munroe, and that with regard to the allegations made against Messrs. Munroe and their solicitors in support of the petition made by the petitioner's solicitor, the only portion of truth therein was that Messrs. Munroe's solicitors issued the fiat before the petitioner's solicitor could do so, which was the reason for the unfounded and vexatious allegations made by the petitioner's solicitor.

The petition also alleged that in the month of February last certain goods, said to be of the value of £4000. were sent to Messrs. Pellatt and Watts by the bankrupts to be packed and transmitted to Messrs. Raleigh; and while the goods were in the warehouse of the packers an attachment was lodged at the instance of Mr. Liggins, of Wood Street, Cheapside, for £1000. This process was removed by writ of certiorari into the Court of Queen's Bench, and after a great number of applications to that court and to one of the learned judges, and after an action of trover had been brought by the bankrupts, they were delivered to Messrs. Turner and Hensman as solicitors for Raleigh and Co., on an order of Mr. Justice Patteson that a sum of £300. should be paid into court, to be withdrawn on bail being put in, and all proceedings to be stayed. In the interim, Messrs. Leaf and Co., who were creditors of the bankrupts, had also served a notice similar to the one before served by Messrs. Ackroyd, but the proceedings on it were stopped by Mr. Raleigh, in conjunction with another person entering into the requisite bond, and the docket, at the instance of that firm, which would have been due on the 28th of June, was not struck. On the 30th of June, Mr. Turner, in company with one of the bankrupts, waited on Messrs. Ackroyd at Halifax, to whom they made a representation of the bankrupts' affairs, shewing debts due by them to about £9000., and costs to £2400., and offered to pay them (Messrs. Ackroyd) a composition of 5s. in the pound, which offer was, however, declined.

Mr. Swanston, for the petitioners, stated the facts, and contended that the issuing of the fiat was a concerted and fraudulent plot between the bankrupts and the petitioning creditor, to prevent the execution of the petitioners from taking effect, and prayed that the fiat should be annulled, on the ground that it was unduly issued, and that the petitioning creditor, or his solicitors, should pay the costs. He cited the case of Mr. Hammond, the late lessee of Drury Lane Theatre, in which the court had annulled the fiat, on the ground that it was issued to prevent a creditor enforcing his execution, which was, he submitted, an analogous case to the present.

Sir F. Pollock, for Mr. Fawcett, the petitioning creditor, said, that that gentleman was a highly respectable person, who had carried on business in the city of London for upwards of ten years, and he felt acutely the charges contained in the petition and affidavits read in the matter, the latter of which were all founded on the belief of the petitioner's solicitor. The charges contained in the affidavit were of a serious character against Mr. Fawcett and his solicitors, who were highly respectable men. They put him in mind of an attorney, who was requested to write a letter to a person, acquainting him with the death of a friend, who excused himself by saying, "I don't like writing, but I'll make an affidavit of the fact."

Cross, J. observed, there was a great spirit of vituperation displayed on both sides, which was unnecessary and improper.

Sir F. Pollock said, the administration of the bankrupt laws was a matter of great importance, he might be permitted to take some interest in the matter, which would be an apology for what might be considered over-zeal. Almost the first measure in which he took an active part in Parliament, was the subject of these very laws. He thought the only reason why the case of Hammond was cited was, because the solicitor for this petitioner had annulled that fiat, and was flushed with the success he had obtained. He denied that the fiat was issued to aid the bankrupt or any other party, it was not opened till the day mentioned, as Mr. Fawcett was about to proceed on a commercial journey, and he had struck the docket in order that the property of the debtors should be divided among all the creditors, and not taken under the execution of one firm. He contended that by the 1st & 2nd Wm. 4, c. 56, s. 42, no fiat should be annulled, on the ground of concert between the petitioning creditor and the bankrupt, and in this case nothing could be shewn to the prejudice of his client, who was quite ready to submit to any investigation, either viva voce before the Court, a Commissioner, or a jury of his country, and he trusted the Court would not on mere conjecture grant the present application, but that the petition would be dismissed with costs.

Mr. Bethell addressed the Court on the part of Messrs. Turner and Hensman, the solicitors to the fiat, and contended that there was nothing against their character; they had acted in a professional manner, and were known to be respectable solicitors.

Mr. Swanston rose to reply.

Cross, J. said he thought the learned counsel need not trouble himself; a great deal of personal conflict seemed to exist between the solicitors, but he should dismiss from his mind a great part of the statements made. Nothing had, in his opinion, transpired to affect the character of the petitioning creditor to the fiat, nor had the professional honour of Messrs. Turner and Hensman a right to be questioned; they had been engaged in conflicting and anomalous duties. It was the expressed opinion of Lord Eldon (a) that if the direct object in taking out a commission of bankruptcy is to prevent the execution of a creditor, that is no objection to the commission, provided it is the commission of a creditor, and not that of the bankrupt, which is always vitious, this proposition had been subsequently maintained in many cases in law and equity. In this case a bitter conflict had been carried on between the attorneys, and he could find nothing in the conduct of Mr. Van Sandau, the petitioner's solicitor, which would merit any strong animadversion. It was worthy of remark that no acts of bankruptcy had been proved to the Court during the discussion, and he thought the acts of bankruptcy were concerted. It appeared to him that the fiat had been issued to defeat Messrs. Ackroyd's execution at the instance of the bankrupts, and it must therefore be annulled, with costs by Mr. Fawcett and Messrs. Turner and Hensman.

SITTINGS IN VACATION.

The Chief Commissioner concluded the sittings on Friday, and the Court at its rising adjourned for the hearing of cases to the 22nd of September, when they will be resumed until the 9th of October, and an adjournment will then take place to the 27th of the same month. The commissioners do not intend, in consideration of the imprisonment of parties, to avail themselves of the full vacation allowed by the act. A court will be held once a week, and the days already appointed are Friday and the 5th of September.

PREROGATIVE COURT—July 14.

ALLEN v MCPHERSON AND OTHERS.

ATTORNEYS—PRACTICE—Whether an Attorney who employs a proctor, and is liable to him for costs, may be examined as a witness in the cause—Whether a Solicitor retaining a proctor for a party in the cause becomes of necessity liable to him for the costs.

The question raised in this case was, as to the validity of a codicil to the will of Mr. John Allen, who died on the 28th of November, 1837, at the age of 78, leaving property sworn to be under £80,000. The codicil in question was propounded with the will and other codicils by the executors, Messrs. M'Pherson, Tomkins, and W. Allen, a son of the deceased, and it was opposed by Mr. Robert Allen, a great nephew (who sued in forma pauperis), whose benefit under the will was diminished by the codicil, the bulk of the property being given to the deceased's daughter, Mrs. Evans, and other relations. The ground of opposition was incapacity of the testator and improper influence and misrepresentation.

The only point of importance raised was as to the competency of the Solicitor for the executors who had employed the proctors in the cause, and was as alleged liable to them for costs being examined as a witness.

Dr. Harding, for the pauper, contended the solicitor had admitted he, and not the executors had retained the proctor, he had therefore made himself liable for the costs, and not having been discharged of that liability, he was not a competent witness.

Sir H. JENNER said, the objection was a good and valid objection to the competency of a witness; the question is, whether a responsibility legally attaches to the party by what he has done. He admits he retained the proctors, but he says he does not know whether such retainer makes him responsible for costs; for knowing the responsibility of his parties, he never considered whether he was liable or not. Now the 1st question is whether a solicitor, by retaining a proctor, becomes of necessity legally responsible for all the costs. No case has been mentioned in which there has been a decision in any court that the mere circumstances of a solicitor retaining a proctor for his party, makes him (the solicitor) legally responsible for the costs. If the witness considered himself liable for costs, then he is incompetent to be examined as a witness, unless released by the proctor for the costs. Under the circumstances it is not established satisfactorily that the solicitor is responsible for the costs, and therefore he is a competent witness.

Evidence of the solicitor admitted.

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.—August 12.

APPEALS.

PARISH OF ST. CLEMENT DANES v. PARISH OF ST. GILES IN THE FIELDS.

BOUNDARIES of PARISHES.—PAUPER Settlement.—To which of two parishes a Pauper belongs, where the boundary line between the parishes runs across the room in which the Pauper had slept.

This was an appeal against the removal of John Henry, a pauper, from the parish of St. Giles in the Fields to the parish of St. Clement Danes.

Mr. Bodkin appeared for the respondents, and stated that the pauper had gained a settlement in the latter parish by virtue of having rented a tenement therein at the yearly rental of £30. This tenement consisted of two rooms, which were over a stable in Portsmouth-street, belonging to and in the rear of one of the houses in Lincoln's-inn-fields. In the course of the evidence it was stated that the boundary line between the parishes of St. Clement Danes and St. Giles's runs across the room in which the pauper slept.

Mr. Adolphus, for the appellants, in reference to this fact, said there had been a decision in a somewhat similar case, which had gone to determine that the parish in which the bed of the pauper had been placed was the parish which was bound to maintain the party.

Mr. Bodkin remarked, it was impossible that that decision could be maintained in all cases where such point was in dispute between contending parishes, for he well recollected an instance where the bed of the pauper had usually stood across the boundary line separating the two parishes, and it turned out that the pauper had been accustomed to lay with his head in the one and his feet in the other parish. In that case the Court had held that the parish in which the head of the pauper had reclined was bound to support the body.

Mr. Prendergast begged to remind the Court that there was also another case—one in which the pauper's bed had been placed in such a position as that the dividing line of the two parishes had run as it were from the head to the heels, that was, lengthways of the bed. There it had been held that the parish on which the left hand side of the bed had been situated was liable to the maintenance of the pauper, on the ground that the pauper's heart, which was conceived to be the most important portion of the contents of the frame of a human being, as well as the most vital part of man, was usually on that side. Such was the decision in that particular case, but he could not say what the judgment of the Court would be in a case where a party was what was denominated a "restless sleeper," and rolled from one side of the bed to another; probably it might be that the settlement would follow the removal of the heart from the right hand to the left hand parish.

Mr. Adolphus would call the attention of the Court to another case, wherein the bed of the pauper had been so placed, as that the boundary line had run directly up its centre. In that case the pauper was a married man, and the common course of matters would be, that the wife had lain on one side of the line, and the pauper on the other. It was there decided and held, that the parish in which the pauper had been in the habit of sleeping was bound to bear the expense of their maintenance as paupers, on the ground, that from time immemorial the prevailing custom had been, for the husband to lie on the right hand side of his wife.

The CHAIRMAN suggested whether, notwithstanding all these cases, the more regular as well as the more convenient course would not be, to hear the evidence in the present instance, and so to let this particular case be determined upon its own merits.

Evidence was then produced on the part of the respondents, which went to prove, that the whole of the pauper's bed had stood in the parish of St. Clement Danes.

On the other hand, witnesses were called by the counsel for the appellant, who stated, that they had made a most careful survey of the rooms in question, and that there were not more than 15 inches width of the pauper's bed in the parish of St. Giles.

Mr. Bodkin said that it was impossible to squeeze a man's body into the narrow space of 15 inches. However, after so many cases had been cited on the subject of the reposing of heads in one parish, and the kicking of heels in another, he would leave it to his learned opponent to hoist the present pauper into any position he might think proper. It was sufficient for him to have proved that the whole of the bed had been in the appellant's parish.

After considerable discussion, it was arranged that a special case should be submitted for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench.

The COURT in the mean time directed the order of removal to be confirmed.

MIDLAND CIRCUIT.

Warwick, August 14.

PARROTT v. OAKES.

DISTRESS for Rent.—Whether BUTCHER'S MEAT in a Butcher's Shop can be made the subject of a distress for Rent.

This was an action for an illegal distress. The plaintiff is a butcher at Birmingham, and had supplied the defendant with meat. The defendant, who was his landlord, distrained for rent on a Saturday night in July, 1839, and, amongst other things, seized a quantity of butcher's meat. There was at this time an account between them. He had previously distrained and sold the plaintiff's goods about six weeks before. For the defendant it was insisted that he was justified in distraining, as the plaintiff was a weekly tenant. For the latter, however, it was contended that he was a yearly tenant, and also that butcher's meat could not be legally distrained.

TINDAL, C. J. left it to the jury to say, upon the evidence, whether the plaintiff was a yearly or a weekly tenant. With respect to butcher's meat, he informed them that it could not be made the subject of a distress for rent, because, as the landlord was bound to keep the goods seized merely as a pledge for a certain number of days, and then deliver them up, upon being redeemed, in the same condition they were in when he seized them, he could not do so in the case of fresh meat, which would be spoiled in the interim, especially when, in this instance, it was seized in the month of July.

Verdict for the plaintiff on both points—Damages, £50.

NORFOLK CIRCUIT.

Cambridge, July 30.

SMITH v. GREY AND OTHERS.

COURT OF REQUESTS.—Whether it is competent for a Plaintiff in these Courts to reduce the amount of his actual debt under 40s., and whether the Court, with knowledge of such fact, has jurisdiction to adjudicate upon it.

The defendants in this case are Commissioners of the Court of Requests for the Isle of Ely, and the present action was brought to recover damages for an alleged assault and false imprisonment.

Mr. Pryme stated the plaintiff's case. The plaintiff in September in the last year was sumnoned by the defendants to appear and answer to a claim made in the Court of Requests for the Isle of Ely, by one Markby, for a debt of £1. 19s. 11 $\frac{3}{4}$ d. The now plaintiff appeared in due form, and objected to the jurisdiction of the Court of Requests on two grounds; the first, that their power was limited to debts under 40s., and that the debt really due, if any was, amounted to more than that sum; the second, that the debt was more than six years old, and that it was therefore barred by the Statute of Limitations. To the first objection Markby, the then plaintiff, replied that he waved the whole of his claim except £1. 19s. 11 $\frac{3}{4}$ d.; and in answer to the second, he proved a verbal promise within six years by the now plaintiff to pay the debt. The Commissioners overruled both objections, and issued a precept, under which the plaintiff was arrested for the amount of debt and costs. It was now contended by the counsel for the plaintiff that the objections taken at the trial were fatal to the jurisdiction of the Commissioners of the Court of Requests, and that they had therefore acted wholly without authority, and were, as a consequence, liable in trespass for causing the plaintiff to be arrested.

ALDERSON, B. was of opinion that the action could not be supported. It might be admitted, that if the court below had acted wholly without authority, and had caused the plaintiff to be arrested in respect of a matter over which they had no jurisdiction, the defendants would have been trespassers. But it was competent for the plaintiff to reduce his demand in that court below 40s., and upon his doing so they had power to adjudicate upon it. With respect to the admission of parol evidence of a promise to pay a debt barred by the Statute of Limitations, the defendants might have been wrong in so doing; but it was not the law that a judge, who admits evidence on the trial of a cause, which is in point of law inadmissible, can be sued as a trespasser by the party against whom the evidence is so received. The action is certainly not maintainable.

3 & 4 VICT. c. lxxxii.

An Act for further amending the Act for abolishing Arrest on Mesne Process in Civil Actions.—[7th August, 1840.]

Whereas by an Act passed in the second year of the reign of her Majesty, intituled "An Act for abolishing Arrest on Mesne Process in Civil Actions, except in certain cases; for extending the remedies of Creditors against the property of Debtors; and for amending the Laws for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors in England," it was amongst other things enacted, that if any person against whom any judgment should have been entered up in any of her Majesty's Superior Courts at Westminster should have any Government stock, funds, or annuities, or any stock or shares of or in any public company in England (whether incorporated or not), standing in his name or in his own right, or in the name of any person in trust for him, it should be lawful for a judge of one of the superior courts on the application of any judgment creditor, to order that such stock, funds, annuities, or shares, or such of them, or such part thereof respectively, as he should think fit, should stand charged with the payment of the amount for which judgment should have been so recovered, and interest thereon, and such order should entitle the judgment creditor to all such remedies as he would have been entitled to if such charge had been made in his favour by the judgment debtor; provided that no proceedings should be taken to have the benefit of such charge until after the expiration of six calendar months from the date of such order: and whereas doubts have been entertained whether the said provisions extend to the cases herein-after mentioned: now therefore be it declared and enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that the aforesaid provisions of the said act shall be deemed and taken to extend to the interest of any judgment debtor, whether in possession, remainder, or reversion, and whether vested or contingent as well in any such stocks, funds, annuities, or shares as aforesaid as also in the dividends, interest, or annual produce of any such stock, funds, annuities, or shares; and whenever any such judgment debtor shall have any estate, right, title, or interest, vested or contingent, in possession, remainder, or reversion, in, to, or out of any such stocks, funds, annuities, or shares as aforesaid which now are or shall hereafter be standing in the name of the accountant-general of the Court of Chancery or the accountant-general of the Court of Exchequer, or in, to, or out of the dividends, interest, or annual produce thereof, it shall be lawful for such judge to make any order as to such stock, funds, annuities, or shares, or the interest, dividends, or annual produce thereof, in the same way as if the same had been standing in the name of a trustee of such judgment debtor: provided always, that no order of any judge as to any stock, funds, annuities, or shares standing in the name of the accountant-general of the Court of Chancery, or the accountant-general of the Court of Exchequer, or as to the interest, dividends, or annual produce thereof, shall prevent the governor and company of the Bank of England, or any public company, from permitting any transfer of such stocks, funds, annuities, or shares, or payment of the interest, dividends, or annual produce thereof, in such manner as the Court of Chancery or the Court of Exchequer respectively may direct, or shall have any greater effect than if such debtor had charged such stock, funds, annuities, or shares, or the interest, dividends, or annual produce thereof, in favour of the judgment creditor, with the amount of the sum to be mentioned in any such order.

II. And whereas it was by the said act further enacted, that no judgment of any of the superior courts of common law at Westminster, nor any decree or order in any court of equity, nor any rule of a court of common law, nor any order in bankruptcy or lunacy, should by virtue of the said act affect any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, as to purchasers, mortgagees, or creditors, unless and until such memorandum or minute as therein mentioned should be left with the senior Master of the Court of Common Pleas at Westminster: and whereas doubts have been entertained whether a purchaser, mortgagee, or creditor, having notice of any such judgment, decree, order, or rule as aforesaid, would not in equity be affected thereby, notwithstanding such a memorandum or minute of the same as in the said act is mentioned may not have been left with the senior Master of the said Court of Common Pleas; be it therefore further declared and enacted, that no such judgment, decree, order, or rule as aforesaid shall by virtue of the said act affect any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, at law or in equity, as to purchasers, mortgagees, or creditors, unless and until such a memorandum or minute as in the said act in that behalf mentioned shall have been left with the senior Master of the said Court of Common Pleas at Westminster; any notice of any such judgment, decree, order, or rule to any such purchaser, mortgagee, or creditor in anywise notwithstanding.

ESSAY.

ON THE ENGLISH LAW OF BAILMENTS.

LOCATIO CUSTODIÆ. WHARFINGERS.

WHARFINGERS are responsible only for ordinary diligence, (a) precisely in the same manner as warehousemen. It is said that Lords MANSFIELD and ELLENBOROUGH were both in opposition to this doctrine; but if the cases alluded to be carefully considered in their points, it will be found that such an opinion is very erroneous. Lord MANSFIELD, it is said, extended the liability of a wharfinger to that of a common carrier in Ross v. Johnson, (b) in which case his Lordship observed, that "it is impossible to make a distinction between a wharfinger and a common carrier; they both receive goods upon a contract: every case against a carrier is like the same case against a wharfinger." Now, without looking at the point before the Court, and to which these observations were directed, they would appear to be in direct opposition to the universally received doctrine. The only point before the Court was, whether trover would lie against a carrier, when the goods had been lost or stolen by his negligence, and not converted by him; and it was argued that case and not trover, under such circumstances, was the proper form of action. His Lordship's observations were therefore perfectly correct, for there can be no distinction in the form of action between a wharfinger and a common carrier.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH, it is said, also extended the liability of a wharfinger to that of a common carrier, in Maving v. Todd, (c) on which his Lordship observed, that "the liability of a wharfinger, while he has possession of the goods, was similar to that of a carrier." The defendants in that case were wharfingers and lightermen, and the action was brought against them for not safely keeping a quantity of goods entrusted to them in London, to be shipped to the vendees of the plaintiff at Newcastle, and which had been accidentally destroyed by fire, while on the defendants' premises; and the question was, whether the defendants, whose duty it was to convey the goods from the wharf, in their own lighter, to the vessel in the river, were liable for the loss. Lord Ellenborough is reported to have made the observations before noticed. Dr. Story, (d) in quoting this case says, Now it does not appear at what time the goods were destroyed by fire; whether, when they were in the warehouse, or on the wharf of the defendants, or in their progress to be put on board of the lighter. If the goods were on the wharf in their transit to go on board of the lighter, the remark of Lord Ellenborough, though not accurate in expression, would in substance have been justifiable in the particular case, for his duty as lighterman would then have commenced. But if his Lordship meant to say (according to the dictum in Starkie) that the liability of a wharfinger and carrier were universally the same, he was certainly incorrect. Indeed, the case is perfectly explicable on another ground; and that is, that the goods were in the hands of the defendants, as lightermen (who are deemed common carriers) for carriage, and not as mere wharfingers. And the only point worthy of consideration is, whether, as the defendants united both characters, they were, in point of fact, acting in one character or the other at the time of the loss by the fire. In another report of the same case, (e) the action is said to have been brought against the defendants "as wharfingers," and the goods were burnt while on the wharf, before any opportunity of shipping them. But in this report no notice is taken of the above dictum of Lord Ellenborough, which may therefore justly raise a doubt as to the accuracy of the other report.

More or less is to be done by a wharfinger according to the usage which governs the question as to his responsibility, when he acquires and when he ceases to have the custody of goods. If the master receive goods at the quay or beach, or send his boat for them, his responsibility commences with the receipt; (f) but a mere delivery of goods at a wharf is not necessarily a delivery of them to the wharfinger; there must be some act or assent on his part to the custody, before his responsibility commences. (g) When goods are in his custody to be sent on board of a vessel for a voyage, as soon as he delivers the possession and care of them to the proper officers of the vessel, although they are not actually removed, he is, by the usage of trade, deemed exonerated from any further responsibility; and the goods are deemed in the constructive possession of the officers of the ship. (h) In the port of London, when goods were intended to be sent coastwise, it was held that the responsibility of the wharfinger ceased with the delivery of them to the mate of the vessel upon the wharf. tenant—An outgoing and an incoming tenant—Trade fixtures, and ornamental fixtures—What effect has the bankruptcy of the tenant on the tenant right.

SIR,—My Answer to this Problem will naturally fall into the five divisions adopted by you; and although a great deal might be said of matters which are naturally considered as incidental to the various rules on the subject, yet I shall endeavour as far as possible to confine myself within the prescribed limits of the Problem, answering that only; and, first, I am to ascertain what constitutes a fixture. The general rule of law on this subject, with relation to the connexion of landlord and tenant, is stated to be “that whatever is fixed to the freehold becomes a part of it, and is subjected to the same jus proprietate as the land itself; and the term fixtures comprehends such personal chattels as are let into and annexed to the soil, or affixed to the freehold.” This is the approved definition, so far as regards the decision of questions between landlord and tenant, where disputes arise as to the power of moving them when once fixed. Chattels which do not constitute a fixture, I hold to be such as are not let into the soil at all; these therefore may be removed at the will of a tenant (be it ever so capricious), like any other species of personal property.

To constitute such an annexation or letting to the freehold, as to make the thing affixed a legal fixture, the rule is, that when the chattel is perfectly connected with the freehold, either by being let into the earth itself, or by being cemented or otherwise united to some erection previously attached to the ground, it becomes a fixture within the intendment of law; and this leads me to consider—

Secondly, the right to fixtures between landlord and tenant: previous to doing which I however think it will not be altogether unnecessary to remind those who may peruse this, that there is an exception in favour of trade, &c. which will be hereafter noticed.

The general rule as to annexations made by a tenant during the continuance of the term, is as following. Whenever anything has been let to the demised premises by the tenant, during the continuance of his term, it cannot be removed again by him without the consent of his landlord. This I take to result from that ancient rule of law—whatever is fixed to the freehold becomes freehold, and the very act of annexing it to the land transfers to it all the qualities of realty, and thus it immediately belongs to the landlord; the law presuming, (with what consistency I will not take upon me to express,) that a tenant, by making the thing affixed part of the freehold, does by that very act denote an intention of abandoning all future right to the thing affixed, whereby it becomes a species of waste in him if he afterwards remove it. Thus we have seen that the fixture falls within the term, and goes to the reversioner as part of the land.

Having now shewn, (I hope to your satisfaction) this rule on the subject, the next part of my Answer will be to notice the exceptions thereto; remarking, in the first place, that erections, &c. by a tenant may be so constructed as to prevent their becoming affixed to the freehold: with this in view, the tenant is demonstrated to be entitled to erect even buildings, as barns, granaries, sheds and mills, in a manner so to have a right of removing them, and this by erecting them upon blocks, rollers, pattens, pillars, or plates resting on brickwork; because, unless such things be affixed to the freehold by being let into it, or are united to it by means of nails, mortar, or the like, they remain mere moveable chattels. The remaining exceptions I shall notice fuller in a future division.

As between an outgoing and an incoming tenant, I have only to state that in some—nay, most instances, it is usual for these parties to decide on a valuation of such fixtures as the latter might otherwise remove; which leads me to ascertain what articles should be included in this valuation. Those things only are to be valued which are removeable by the outgoing tenant, whether the restriction be in consequence of the general law relative to the removal of fixtures, or of express stipulation by the parties. The rights of the parties however regarding particular articles, are much regulated by custom; wherefore it has been lately held, that a custom to value a particular article, as between outgoing and incoming tenant, is a proper criterion for determining the nature of the property, and whether it be a fixture or not. (See Woodfall, by Harrison, 457.)

I have previously stated that exceptions to the general rules prevail with regard to fixtures for the purposes of trade; and I have stated the general rule on this subject, in effect, to be, that where a lessee, having annexed anything to the freehold during his term, afterwards takes it away, it is waste. But this rule, at a very early period, had several exceptions attempted to be engrafted upon it, and which were at last effectually engrafted upon it in favour of trade, and of those vessels and utensils which are immediately subservient to the purposes of trade. In the Year Book, 42nd Ed. III. 6, the right of the tenant to remove a furnace erected by him during his term, is doubted and adjourned. In the Year Book of the 20th Henry VII. 13 a and b, which was the case of trespass against executors for removing a furnace fixed with mortar by their testator, and annexed to the freehold, and which was holden to be wrongfully done, it is laid down, that “if a lessee for years make a furnace for his advantage, or a dyer make his vats or vessels to occupy his occupation during his term, he may remove them; but if he suffer them to be fixed to the earth after the term, then they belong to the lessor: and so of a baker." This rule, after some further variation, in process of time became fully established; and accordingly, we find Lord Holt, in Poole's case, Salk. 368, laying down, (in the instance of a soap boiler, an under tenant, whose vats, coppers, &c. fixed, had been taken in execution, and on which account the first lessee had brought an action against the sheriff) that during the term the soap boiler might well remove the vats he set up in relation to trade, and that he might do it by the common law, and not by virtue of any special custom in favour of trade and to encourage industry; but that after the term, they became a gift to him in reversion. But no adjudged case has yet gone the length of establishing, that buildings subservient to the purposes of agriculture, as distinguished from those of trade, have been removeable by an executor of tenant for life, nor by the tenant himself who built them during his term. (Western's Conv. vol. 4, p. 16.)

As to ornamental fixtures.—Articles put up for ornament or convenience during the term, have been long allowed to be taken away by the tenant at the expiration of his lease. Instances are to be found as far back as the Year Books (8 Henry VII. 12; 21 Henry VII. 26; Day v. Austin, Owen, 70 Cro. Eliz. 374); but the relaxation of the general rule in these instances is held to be a privilege of a more limited nature than that in respect to trade fixtures, although such distinction does not appear to have been taken in many of the early cases. Fixtures for ornament or convenience cannot be removed where the erections may be deemed a permanent improvement: thus, a conservatory erected on a brick foundation, affixed to and communicating with rooms in a dwelling house by windows and doors, cannot be removed by a tenant for years, who had erected it during his tenancy, although he had a reversion in fee after the death of his lessor; and upon the same principle, it has been held that ranges, ovens, and set pots, affixed to a house built by the person against whom an execution has issued, cannot be taken by the sheriff under a fi. fa.; but window sashes, which are neither hung nor beaded into the frames, but merely fastened by laths nailed across the frames to prevent their falling out, are not fixed to the freehold; so a pump, erected by a tenant during his term, and very slightly affixed to the freehold, is removeable as a tenant's fixture.

The articles for ornament and convenience which have been held to be removeable, are hangings, tapestry, and pier glasses, whether nailed to the walls or panels, or put up in lieu of panels; marble or other ornamental chimney pieces, marble slabs, window blinds, wainscots fixed to the walls by screws, grates, ranges and stoves, although fixed in brickwork; iron backs to chimneys, beds fastened to the wall or ceiling, fixed tables, furnaces and coppers, mash tubs and fixed water tubs, coffee and malt mills, cupboards fixed with hold-fasts, clock cases, iron ovens, and the like. It must however be remarked, that things can be removed only when the separation will occasion but little or no damage. Woodjell, by Harrison, last ed. 447, 448. ### VICE-CHANCELLORS' COURT.

IN RE MRS. TAYLOR.

Sir W. Follett appeared for Mr. Taylor. He said, that before he made any comments on the mass of evidence which had been imported into this case, he should call the attention of the Court to the act of Parliament, as this case involved a question of great importance as to the right of married women to see and have the custody of their children. Mr. K. Bruce had said that there was a right in the mother, which this Court would enforce, a legal right, which the Court would give effect to. He denied both these propositions; the mother had no legal right to the custody of her children. But to determine the question they must look at the act itself. He felt sure that it never had been the intention of the legislature in passing the act to give the court power to make such a sweeping alteration in the common law of the land as that contended for on the other side. He apprehended that the act only gave the court a discretionary power to interfere in very strong and extreme cases only. It was quite clear, that from the commencement of these unfortunate proceedings, Mrs. Taylor was labouring under some unfortunate and baneful influence, which caused her to abandon her husband, her children, and her home; and it was also equally evident, from the mode and manner in which the petition had been presented to the court, and from the contents of the affidavits filed in support of it, that Mrs. Taylor was still labouring under that baneful interest; and whatever the result of this application might be, it was impossible but to think that this position, and the affidavits filed by Mrs. Taylor, had unhappily exasperated every feeling existing between the parties, and had rendered all reconciliation hopeless.

some of the ill effects which had been predicted in Parliament when the act in question was under discussion there. The answers given to the objections raised against the measure by those who advocated it was, that the Court of Chancery would only interfere in great and extreme cases. It was quite apparent that the effect of the present application to the court was most disastrous to the happiness of both parties. At the common law, the exclusive right to the custody of the children was in the father; the mother had no such right; and the father and mother were supposed to live together, the mother thereby enjoying, not only the society of her husband, but also the comfort of being with her children, aiding and assisting in their nurture and education. That was the common law of the land. There might be, and there had been, cases of great oppression and hardship, where the mother was a most blameless and unoffending person, and where the husband had brutally torn the children, who most required a mother's care, away from her; yet formerly, under the common law, she had no remedy against the rights of the husband to maintain the custody of his children. Now, it was with reference to these strong and extreme cases of hardship and oppression only on the part of the husband that this act was passed. The act was never intended to apply to every case of idle dispute which might arise in families between husband and wife; nor to cases where the wife, without cause, voluntarily abandoned her husband, her children, and her home, and who had made false accusations against her husband; and who, notwithstanding every effort at a reconciliation had been attempted on the part of the husband, had rejected them all, and had refused to return to her husband and children. The act was never meant to apply to such cases. or where the husband had not been guilty of cruelty, adultery, or oppression, for in this case his learned friend had conceded, he might say, that those charges did not really exist here. The intention of the common law in giving the husband the exclusive right to the custody of the children was to prevent the numberless petty disputes which were likely to occur in families. The common law right of the father cannot be disputed; and the cases in which the court will interfere to abate the rigour of the common law must be extreme and particular cases of hardship, and under very particular circumstances. This act of Parliament was never intended to overrule the common law, and give to the parties rights inconsistent with it; it only vested in the judges of the Court of Chancery a judicial discretion to act, not in contravention of the common law, but only in cases which to the court should seem convenient and just to mitigate in the favour of the mother the strictness of the rule of law. Then it was left to the court to decide what were those convenient and just grounds upon which alone the court could interfere by granting an order under this act. This case had already been before the ecclesiastical courts, and was still pending in appeal before the Privy Council, which were the most proper and legal tribunals of the country for the adjudication of such matters; why did Mrs. Taylor come to this Court upon petition, when, if she succeeded before the Privy Council, she would obtain in the restitution of conjugal rights all she wanted, access to her children? He thought that this was, pendente lite, a singular application for this lady to make to this Court, asking the court to interfere with the husband's common law right. Sir Edward Sugden, in a speech which he made in the House of Commons, in opposition to this act, when it was under discussion there, had almost identically predicted the present case. Sir Edward said, "Let the House consider what will be the consequence of giving this jurisdiction to any one of the judges at common law, or to any one of the judges in equity. The bill proposes that any one of these judges shall have the power to vary or repeal the order or decree of any other of their number. What will be the consequence? A wife leaves the house of her husband after a sharp quarrel, on what she deems a justifiable cause. She goes at once to an attorney, and says, 'I want and must have access to my children, whom I left in the care of my husband.' He replies to her, 'Then you must make out a case.' She rejoins, 'I can do that readily.' He then tells her, 'You must put your facts into the shape of an affidavit.' She does so by the help of this disinterested adviser, and what will the affidavit contain? It will describe the wretchedness of her married life;—not one incident which has occurred since her marriage to the disadvantage of her husband will be forgotten, and every accidental slight and unkindness will be magnified into oppression and cruelty. A look of scorn, a word of anger, will be brought forward as a real grievance, and, after all, there will be no proper issue, as the lawyers say, for any court to decide, for it will never happen that a woman under such circumstances will rest her claim for access to her children upon any particular instance of cruelty. No woman will admit that she left her husband's home on account of a short quarrel of five minutes duration. No; she will show that she has endured patiently a long course of ill usage and cruelty, and that she did not leave her home until endurance was no longer possible. The husband, exasperated by such an affidavit, will then give the explanation of everything that has occurred in his married life, and will meet her statement of grievances with a statement of her provocations, and, it may be, misconduct. He will endeavour to throw the blame on his wife, just as she has endeavoured to throw it upon her husband. It is proverbially dangerous to interfere in the quarrels of man and wife, as they both generally turn against those who interfere; and I should be loth to incur that responsibility, although armed with judicial authority. There will be no end to the litigation over which the judge will have to preside. Facts will be asserted on one side, and denied on the other. Then the friends of the two parties will take share in their quarrels, and will, as usual, embitter them more and more. Mr. A., who has dined at the house with the parties, will speak to the use of some unkind word at dinner, and Mrs. B., who has her eyes always about her, will describe the withering effect of some scornful glance. The servants will be brought forward, and one half of them will swear one way and the other half the other way. Incontinence will be charged on one side, and adultery on the other, and all this on affidavit, without any personal examination or cross examination of the parties; and upon all the res gestæ thus brought before him the judge will have to decide one way or the other." If this act of Parliament was to be made applicable by the court to every trivial and trifling dispute which might happen to arise between man and wife, nothing would be more injurious to the peace and happiness of society. Such a construction of the act would hold out encouragement to wives to separate from their husbands on the slightest grounds, the foundation of the marriage contract would be entirely sapped, and this Court would be inundated with innumerable applications like the present. But he felt sure the Court of Chancery would only interfere in strong and extreme cases, and therefore, it now became most important for the public to know what was the construction which the court would give to this act. The Court, he therefore thought, would pause before it put a construction on the act, which would have the effect of destroying all the law of the country relating to the common law right of the father to the custody of his children. He contended that Mr. Taylor having gone with his children to reside abroad in a foreign country some time before this act passed, and the present petition was presented, there was no foundation in this Court to affect him with the provisions of this act, which only extended to England and Ireland, and which was only applicable to the cases of parties residing within the jurisdiction. Mrs. Taylor must, therefore, seek redress in the courts in France, if the courts of that country, as he should suppose they did, took cognisance of such matters. Upon both those grounds of construction, in the first place, independently of the facts of the case, the learned counsel contended Mrs. Taylor was not entitled to the interference of the court, under the provisions of the act of Parliament.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said, this was one of the most painful cases that had ever come under his consideration. It appeared that on the 20th of October, 1837, Mrs. Taylor, under what he should always consider the most unfortunate advice which a woman could receive, thought proper to absent herself from her husband's house, and whether there was more or less disclosure made to her of what the real circumstances of the case were or not, it did not appear to his honour to be very material, because she commenced the separation. Now, it appeared that, in consequence of this separation, the husband, naturally feeling extremely galled and cut to the heart by what had been so done by his wife, took measures for leaving this country; and it appeared, as he understood it, in the course of the year 1838, he left England, and had substantially lived abroad since that time. On the 27th of July, 1838, Mrs. Taylor commenced her suit in the Ecclesiastical Court for the restitution of conjugal rights; the husband put in what was termed a defensive allegation, and it appears that allegation was rejected by the sentence of the Consistory Court on the 5th of February, 1839, and then there being an appeal from that decree, the decree below was affirmed by a sentence of the Arches Court, of the 20th June, 1839. Then it appears, that in the course of the summer of last year a certain letter of retraction was sent; and the husband, his honour should observe, appealed from that sentence; and then, on the 29th of October last, the present petition was presented to this court. Now he was not informed at present of what would have been the effect, if the sentence of affirmation had never been appealed from; but inasmuch as there was an appeal, one thing was quite certain, that that suit was by no means as yet determined; and he thought it would be highly improper for him to give any opinion on the question whether the affirmation of the Court of Arches of the sentence of the Consistory Court was right or wrong, because in the first place this court, at least the jurisdiction which the Lord Chancellor exercised, had nothing of an appellant jurisdiction over the proceedings of the Ecclesiastical Court, and as a further reason it occurred to his mind that it was very possible he might have himself to sit as one of the appellant judges in the Privy Council judging of that appeal, and therefore he should refrain from pronouncing any opinion at all on the matter, but certain it was, that, at present, the wife having commenced the suit for restitution of conjugal rights, the issue of that suit, the final issue, was uncertain; and it is possible that ate of things in the Ecclesiastical Court that this lady has presented the petition which was now under consideration, and which, it should be observed, asked for a portion of that which she certainly would have entirely if she should succeed in the sentence for the restitution of conjugal rights; she would have access to her children if restitution of conjugal rights was decreed; that inferred of itself that she would have access to her children.

Mr. K. Bruce.—The husband might keep them apart.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said he was acting on the supposition that the decree of the court would be enforced; at any rate it would then be established by the law of the land, which had jurisdiction over these questions, that she had an unqualified right to the access to her children. Now struck his honour that the jurisdiction which this act had given, being to be exercised solely at the discretion of the court, that it would be hardly a right thing for this court to say that the lady was entitled to have access to her children pending the question in the Ecclesiastical Court which she had thought proper to raise. It appeared, as he understood it, that the conduct of the husband had been bond fide throughout. The husband went to France, and began his foreign residence prior to the institution of the trial in the Ecclesiastical Court, and then it did appear to his honour that if the court was to direct access, at its discretion, at such times and subject to such regulations as the court should deem convenient and just, the court ought to be reasonably assured, before it did interfere at all, that it could carry the sentence into execution. It might be true that if the children were here, the court could then see its way with some facility as to the mode of executing its order. He doubted very much himself whether this act of Parliament was meant to be applicable to a case where the husband bond fide, before the presentation of any petition by the wife, had actually removed his children to a foreign country, and that this court would interfere. It seemed to him rather to be inferred from the act that as far as the husband and the children were concerned, their residence is to remain the same, and the act never meant that that should be altered; and his honour confessed he did not himself foresee how, consistently with the fact of Mr. Taylor's persevering in his residence abroad, which, as far as the law at present stood, he might lawfully do,—how far his honour could ever succeed in making any order which would be capable of being carried into effect, under the circumstances; that at present it appeared to him that there ought to be no jurisdiction exercised under this act of Parliament pending the question in the Ecclesiastical Court, which, combined with the difficulty of making any order which would be effectual, appeared to him to be a reason for not interfering under the act. There were no particular directions given, but that "it should be lawful for the Lord Chancellor," and so on, "on the hearing the petition of the mother, if he shall see fit, to make an order for the access of the petitioner to such infant or infants at such times, and subject to such regulations, as he shall deem convenient and just;" and independently of that, the very fact that this lady did herself, as it now appears, without cause, remove herself from her husband—that appeared to him to be a reason why this court ought not to exercise the jurisdiction of ordering any access. Now his honour's opinion, therefore, was, that no order should be made upon the petition for the present; and what he was inclined to do was this, simply to make no order on this petition, but to give leave to the parties to apply, because non constat that there might be such a termination of the proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Court as that it might make it right, coupled with other circumstances which might happen, for the court to interfere on the ground of the facts presented in this petition. But (continued his honour) before he finally disposed of this case he could not help saying, that inasmuch as there had been a great deal of contest about character in this petition, that, in the first place, it appeared to him that there was nothing whatever to sully the character of Mrs. Taylor in the least. He thought she had been placed in an unfortunate position, because she had unluckily taken the advice of those who had not integrity enough, or wisdom enough, to give her proper advice; and the advice which she appears to have received from Mr. and Mrs. Schneider, on the affidavits, though he dared say it was very honestly given, appeared to his Honour to have been given too much under the influence of feeling to be considered as the soundest and best advice. With respect to another person who figured in this transaction, he must say he did entertain a most evil opinion of all that he had said and done—he meant Mr. Harris; and it appeared to his Honour to be one of the mutual misfortunes of both Mr. and Mrs. Taylor, that Mr. Taylor, in the fulness of that generous spirit which, notwithstanding his hasty temper, he thought was manifest, not merely because it was sworn to in abstract terms, but because it is made to appear as plain as daylight from the enumeration of a great number of minute circumstances,—his Honour did look upon him as a man of generous temper, but who certainly was hasty, and certainly did, like most men, laudably wish to preserve his authority;—it did seem to his Honour that it was a great misfortune, both to Mr. and Mrs. Taylor, that he (Mr. Taylor) encour-raged as he had the perpetual intercourse between himself and his wife and Mr. Harris, because the facts spoke for themselves, about which there was no dispute. All that was known of the early part of Mr. Harris's life was, that when he was in Italy he was engaged in intrigues with a variety of women; and when he came to this country he appears to have been in a very great degree assisted by the liberal manner in which he had been treated by Mr. Taylor; and his Honour would allude more particularly to those facts which were stated, and about which there was no dispute, that when he went into the country and so on, Mr. Taylor was at the expense of his staying at the inn and keeping his horses, and so on; but it appeared that for certain circumstances, and for some reasons which are not explained, those letters, of which so much had been said, were placed in the house of Mr. and Mrs. Taylor. His honour firmly believed what was stated by Mrs. Taylor to be true, that she never read the letters, and indeed she states that she could not have understood them, which was very likely; and one of the reasons why his Honour himself asked the question whether he could see the letters was that he might be able, by just looking at them, to determine for himself, by the inspection, merely how far that was likely to be true. However, he did not see them, and therefore he must take it to be true; but it was quite obvious from what was stated about those letters, that they were most improper letters to be introduced into the house of any person, and his Honour had been unable to conceive why Mr. Harris should have wished those letters preserved during his life, and not to be destroyed until after his death, which is the representation that was made. Then there was this fact about Mr. Harris, that when the circumstances took place which were stated, about the 20th of October, that he having been treated as a friend by his benefactor and friend, Mr. Taylor, never bethought himself of taking the only course which, as between man and man, it appeared to him it was right for him (Mr. Harris) to take—that is to say, he never even met Mr. Taylor face to face on the subject, but certainly in a manner that could by no means be applauded, connived at the keeping of Mrs. Taylor separate from her husband. Well, then, it appeared, and his Honour was much struck with the circumstance when he read that in one of the very last discussions that took place between Mr. Harford, Mr. Storry, and Mr. M'Caughee, and Mr. Schneider, and Mr. Harris, that Mr. Harris made use of this expression, which in his Honour's mind, threw a considerable light on the whole transaction; for it is stated; first of all, that Mr. Schneider made use of a very strange expression, "and that the said Christopher Harris declared on the same occasion that he would rather Mrs. Taylor walked the streets than return home." And his Honour could not help thinking that a wish which, in his mind, might ultimately have terminated in such a circumstance, was the thing that actuated him throughout; but, however, whether it was so or not, this was found about him, that he (Harris) became bankrupt in April, 1839, and debts to the amount of £10,500. had been proved against him. It was stated that he had not paid any dividend, and that no dividend was likely to be paid, and that he had not obtained his certificate; and his Honour mentioned these circumstances because he (Harris) had thought proper, in one of his affidavits, to impute to Mr. Taylor a set of expressions at once most blasphemous, but, at the same time, so utterly foolish, that his Honour could not induce himself to believe that there was one word of truth in that statement; and with respect to Mr. Taylor, it did appear to him, that though he appears to have been mistaken in some things, yet that he had acted with very great kindness and generosity, not merely to his horses, on which there was abundant testimony, but also to his wife, his friends, and dependants, and to a variety of persons with whom he was accidentally connected; and his Honour could only himself hope that, inasmuch as Mr. Taylor had such a generous temper, he would allow his generous temper to be exerted to the full extent of generosity; and that, although he had suffered deeply, and had received injuries which might be thought in point of prudence might make it right for him to keep his wife from home and children, and which it might be very natural for persons to think would be right, that he would, acting on his generous feeling and his religious principles, recollect this, that, however wise in one sense, and natural in another to treat his wife as he was now disposed to do, it was godlike to forgive; and his Honour did think that, under all the circumstances, he must leave the parties at present to deal with the circumstances in which they were placed, and not make any order on this petition until he knew further what would be the result of the proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Court. The petition should, therefore, stand over, with liberty to apply.

ROLLS' COURT—June 7.

CARTER v. BENTALL.

LIMITATIONS in a Will—Dying will. Issue unexplained when TOO REMOTE, consequently void.

This suit was instituted to carry into effect the trusts and limitations of the will of Tice-

Mendham, and to obtain the opinion of the Court upon the validity of the limitations over.

The Bill stated that Thomas Mendham (who was formerly in the Petty Bag Office) by his will gave the interest and dividends of certain Long Annuities to his wife for her life, provided she accepted the same in lieu and full discharge of her marriage bond, and her thirds at common law. The testator then confirmed a deed of gift, dated the 8th July, 1818, wherein he had given and granted to his godson, Thomas Mendham Newson, otherwise Thomas Newson Mendham, immediately after his decease a certain annuity of £150 for his life, which the testator directed to be paid him accordingly by his executrix out of the dividends and interest of his personal estate. But in case such deed of gift should be lost or mislaid, then he directed the said annuity of £150 to be paid to the said Thomas Mendham Newson, as and in the nature of a bequest to him for his life; and the testator also gave and bequeathed unto the said Thomas Mendham Newson a further annuity of £50, after the decease of his wife, for his life. The testator also gave and bequeathed to his daughter, Sybella Mendham, all the interest, dividends, income, and produce of his whole personal estate undisposed of by his will, and the rents, issues, and profits of his real and leasehold estates whatsoever and wheresoever, and of what nature or kind soever for her life, for her own sole and separate use and benefit, and her receipts only to be a proper discharge for the same. And the testator directed that his India bonds and Exchequer bills should be sold by his executrix, with the advice and assistance of Mr. Marmaduke Langdale the elder, or of his son if he should be dead, and that the money arising therefrom, together with any other ready money belonging to him at the time of his decease, after payment of his debts, legacies, and testamentary and funeral expenses, should be invested in the public funds, and the interest and dividends thereof should be paid to his said daughter, Sybella Mendham, for her life, and after her decease to go along with the residue of his estate, subject to the said annuities, legacies, and payments in the said deed of gift. And after the decease of his wife and daughter, the said testator gave, devised, and bequeathed to the said Marmaduke Langdale the elder, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, and to Thomas George Knapp, Esq. clerk of the Haberdasher's Company, and his heirs and assigns, and to his successors, clerks of the said company for the time being, and to the survivor of them, and to the heirs, executors, and administrators of such survivor all his capital stock in the public funds, and all the rest and residue of his real and personal estate whatsoever and wheresoever, and of what nature or kind soever, subject to the said deed of gift and legacies as aforesaid, TO HOLD to them, their heirs, executors, administrators, successors, and assigns UPON TRUST, to sell and dispose of his freehold and leasehold estates to the best advantage to such purchaser or purchasers as might be had or gotten for the same; and the money arising therefrom, and all dividends and interest due to the testator, he directed should be laid out in the public funds upon the trusts thereafter mentioned, and to be considered as part of and go along with the residue of his estate. And upon this further trust to transfer and pay one moiety, or half part of the whole clear residue of his estate, whether in the public funds or in any other security, to the issue of his said daughter, if she should happen to marry and have any such issue, equally between them, share and share alike, and to be paid and transferred to him, her, or them at their respective age or ages of 21 years; and if only one child, then the whole to be in trust for such one child; the dividends and interest and profits thereof in the meantime to be applied in the maintenance and education of such issue, and the overplus (if any) to be in like manner laid out in the public funds, for the use and benefit of such issue. And the said testator directed the same to be transferred and paid to him, her, or them accordingly. And in default of such issue, the said testator gave, devised, and bequeathed the said one moiety, or half part of the residue of his estate, to and amongst all his nephews and nieces who should be living at the time of the decease of his said daughter, Sybella Mendham, in shares as therein mentioned. And as to the other moiety, or half part of the said residue of his estate, at the decease of his said wife and daughter without issue, the said testator gave and devised the same to the said Marmaduke Langdale and Thomas George Knapp, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, and to the survivor of them, and to the heirs, executors, administrators, successors, and assigns of such survivor, upon trust, to permit and suffer the said Thomas Mendham Newson, otherwise Thomas Newson Mendham, to take and receive the interest, dividends, and income thereof for his life, to and for his own use and benefit, in lieu and stead of the said annuities given him by the said deed of gift, and by the now stating will; and after his decease, then upon trust to permit and suffer the Treasurer for the time being of St. Bartholomew's Hospital, London, and his successors, and of St. Thomas's Hospital in the Borough of Southwark and his successors, and the Governors of the Society of the Sons of the Clergy at Ipswich in Suffolk, and also the Master and Wardens of the Worshipful Company of Haberdashers in Maiden Lane, Lon- don, for the time being, and each and every of them to receive and take the dividends, interest, and produce of the last-mentioned moiety of the residue of his estate, and annually to divide the same equally between the said Hospital, the said Society, and the said Company of Haberdashers, share and share alike, for ever, to enable them to relieve and assist their patients, aged, infirm, and decayed members and impotent persons, in their several and respective departments; all which the said testator declared he had given them in return for the relief and assistance afforded by each of them to two of his aged ancestors and relations. And the testator appointed his said daughter, Sybella Mendham, sole executrix of his will. Mrs. Mendham, the wife of the testator, died in his lifetime; and the testator died in 1812, without altering or revoking his will, which was proved by his daughter and executrix, who survived him. Thomas Mendham Newson died in 1817. In 1813 Miss Mendham, in contemplation of marriage, suffered a recovery of the freehold estates of the testator, and afterwards married the Rev. Claude Carter; she died in 1835 without having ever had a child, and having survived her husband, but having previously made a will, whereby she gave the one moiety of her residuary real and personal estate to her nephew and niece, the plaintiffs, William Claude Carter and Sarah Catherine Carter, equally; and she gave two-thirds of the remaining moiety to the children of William Bentall, who should be living at her death, equally; and the remaining third of the last-mentioned moiety she gave to the children of Willam Adams, equally. The plaintiffs, William Claude Carter and Sarah Catherine Carter, charged by the Bill that the gifts of the testator's residuary estate for the benefit of his nephews and nieces, and of the charities, were limited to take effect after an indefinite failure of issue of Sybella Carter, the daughter of the testator, and were therefore void, and lapsed for the benefit of the said Sybella Carter, as the heiress-at-law and sole next of kin of the testator, and passed by her will to the persons beneficially interested in her property under the same. And that if the whole of the residuary real and personal estate of the testator did not pass to the said Sybella Carter, at all events no other part of the said residuary estate passed for the benefit of the said charities than one moiety only of the residuary personal estate, other than chattels real, or chattels which savoured of the realty. The Bill prayed that the trusts of the will of the testator might be carried into effect, and that the rights and interests of all parties in his residuary estate might be ascertained and declared; and that the will of the said Sybella Carter might be carried into effect, and the rights and interests of all persons interested in her residuary estate might be ascertained and declared.

Mr. Pemberton, for the plaintiff, contended that the limitations over, after the death of Sybella Carter, the testator's daughter, were too indefinite and remote, and consequently void.

LORD LANGDALE, after detailing the facts before stated, said, that in relation to the first-mentioned moiety of the residue of the testator's estate, it was a distinct gift to the issue of his daughter; and that the use of the words "if only one child," and "such one child," illustrates that the testator meant by the word "issue," children of his daughter; and in default of such children, the gift over to the testator's nephews and nieces took effect.

With regard to the second moiety of the residue of the testator's estate to Thomas Mendham Newson, after the decease of the testator's daughter without issue, this was too remote.

In disposing of the moieties the testator was contemplating his daughter's death, and in doing so with respect to one moiety he considered that he had made a distinct gift, but as to the other he had made no distinct gift. It had been argued that the same intention was expressed in both clauses, but it was difficult to suppose that the testator had used the word "issue" in the will in two senses, and in the last clause there was no prior limitation; he could not, therefore, imply any gift to the issue, since there was no prior limitation in favour of the objects of the previous clause. As to the first moiety the testator made a distinct gift to his daughter in terms—a gift to her children, and in default of such children he gives the moiety over. As to the second moiety he makes no such distinct gift, but the gift over is to take effect upon the death of his daughter without issue; in the first case the testator has explained his meaning of the word issue to mean children; and in the second case he has made no such explanation, nor does he precede the gift over by any prior limitation, in terms that might qualify or explain the meaning of the word "issue." I cannot bring myself to think that in both cases the word "issue" must have the same meaning. I think the gift over as to the second moiety is too remote, and that no effect can therefore be given to it. It is void as to all the property, real and personal.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS—JAN 13 Sittings in Banco.

ROBERTSON, Manager of the National Provincial Bank of England v. SHEWARD and Another.
Construction of the term "Manager" of a Bank, such Bank having various Branches in the Country; with a Manager or Chief Clerk to each.—Whether a Promissory Note issued at a Country Branch, and made payable to the Manager, means the General Manager or the Local Manager.

The plaintiff in this case was the manager of the National Provincial Bank of England. He brought this action against the defendant as maker of a promissory note for £1000. made payable to the Manager of the National Provincial Bank of England, or his order, which when it became due was dishonoured. It appeared that the National Provincial Bank of England was established in London, with branches at Birmingham, Manchester, Shrewsbury, and other towns. The plaintiff was the manager of the principal establishment; but at each of the branch establishments there was a clerk, who was sometimes called manager. The note in question was dated Birmingham. The defendant pleaded several pleas, the third, setting out the note in terms, alleged that the plaintiff was not at the time of making the note, or since the manager of the National Provincial Bank of England in the said promissory note mentioned.

The cause was tried at the Warwick last Assizes, before Lord Denman, when it was insisted for the defendant that the manager of the note was payable meant the manager of the Birmingham establishment, and that consequently the plaintiff was not the party entitled to recover, he being the general manager.

The jury, however, having returned a verdict in favour of the plaintiff for £1,132., the amount of principal and interest, a rule was afterwards obtained, calling on the plaintiff to show why the verdict should not be entered for the defendants, on the plea which denied that the plaintiff was the payee of the note, or why there should not be a new trial, as the plaintiff had not shown to be the registered public officer of the company, as required by the Act of Parliament.

Serjeant Goulbourn now showed cause against the rule.

NDAL, C. J. said, the main question arose on the third plea, which amounted very nearly to an assertion that the action was brought in a wrong name, for it was alleging that the plaintiff was not the payee of the note. Now it appeared that the different branches of the National Provincial Bank of England were in fact all part of the same co-partnership concern; just as if a banker in London were to take houses in different towns throughout the country, and place clerks to carry on his business. It was the position which the chief clerks or managers of the branch banks occupied; and if the Court were not to say that a particular construction was to be given to the note, from the fact of its being dated at Birmingham, there was nothing at all to show that the general manager of the bank was not the person intended. The evidence certainly went to show that in point of fact he was the person contemplated as the payee of the note, and he could not see that there was any thing in the circumstance of the note being dated at Birmingham to affect that intention. He thought, therefore, that the third plea had been properly determined in favour of the plaintiff. That being so, there was upon the record no room for the other question which had been mentioned; because, if the defendant had intended to make that defence, he should have alleged that this was one of the companies which were required by the act to have a registered public officer, in whose name the action ought to have been brought.

The other judges concurred.—Rule discharged.

PERCIVAL v. HORNE AND OTHERS.

BAILMENTS.—COMMON CARRIERS. — Their liabilities, and exemptions from liabilities.

This was an action to recover £50., the value of a parcel sent by the defendants' coach from Newbury to be conveyed to London, but which was lost.

Mr. Serjeant Atcherley stated the plaintiff's case.

It appeared that the plaintiff, who is a soap manufacturer in London, employed his son as his traveller; and that the latter had booked a parcel, containing bank-notes and cash to the amount of £50., at Jackes's booking-office at Newbury, on the 27th of February, 1838. The parcel was directed to the plaintiff in London, but not having come to hand, an inquiry was instituted, when it was ascertained that it had been despatched by the Regulator coach, belonging to the defendants, but had never more been heard of. The defence was, that there was a board affixed in the booking-office in question, apprising the public that the proprietors would not be accountable for parcels of the value of upwards of £10., unless entered and paid for accordingly. Upon this point there was contradictory evidence, the plaintiff's son swearing positively that there was no such board up in the office when he booked the parcel, and the defendants' servants swearing that there was.

Verdict for the plaintiff—Damages £50.

GRIPPER v. BARSTOW.

WARRANT of ATTORNEY—Its due execution under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110.—As to the necessity that the Defendant should have the option of naming an Attorney to attest his execution of a Warrant of Attorney.

Mr. Kelly had obtained a rule to show cause why the judgment entered up on the warrant of attorney should not be set aside, with costs, on the ground that the warrant of attorney had not been properly attested within the regulations of the statute 1 & 2 Victoria, c. 110, which provides that the execution of all such instruments shall be attested by an attorney "expressly named by, and attending on behalf of, the party executing the same." It appeared that the plaintiff's attorney called on the defendant to execute such an instrument, and saying that some professional person must be present, added, "I will send Mr. S—— to attend on your behalf." Upon this they left the house with the intention of going to Mr. S——'s office, but meeting him in the street, the plaintiff's attorney told him the object of their intended visit, when that gentleman proposed that they should go to the office of the plaintiff's attorney. Arrived there, Mr. S—— explained the nature of the warrant to the defendant, and asked him whether he wished him to attest his execution of it, to which he received an answer in the affirmative.

Mr. Richards showed cause against the rule, and contended that the requisites of the act had been substantially complied with, "Jackson v. Nichol (a)."

Mr. Kelly supported the rule, on the ground that the nomination of Mr. S—— must be taken upon the affidavits to have proceeded altogether from the attorney for the plaintiff, without any choice having been exercised upon the subject by their client.

ALDERSON, B., said, that to bring a case within the act, it must appear that the defendant understood that he had an option upon the subject. If that was so, and the nomination or recommendation of a professional man by the plaintiff's attorney was confirmed or adopted subsequently by him, then no doubt the act would be substantially complied with. Viewing this rule through that medium, it did not appear satisfactorily that the position of the defendant was clearly explained by him, and, as he might perhaps have executed this warrant of attorney under the impression that he was bound by the nomination of a professional man by the plaintiff's attorney, it was impossible to say that the requisites of the act had been complied with.

Rule absolute.

CONSISTORY COURT.—July 18.

WOODS v. WOODS.

INCESTUOUS MARRIAGES—A man marries daughter of his own sister—EVIDENCE—Whether the Register of the Marriage the best evidence that it took place.

This was a proceeding against George Woods for a sentence of the Court that a marriage contracted by him with the daughter of his sister should be declared null and void, as being incestuous. The case will be found fully explained by the sentence.

Dr. LUSHINGTON gave sentence. He observed that the facts of the case were most simple and there was no doubt as to the law, but unfortunately objections and difficulties had arisen which the Court had greatly to lament. The evidence had been taken partly in London, partly in Norfolk. The result of the evidence in London was, that there was no proof that the registers had been collated; but the Judge was of opinion, that if oral evidence was sufficient, there was ample of the very best character—namely, the testimony of the nearest relatives of the parties—to their connexion by blood to their marriage and cohabitation. What was essential to be proved is not the legality of marriage, but the relationship by blood; and this which rendered such connexions contrary to law. In all the courts the fact of the marriage may be proved by witnesses without any register at all. If there be a connexion between the parties by blood, even if they were illegitimate, the Court must still pronounce a sentence against them. It was not satisfied that a register was to be considered as the best evidence, for it was not absolutely necessary that a marriage should be registered at all: a mistake in the register could not affect the validity of a marriage, nor was a register of marriage like a deed or agreement, that could be proved by viva voce evidence; it is a mere return or memorandum. A baptismal certificate is evidence of birth; it is only an acknowledgment of a party that the child so baptized is his. The evidence from Norfolk has been objected to on two grounds; first, that the oath had not been administered by a competent authority; secondly, that the evidence had been so taken as to preclude the possibility of prosecuting the witnesses for perjury if they deposed falsely and contrary to fact. The first objection he overruled; but with reference to the other, it appeared that, by the mistake of the examiner, the heading of the deposition of seven witnesses purported they had been taken in articles which did not exist, and he was bound to declare that there could be no indictment for perjury against them. He was, therefore, bound to reject their evidence. Still there was proof sufficient to establish legally the facts, of which there was no moral doubt, that the party proceeded against had married and still cohabited with his own niece. He therefore pronounced this marriage null and void; he directed the parties to separate from their incestuous connexion, and he would feel bound to enforce this sentence, not only from legal considerations, but according to the principles of general morality: for, whatever cases might be entertained regarding marriages between persons connected by affinity, marriages within the degrees of consanguinity were revolting to the opinions and feelings of mankind. Although in some instances public penance had been directed in such cases; yet, after full consideration, he thought it advisable not to make this a part of his judgment.

Whereas by an Act passed in the last session of Parliament, intituled "An Act for the further regulation of the duties on Postage until the 5th day of October 1840," power was given to the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, or any three of them, by warrant under their hands, to alter, fix, reduce, or remit any of the rates of British or inland or other postage payable by or on the transmission of post letters, and to subject such letters to rates of postage according to the weight thereof, and a scale of weight to be contained in such warrant (without reference to the distance or number of miles the same might be conveyed), and to fix and limit the weight of letters to be sent by the post, and to suspend, wholly or in part, any parliamentary or official privilege of sending and receiving letters by the post free of postage, or any other franking privilege, and also to direct that letters written on stamped paper, or enclosed in stamped covers, having a stamp affixed thereto, should (if within the limitation of weight to be fixed under the provisions of the said act, and if the stamp could not have been used before) pass by the post free of postage, and also to require, in case the stamp on which any letter should be written, or the stamp on the cover in which it should be enclosed, or to which it should be affixed, should be of less value or amount than in such warrant should be expressed, or should have been used before, such letter should be charged and chargeable with such rate of postage as such warrant should direct, and to order and direct the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes from time to time to provide proper and sufficient dies or other implements for expressing and denoting the rates and duties which should be directed by any such warrant as aforesaid, and to give any other orders and make any other regulations relative thereto

they might deem expedient: And whereas the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland have, by several warrants under their hands, in pursuance of the power or authority given to them by the said act, fixed and limited a scale of weight of letters to be transmitted by the post, and directed the rates of postage to be charged and taken on such letters, and have made regulations for the sending of letters stamped free of postage, and made other regulations relative to the sending of letters by the post: And whereas it is expedient that such rates and regulations should be made permanent by law: Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that all letters and newspapers and other printed papers, which shall be posted in any town or place within the United Kingdom, or shall be brought from parts beyond the seas to any port or place within the United Kingdom, or shall be sent by the post between the United Kingdom and places beyond the seas, or between any of the other places herein-after mentioned, or shall pass through the United Kingdom, shall be subject to the several regulations and rates herein-after contained.

2. And be it enacted, that letters transmitted by the post shall be charged by weight according to the following scale, and that the several numbers of rates of postage herein-after set forth, shall be charged by and be paid to her Majesty's postmaster-general, for the use of her Majesty, on letters transmitted by the post; (that is to say,)

On every letter not exceeding half an ounce in weight, one rate of postage;

On every letter exceeding half an ounce and not exceeding one ounce in weight, two rates of postage:

On every letter exceeding one ounce and not exceeding two ounces in weight, four rates of postage:

On every letter exceeding two ounces and not exceeding three ounces in weight, six rates of postage:

And on every letter exceeding three ounces and not exceeding four ounces in weight, eight rates of postage:

And for every ounce in weight above the weight of four ounces, there shall be charged and taken two additional rates of postage, and every fraction of an ounce above the weight of four ounces shall be charged as one additional ounce.

3. And be it enacted, that no letter exceeding sixteen ounces in weight shall be forwarded by the post between places within the United Kingdom, except petitions and addresses to her Majesty, and petitions to either House of Parliament, and except in such other cases and subject to such regulations and restrictions as the Commissioners of her Majesty's treasury, by warrant under their hands, shall from time to time direct.

4. And be it enacted, that the following rates of postage shall be charged by and be paid to her Majesty's postmaster-general, for the use of her Majesty, on letters transmitted by the post; (that is to say,)

Inland Letters.

On all letters not exceeding half an ounce in weight, transmitted by the post between places within the United Kingdom, (not being letters sent to or from parts beyond the seas,) or posted in any post town in the United Kingdom, addressed to persons or places within such town or the suburbs thereof, there shall be charged and paid one uniform rate of one penny, without reference to the number of sheets, or pieces of paper, or enclosures of which the same may be composed, or to the distance or number of miles the same shall be conveyed; and that on all such letters, if exceeding half an ounce in weight, there shall be charged and paid progressive and additional rates of postage (each additional rate being estimated at one penny), according to the scale of weights and number of rates herein-before fixed and declared; provided that such postage of one penny, and such progressive and additional postage, be pre-paid at the time of posting such letters, or that such letters be duly and properly stamped when posted, as herein-after provided; but in case such postage on any such letters shall not be pre-paid, and such letters shall not be duly and properly stamped, there shall be charged on such letters the rate of postage herein-after mentioned.

5. And be it enacted, that the postmaster-general may forward letters between places in the United Kingdom by vessels not packet-boats, and that all letters forwarded under the authority of the postmaster-general by private vessels or packet-boats, and transmitted between places in the United Kingdom, shall be considered as forwarded by the post between such places, and be charged accordingly.

Colonial Letters by Packet Boat.

6. And be it enacted, that on all letters not exceeding half-an-ounce in weight transmitted by packet-boat between the United Kingdom and her Majesty's colonies, or between any of her Majesty's colonies through the United Kingdom, (including letters to and from the East Indies by any of her Majesty's Mediterranean packet-boats to and from the United Kingdom via Syria or Egypt, but not including letters sent through France,) there shall be charged and paid the several rates of British postage herein-after mentioned and specified; (that is to say,)

Between any place within the United Kingdom, wherever situate, and any port in her Majesty's colonies, one uniform rate of one shilling, and between any of her Majesty's colonies through the United Kingdom, one uniform rate of two shillings:

And on all such letters, if exceeding half-an-ounce in weight, there shall be charged and paid progressive and additional rates of postage, according to the scale of weight and number of rates herein-before contained, each additional rate being estimated at one shilling or two shillings, according as such letter shall be chargeable under this enactment, if not exceeding half-an-ounce in weight.

7. And be it enacted, that the postmaster-general may collect and receive letters to forward by vessels not packet-boats to places beyond the seas, and may forward the same accordingly, and may collect and receive letters brought by any such vessels from places beyond the seas.

8. And be it enacted, that on all letters exceeding half-an-ounce in weight, transmitted by vessels not packet-boats, between the United Kingdom and any place beyond the seas, including Ceylon, the Mauritius, the Cape of Good Hope, and the East Indies, or between any places beyond the seas through the United Kingdom, there shall be charged and paid the British postage the rates following; (that is to say,)

Between the United Kingdom and any place beyond the seas, at whatever place within the United Kingdom the letters may be posted and delivered, one uniform rate of eightpence, and between any places beyond the seas through the United Kingdom, one uniform rate of one shilling and fourpence.

And on all such letters, if exceeding half-an-ounce in weight, there shall be charged and paid progressive and additional rates of postage, according to the scale of weight and number of rates herein-before contained, estimating and charging each additional rate at eightpence or one shilling and fourpence, according as such letters shall be chargeable under this enactment, if not exceeding half-an-ounce in weight.

Foreign Letters.

9. And be it enacted, that on all letters transmitted by the post between the United Kingdom and foreign parts, or between any of the parts out of the United Kingdom mentioned in the schedule to this act annexed, there shall be charged and paid the several rates of British postage mentioned and specified in such schedule.

10. And be it enacted, that all letters brought into the United Kingdom by packet-boats (whether in a mail-bag or not) shall be charged with packet postage.

11. And be it enacted, that on all printed votes and proceedings of the Imperial Parliament forwarded by the post between places in the United Kingdom, or posted in any post town of the United Kingdom, addressed to persons or places within such town, or the suburbs thereof, and on all printed votes and proceedings of the Imperial Parliament sent to any of her Majesty's colonies by packet-boat, and on all printed votes and proceedings of the colonial legislatures sent to the United Kingdom from the colonies by packet-boat (but not through France nor to the East Indies by her Majesty's Mediterranean packet-boats via Syria or Egypt), there shall be charged and paid the rates of British postage following; (that is to say,)

If not exceeding four ounces in weight, a rate of one penny:

If exceeding four ounces and not exceeding eight ounces in weight, a rate of twopence:

If exceeding eight ounces and not exceeding twelve ounces in weight, a rate of threepence:

And if exceeding twelve ounces and not exceeding sixteen ounces in weight, a rate of fourpence:

And for every additional four ounces in weight above the weight of sixteen ounces, there shall be charged and paid an additional rate of one penny:

And any lesser weight than four ounces shall be charged as four ounces:

Provided always, that it shall be lawful for the Postmaster-general (if he shall see fit) to delay the transmission of any such printed votes or proceedings for any space not exceeding twenty-four hours from the time at which the same would otherwise have been forwarded.

12. And be it enacted, that all letters posted and addressed to any place within the United Kingdom, and enclosed in stamped covers, or having a stamp or stamps affixed thereto, and all printed votes and proceedings of the Imperial Parliament, and all newspapers which shall be liable to postage under this act, shall, if posted in any town or place within the United Kingdom, and enclosed in stamped covers, or having a stamp or stamps affixed thereto, (the stamp or stamps in every such case being affixed or appearing on the outside, and of the value or amount herein-after expressed and specially provided under the authority of this act, or of the last recited act, and if the stamp shall not have been used before,) pass by the post free of postage, as herein-after mentioned; (that is to say,) in case any such letters shall be posted in and addressed to any place within the United Kingdom, the stamp or stamps thereon shall be equal in value or amount to the rates of postage to which such letters would be liable under this act if pre-paid.

In case any such letters shall be addressed to any other of the British dominions or colonies, or to any foreign country, the stamp or stamps thereon shall be equal in value or amount to the rates of postage to which such votes or proceedings, or newspapers, would have been liable under this act:

And that in all cases in which the same shall be necessary, in order to place on any such letters, printed votes or proceedings of Parliament, and newspapers, the full amount of stamps hereby required as aforesaid, there shall be affixed thereto such a number of adhesive stamps as alone or in combination with the stamp on such letters or packets, or on the envelope or cover thereof, will be equal in amount to the rate of postage to which such letters, printed votes or proceedings of parliament, and newspapers, would be liable under this act.

13. And be it enacted, that in all cases in which letters posted in and addressed to places within the United Kingdom shall be posted without any stamp thereon, and without the postage being pre-paid, there shall be charged on such letters a postage of double the amount to which such letters would otherwise be liable under this act; and in all cases in which printed votes or proceedings of Parliament, or newspapers liable to postage under this act, shall be posted without any stamp thereon, there shall be charged on such votes and proceedings, or newspapers, the postage to which the same would be liable under this act.

14. And whereas letters and packets sent by the post are chargeable by law on being re-directed and again forwarded by the post with a new and distinct rate of postage; be it enacted, that on every post letter re-directed (whether posted with any stamp thereon or not) there shall be charged for the postage of such letter, from the place at which the same shall be re-directed to the place of ultimate delivery (in addition to all other rates of postage payable thereon), such a rate of postage only as the same would be liable to if pre-paid.

15. And be it enacted, that in all cases in which any letters posted in and addressed to places within the United Kingdom shall be posted, having thereon or affixed thereto any stamp or stamps the value or amount of which shall be less than the rate of postage to which such letters would be liable under this act if pre-paid, there shall be charged on such letters a postage of double the amount of the difference between the value of such stamp or stamps and the postage to which such letters would be liable as aforesaid if pre-paid.

16. And be it enacted, that in all cases in which any votes or proceedings of Parliament, newspapers, addressed to places in the United Kingdom, shall be posted, having thereon or affixed thereto, any stamp or stamps, the value or amount of which shall be less than the rate of postage to which such votes or proceedings or newspapers would be liable under this act, there shall be charged on such votes or proceedings or newspapers a postage equal to the amount of the difference between the value of such stamp or stamps and the postage to which such votes or proceedings or newspapers would be liable as aforesaid.

17. Provided always, and be it enacted, that it shall in all cases be optional with the parties sending any letters, printed votes or proceedings in Parliament, or newspapers, by the post, to forward the same free of postage by means of a proper stamp or stamps thereon, or affixed thereto, in manner herein-before provided, or to forward the same in like manner as the same might otherwise have been forwarded under this act; but nevertheless, in case any letters, printed votes or proceedings of Parliament, or newspapers, addressed to places out of the United Kingdom, shall have thereon, or affixed thereto, any stamp or stamps being less in amount or value than the rates of postage to which such letters, or such votes or proceedings, or newspapers, would be liable under this act, such letters, printed votes or proceedings of Parliament, or newspapers, if the postage thereon be required by the Postmaster-General under the provisions of this act to be paid when posted, shall not in any case be forwarded by the post, but shall, so far as may be practicable, be returned to the senders thereof through the dead-letter office; and if the postage on such letters, printed votes or proceedings, or newspapers, be not so required to be paid when posted, the same may be forwarded charged with such postage as if no stamp had been thereon or affixed thereto.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

C. J.—Such was the case, and the blunder was of such importance as to require another Act of Parliament. See 2 Legal Guide, p. 365. Our Subscribers have the most early information of every change in the “actual practice of the Courts.”

A COUNTRY ATTORNEY AND SUBSCRIBER.—Either party, if not prepared to support or shew cause against a rule nisi, should move that it be enlarged to a future day, in the same or the next term; or to support or shew cause against it before a Judge at Chambers in the vacation. In a recent case, it was considered, that where a defendant resides such a distance from town that he cannot be served before the day for shewing cause, and the term expires on the day after that day, the rule may be revived in the next term. (Rowbottom v. Ralphs, 6 Dowl. 291.) If a rule be drawn up to shew cause in one term, it cannot be made absolute in the next term without enlarging it, though it may be revived. (Smith v. Collier, 3 Dowl. 100.) But it is not by any means of course that the Court should thus enlarge a rule; sufficient grounds must be stated to induce them to do so, (MS. E. 1814.) If the application be made by the party who obtained the rule, the Court usually grant it where it is in his own delay; but not where it would have the effect of detaining the opposite party in custody; nor in other cases without consent or some evident necessity: if moved for by the opposite party, the Court will frequently enlarge it upon terms; or, if the rule were not served in time to give the party an opportunity of shewing cause against it, he may demand that the rule be enlarged as a matter of right, (Fidd. 447, 448; see Anon. 1 Smith, 199.) Formerly, if a party wished to have a rule enlarged, it was usual to give notice to the counsel for the adverse party of the intended motion to the Court to have it enlarged; and the Court of Common Pleas would not, if the rule nisi had been served, have enlarged the rule unless such notice had been given. (R. M. 2 Geo. 2. C. P.; and see Anon. C. P. C. P. 67.) And now by general rule of the Courts, (H. T. 2 W. 4. s. 1. r. 97) “a rule may be enlarged, if the Court think fit, without notice.” It is not the practice to serve enlarged rules, because both parties are before the Court. (Anon. 1 Smith, 199.) If it be enlarged at a subsequent term, it is set down in the peremptory paper, and called on in its order, (see Vol. 1. Archbold's Prac. by Chitty, 96); but if it be enlarged or stand over to another day in the same term, either party may bring it on upon the day so appointed, by moving to discharge the rule and make it absolute, (2 Archbold's Practice by Chitty, 1190, ed. 7.)

AGISTERS of CATTLE fall within this class of Bailments; they are bound to ordinary diligence, and are responsible only for losses by ordinary negligence; they do not insure the safety of the cattle entrusted. cases upon this subject. There it was held by Croke, J. and Jones, J. that the defendant with whom the cows were depastured might not detain the cattle until the agistment money was paid, but that he was obliged to bring his action for the pasturage; those Judges observed it is not like to the case of an innkeeper or tailor; they may retain the horse or garment delivered to them until they be satisfied. But not where one receives horses, or kine, or other cattle to pasturage, paying for them a weekly sum, unless there be such an agreement between them. Lord ELLENBOROUGH, in Chase v. Westmore (c), took a very elaborate view of all the cases upon this doctrine of lien, including Chapman v. Allen; that was an action of trover for a quantity of wheat-meal, fine pollard, coarse pollard, and bran, which had been sent to the defendants (millers) to be ground, and which the millers detained for the grinding at a specific price. Lord ELLENBOROUGH, in delivering the judgment of the court, said (d),—This case stood over for our consideration upon the single question whether a workman having bestowed his labour upon a chattel in consideration of a price or reward fixed in amount by his agreement with the owner at the time of its delivery to him, can by law detain the chattel until the price be paid, or must seek his remedy by action, no time or mode of payment having been appointed by the agreement. We are all of opinion that if a right to detain exists in the general case that I have mentioned, the present defendants have a right to detain the goods in question for the money due to them for grinding all the wheat; because we consider the whole to have been done under one bargain, although the wheat was delivered in different parcels and at different times. The general question is of very great and extensive importance. Several authorities were referred to against the right to detain; but if these authorities are not supported by law and reason, the convenience of mankind certainly requires that our decision should not be governed by them; and we believe the practice of modern times has not proceeded upon any distinction between an agreement for a stipulated price and the implied contract to pay a reasonable price or sum, and that the right of detainer has been practically acknowledged in both cases alike. In the case of Wolf v. Summers, (e) Mr. J. LAWRENCE does not appear to have been aware of any such distinction. It is impossible, indeed, to find any solid reason for saying that if I contract with a miller to grind my wheat at 15s. a load, he shall be bound to deliver it to me when ground without receiving the price of his labour; but that if I merely deliver it to him to grind without fixing the price, he may detain it until I pay him, though probably he would demand, and the law would give him, the very same sum. Certainly, if the right of detainer, considered as a right at common law (and it must be so considered in this case), exists only in those cases where there is no manner of contract between the parties, except such as the law implies, this court cannot extend the rule, and authorities were quoted to establish this proposition; but upon consideration we are of opinion, that those authorities are contrary to reason, and to the principles of law, and ought not to govern our present decision. The earliest of them is to be found in 2 Ra. Ab. p. 92, which, however, is only a dictum of WILLIAMS, J.; and it does not appear on what occasion it was pronounced, or that it governed the decision of any case. It is in these words:—"If I put my clothes to a tailor to make, he may keep them until satisfaction for the making. But if I contract with a tailor that he shall have so much for making my apparel, he cannot keep them until satisfaction for the making." (f) This distinction appears to have been acknowledged by Lord Holt in a case of Collins v. Ongly, (g) as quoted by C. J. RYDER, in the case of Brenan v. Currint. (h) But the point was not in judgment before Lord Holt, and therefore the opinion then delivered by him, although entitled to great respect, has not the weight that would belong to a judicial decision of that very learned judge. The latter case of Brenan v. Currint is, as far as we can find, the only case wherein this distinction was made the foundation of the judgment of any court. It was there carried to the extremest limit; for the contract was only to pay a reasonable sum, which is more than the law would have implied if the parties had not expressed it. The opinion of POPHAM, C. J., in the case of the Hosteler, (i) has sometimes been cited as an authority for this distinction; but the only distinction plainly expressed on that occasion applies to the sale of a horse for his keep, and not to a detainer of the animal.

(h) Sayer, 224.

(i) 10 Mod. 66.

The Chief Justice there says, "That an innkeeper cannot sell a horse for his keep, where the price of it has been agreed upon, though he may do so if there has been no agreement for the price." But the power of sale in the case there put has been since denied. (k) The case in Yelverton was an action for the keep of the horse; and all that was said by the Chief Justice as to detention and sale was extrajudicial. It was in the very same year, term, and court, in which the opinion of WILLIAMS, J. is said to have been delivered; and if (as seems very probable) his opinion was delivered on this occasion, it was extrajudicial also. The case of Chapman v. Allen (l) has also been noted on this subject. That case, however, does not appear to have been decided on the ground supposed, but rather on the ground that a person taking in cattle to agist could not detain until the price be paid, or if he should in general do so, yet that in the particular case the defendant was guilty of a conversion as against the plaintiff, who was purchaser of the cattle by having delivered them over to a third person, on receiving from such third person the amount of his demand. In Cowell v. Simpson, (m) the LORD CHANCELLOR considers a lien as a right accompanying an implied contract; and in the passage of his judgment he is reported to have said, "If the possession commences under an implied contract, and afterwards a special contract is made for payment, in the case of the thing the one contract destroys the other;" but it is evident from other parts of the report, that the LORD CHANCELLOR there speaking of a special contract for a particular mode of payment. Such a contract is apparently inconsistent with a right to detain the possession, and consequently to defeat a claim to the exercise of such a right. And we agree that where the parties contract for a particular time or mode of payment, the workman has not a right to set up a claim to the possession inconsistent with the terms of his contract; and if WILLIAMS, J. is to be understood to speak of a contract for the time as well as the amount of payment, his opinion will not be contrary to our present judgment; and the authorities built upon it will have been founded on a mistake. And we are inclined to think that he must have intended to express himself to that effect, because the earliest authority that we have met with mentions an agreement for the time of payment, but makes no distinction between an implied contract and a contract for a determinate price. This authority is in the Year Book. (n) "Note also by Haydon that an hosteler may detain a horse if the master will not pay him for his eating. The same law is if a tailor make for me a gown, he may keep the gown until he is paid for his labour. And the same law is, if I buy of you a horse for twenty shillings, you may keep the horse until I pay you the twenty shillings; but if I am to pay you at Michaelmas next ensuing, here you shall not keep the horse until you are paid." In this passage the law, as applied to the cases of the hosteler, the tailor, and the vendor, is said to be the same; and in the latter the sum is supposed to be fixed. The distinction drawn is where a future time of payment is fixed. If so material a distinction as that which depends upon fixing the amount of the price had been supposed to exist at that time, we think it would have been noticed in this place, and not being noticed we think it was not then supposed to exist. So in the case of Comper v. Andrews, (o) LORD HOBART, speaking of the word "pro," "for," says, that this word "works by condition precedent in all personal contracts. As if I sell you my horse for ten pounds you shall not take my horse except you pay me ten pounds; 18 Ed. 4, 5., and 14 E. 5

22., except I do expressly give you day; and yet in this case you may let your horse go, and have an action of debt for your money; and so may the tailor retain the garment till he be paid for the making by a condition in law." The reason in the case of sale is given in the 14th Hen. 8. 20. a; "The cause is for that each has not the same advantage the one against the other, for the one will have the thing in possession—the other but an action, which is not reason, nor the same advantage." Considering the operation of the word "for," as noticed by LORD HOBART, whose opinion is confirmed by the cases he refers to, and by others also, no reason can be assigned for saying that it shall not have the same effect in a contract to grind a load of wheat for fifteen shillings, as in a contract to sell a load of wheat of £15. The former, indeed, is in substance, a sale of a certain portion of the time and labour of the miller and of the use of his machinery, and as it is clear that the miller could not maintain an action upon the contract without averring that he had ground and was ready to deliver the wheat, if the other party can by law recover the wheat without averring that he had paid or tendered the price of the grinding, he will have an advantage above the miller, for he will have his goods and the miller will have only an action. If the distinction, which has been contended for on the part of the plaintiff, should be allowed, what must be said in those cases, where a workman is not only to bestow a portion of his labour on a chattel delivered to him, but also to apply to it some materials or goods of his own, for a fixed price? As in the case of a picture frame sent to be gilded or varnished, and even in the old case of cloth sent to a tailor to be made into a garment, is the chattel to be retained by the workman, on the ground of his having applied to it his paint or varnish, or thread, or other materials, or must he deliver these to his employer without payment, because he has bestowed his own personal labour in addition to them? Upon the whole, we think this supposed distinction is contrary to reason, and to that principle in the law which requires the payment of the price and the delivery of the chattel to be concurrent acts, where no day of payment is given, and therefore we think the case of Brenan v. Currint, and the dicta on which it appears to have been founded, are not law, judgment was given for the defendants.

PROBLEM XX. VOL. IV.

REPLEVIN.

For what does it lie? What are the different sorts?—By and against whom does it lie?

FIXTURES.

SIR,—I beg to offer for your consideration an answer to the concluding part of this Problem—"What is the effect of Bankruptcy upon the Tenant Right."

By the Bankrupt Acts, 6 Geo. 4, c. 16, s. 63 and 1 & 2 Wm. 4, c. 56, s. 25, when a person shall have been adjudged a bankrupt, all his present and future personal estate, (including course leases and terms for years) and all properties acquired previous to his obtaining a certificate, vests in the assignees by their appointment; but fixtures while attached to the freehold do not pass to the assignees of a tenant and a steam engine erected for the purpose of working a colliery, to be used by the tenant during his term, but to be held as the property of the landlord, subject to such use will not pass to the assignees, for it does not come within the description of "goods and chattels," in sec. 25 (infra), nor had the bankrupt the actual or apparent ownership—and where by a lease, recited that lessee had purchased fixtures on condition of their being repurchased, the lessor covenanted to repurchase, and the lessee on becoming bankrupt, and the assignees declining the lease (which was delivered up) required the repurchase, it was held that as by Stat. 6 Geo. 4, c. 16, s. 75, the bankrupt on delivering up the lease, was discharged from all the covenants on his part, the performance of the covenant to repurchase could not be enforced against the lessor (see Wood, 183, 187, last ed.).

This I had supposed would have sufficiently answered this part of the problem, but as it appears that the subject of fixtures, as regards their passing to the assignees of a bankrupt tenant, has from the unsettled state of the law become of some importance, I shall proceed to work up some other cases on the subject, in pursuance of your notice appended to King's case, p. 206.

The question I shall assume principally arises in the construction of words "goods and chattels" in the 72nd sec. of the bankrupt act of Geo. 4, which enacts, that if any bankrupt at the time he becomes bankrupt shall, by the consent and permission of the true owner thereof, have in his possession, order, or disposition, any goods or chattels, whereof he was reputed owner, or whereof he had taken upon him the sale, alteration, or disposition as owner, the commissioners shall have the power to sell and dispose of the same for the benefit of the creditors under the commission.

As the judges of the court wherein the question was argued, it appears cannot unfortunately agree upon the construction of those words as contained in this section, it cannot be supposed that I shall attempt to lay down any rules on the subject; but for the information of myself and such of your readers as feel an interest in the subject, I have responded to your call as far as my materials within my reach will afford, and have "worked up" the following cases in the hope that the time I have bestowed upon it may not be thrown uselessly away.

Without any reference at all to whom the property in the fixtures really belonged, I have arranged the cases I allude to under four distinct heads, and shall begin—

1. With those cases decided under the present and former bankrupt laws, wherein fixtures do pass to the assignees.

Under this head I shall commence with the case of Bryson v. Wylie, (1 B. & P. 83, n.) in which A. a dyer, purchased a plant of B., but as he was unable to pay the purchase money, he sold it to B. who never took actual possession, but demised it to him for three years, during which time A. became bankrupt, and the assignees having seized the plant in his possession under the statute of James, which I shall more particularly mention hereafter, it was held a good defence to an action brought against them by B.—the term "true owner with reference to the 72nd section" (ante), means the person having a legal right to the possession and power of disposing with the property (Exp. Dale, Buck, 365.). Therefore, where a trustee for infants sold the lease of a warehouse and the plant, and let the purchaser take possession before payment of the purchase-money, it was holden that the purchaser was in possession, with the consent of the true owner, within the meaning of this clause. (Id.) Where a creditor purchased under a bill of sale from the sheriff the machinery of his debtor, seized in execution at his suit, and marked it with the initials of his name, allowing the debtor to retain the possession of it until he committed an act of bankruptcy:—it was held that as the change of ownership was not notorious, the bankrupt must be deemed to have the reputed ownership of the machinery, and that it therefore passed to his assignees. (Lingard v. Messiter, 2 D. & R. 495.; 1 B. & C. 308.; and see Storer v. Hunter, 5 D. & R. 240.) Machinery erected for the purposes of trade, in a neighbourhood where machinery of such description is commonly removed, and capable of removal without injury to the freehold, was held to be personal estate; and where, from the mode of dealing between the mortgagor and mortgagee, it appeared the machinery was not intended to be included in the mortgage deed, it was held to have passed to the assignee of the mortgagor, (Frappier v. Harter, 2 C. & M. 153, 3 Tyrw. 603.)

2. Cases so decided in which such fixtures were held not to pass to the assignees.

The leading case under this head is that of Horn v. Baker, 9 East, 215, alluded to in King's case, (ante) in which it appears that A. B. & C., distillers, occupied as partners certain premises leased to A. and another, and used in common in the trade the stills, vats, and utensils necessary for carrying it on, the property of which stills, &c. afterwards appeared to be in A. On the dissolution of the partnership, which was a losing concern, it was agreed that C. and one J. should carry on the business on the premises, and by deed between the two last and A. it was covenanted and agreed that A. should withdraw from the business, and permit C. & J. to use and occupy the still-house and premises, paying the reserved rent, &c. and the several stills, vats, and utensils of trade, specified and numbered in a schedule annexed, in consideration of an annuity to be paid by C. and J. to A., and his wife and the survivor, with liberty for C. and J. on the decease of A. and his wife, to purchase the distill-house and premises for the remainder of A.'s term, and the stills, vats, &c. mentioned in the schedule, and C. and J. covenanted to keep the stills, vats, and utensils in repair, and deliver them up at the time if not purchased, with a proviso for re-entry, if the annuity were two months in arrear. Under this C. and J. took possession of the premises, with the stills, vats, and utensils, and carried on the business as before, and made payments of the annuity, which afterwards fell in arrear more than two months; but A.'s widow and executrix who survived him did not enter, but brought an action for the arrears, which was stopped by the bankruptcy of C. and J. who continued in possession of the stills, vats, and utensils on the premises. The court held that the stills which were fixed to the freehold did not pass to the assignees under the words "goods and chattels" in the statute, but that the vats, &c. which were not so fixed, did pass to the assignees, as being left by the true owner in the possession (as it appeared to the eye of the world) of the bankrupts as reputed owners. This case was decided under the 11th section of 21 Jac. 1, c. 19, the only alterations between which and the said 72nd section, appear to be that in the latter the words are "possession, order, or disposition," and "whereof he was reputed owner, or whereof he had taken upon him the sale, &c.;" and in the statute of James they were "possession, order, and disposition," and "whereof they shall be reputed owners, and take upon them the sale, &c."

A stocking frame let on hire to a working hosier in manufacturing districts, is not a chattel within his disposition, per Lawrence, J. 3 Saun. 490.

Where a lessee becomes bankrupt, and the assignees decline the lease, they cannot maintain an action against the lessor upon a covenant in the lease, to repurchase the fixtures at a valuation.

In the seventh edition of the work of Mr. Archbold on Bankruptcy, by Mr. Flather, it is laid down as a general rule, that to bring a case within the meaning of such 72nd section—"The property must consist of goods and chattels, therefore the possession of land or things fixed to the freehold are not within the meaning of the statute, and even tenants' fixtures, as stoves, grates, cisterns, &c. or steam-engines, machinery, and fixtures so attached to the premises of which the bankrupt is in possession, as to be legally affixed to the freehold, are not "goods and chattels" within the statute, and in support of this position, the following cases are there cited, (p. 188) Ryall v. Rolle, 1 Vesey, 348., 1 Atk. 165., 1 Wils. 260.; Horn v. Baker, (supra) Clarke v. Crownshaw, 9 Bing. 804.; (a) Coombe v. Beaumont, 2 N. and Man. 235., 5 B. and Ad. 72.; Boydell v. Michael, 1 C. M. and R. 177.; Exp. Wilson, 4 Dea. and C. 314.; Exp. Belcher, 4 D. & C. 751., 2 Mon. and A. 209.

Under this section it has also been decided that where the bankrupt was in possession of a factory steam engine and fixtures, under a contract for the purchase, and the day before he committed an act of bankruptcy, he requested the vendor to resell and pay himself, and the vendor accordingly retook possession, and the man then in charge for the bankrupt agreed to continue the charge of the property for the vendor: it was held that the steam engine and fixtures were not in the "order and disposition" of the bankrupt, so as to pass them to his assignees (Exp. Watkins, 1 Dea. 296.). So where a distillery with coppers, vats, stills, &c. was let on lease to traders who became bankrupt, it was held that the stills, &c. which were fixed to the freehold, did not pass to the assignees, (See Sinclair v. Stephenson, 10 Moore, 46, 2 Bz. 514). Also, where a colliery with all the machinery and implements for working was let for years, with a proviso for re-entry by the landlord on non-payment of rent, and a covenant on the part of the lessee, at the expiration or sooner determination of the demise, to deliver up the machinery and implements conformably to an inventory annexed to the lease, of which a valuation was to be made three months before the expiration of the demise, the landlord recovered judgment in ejectment in Trinity term, for a forfeiture in non-payment of rent, but did not execute the writ of possession until the 8th of November following, being the day before the tenant committed an act of bankruptcy; it was held that the landlord was entitled to take possession of the machinery and implements (some of which had been brought on the premises by the tenant during the term) though no previous valuation had been made; that the possession of the machinery and implements by the tenant was only qualified, and did not come within the meaning of the statute of James, so as to bar the landlord's right of entry on the 8th of November, and that tenants' use of the machinery and implements in the interval between the judgment in ejectment and the execution of the writ of possession, did not give him the "possession, order, or disposition" thereof, with the consent of the true owner, within the meaning of the statute, so as to pass the property to his assignees (Storer v. Hunter, 5 D. and R. 248, 3 B. and C. 368.); and trade fixtures mortgaged with the buildings, and so attached as to be part of the freehold, or if the bankrupt had been tenant, or had the property for the purposes of trade, or if the bankrupt had been tenant, and the property fixed were goods and chattels; but there is a custom to let such premises along with such premises, it will not be a case of replevin.

(a) In that case a lessee purchased fixed and moveable implements, &c. and agreed with his lessor upon certain notice, to deliver them up at the end or other determination of the term, at a valuation, and afterwards the lessee assigned them over to a creditor upon trust, in case of default in payment of the debt, to enter and sell, and pay the debt; and if the lessor required to repurchase under the agreement, then the debt to be paid out of the purchase money; default was made, the lessee became bankrupt, and the creditor after the bankruptcy entered; it was held that the moveables only were in the order and disposition of the bankrupt, and passed to his assignees.

ownership within the said 72nd section, (Exp. Wilson, 4 Dea. and C. 143., 2 Mon. and A. 51.) and the same of machinery affixed to the freehold of iron works, (Rufford v. Bishop, 3 Russ. 346.) and also of the steam engine of a cotton mill, mortgaged and left in possession of the bankrupt, although the material part of the engine is not affixed to the freehold, save by bolts and screws, and could be removed by the tenant (Hubbard v. Bugshaw, 4 Sim. 326.; Exp. Lloyd, 3 Dea. and C. 765., 1 Mon. and A. 494.). (To be continued.)

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LEGAL GUIDE.

SIR,—As a regular attendant in our Courts of law, and in the Criminal Court on the Circuit, I have often been struck with the mode of address adopted by judges to prisoners on their conviction. If it is the man's first offence the judge anxiously hopes, and sincerely trusts, that after he shall have served the term of his imprisonment he will endeavour to make amends to society for the crime he has committed by leading an honest and upright life. If it is the second time of his appearing at the bar, the judge tells him that, on the former occasion, leniency was extended to him but that he has abused it, and shewn himself to be incorrigible; and therefore (generally) he must be sent out of the country for fifteen years or for life, and this perhaps for merely stealing a duck. Now, Sir, this may appear all very well to the common observer, but to those who will reflect but for a moment, this idea presents itself—what was this man to do when he first came out of prison? How was he to obtain a livelihood or in what manner could he regain a character? The man had no alternative, he must either beg or steal; if he did the former he would be taken up as a vagrant, and upon its appearing that he had only lately been discharged from prison, he would meet with punishment for endeavouring to avoid crime. We see by every day's experience, that he must not sell an apple in the streets. But to the judge who thus off hand awards him the heavy penalty if he again steal, I would suggest this for his consideration: I would suppose a man to have been a butler and to have committed some petty theft, for which his Lordship condemns him to three months imprisonment, at the same time expressing the before-mentioned hope as to his future conduct. A most excellent character has been given to the prisoner.—His time has expired and he calls upon the judge and says, Your Lordship tried me for a small offence and you hoped I might be reclaimed. My Lord, I have expiated my offence, I am anxious to make reparation—you know I was a good character, I now ask your Lordship to employ me and I will shew you how grateful I can be. Will any man pretend to tell me that there is any judge who would employ him, and yet from what he heard in Court he must know more of the man than most people. What then is to become of him—if the person who was so desirous and so “sincerely trusted” that the prisoner might regain his character, will not employ him, where is he to look? But the same judge would tell him that there was abundance of employment to be had: But, says the man, tell me where—tell me how I am to obtain it? You must go from hence at all events (adds the Judge), I can have nothing to do with you. The man leaves, &c. Is this an overdrawn tale; and when judges are complimenting magistrates upon their exertions and talking of preventing crime, should they not put their heads together and endeavour to suggest some system by which an unfortunate criminal might regain a character, and be enabled to fulfil the anxious wish of the dispenser of the law. I know of no point to which the attention of those who are desirous of preventing crime, might be more beneficially directed than that of producing some plan, by which a discharged convict might purge himself of his former sin, and become a worthy member of society. As there are fifteen judges, and as during the long vacation they will have an opportunity of consulting many of the country Magistrates, whose services they deem so valuable, I sincerely trust, that this year will not pass away without something being done on this particular subject, and the judges will then, most likely, be able to discharge their duty to the country, by trying all the prisoners themselves, instead of recommending adjourned sessions, or calling to their aid practising barristers to get rid of the calendar.

I beg to remain, Sir, yours, &c.

Law Reports.

ROLLS' COURT.—June 7.

ROBINSON and others v. ADDISON and others.

LEGACIES—What are general, and what are specific Legacies.

This bill was filed by John Robinson, and John Tillotson Robinson, infants, by John Robinson, their father, and next friend, William Gibson and Jane, his wife, and their seven children, infants, by William Gibson, their father, and next friend, against James Addison, John Crick, Charles Shackelford Robinson, and Dorothy Jemima, his wife, Clara Maria Robinson, and Henry Robinson, praying for a declaration of the court upon the several bequests contained in the will of the late Rev. John Robinson, vicar of Althorn, Essex, of shares in the Leeds and Liverpool canal, to, or in trust for the plaintiffs. The bill stated, that the testator, The Rev. John Robinson, by his will, dated the 2nd October, 1819, after devising a freehold estate at Althorn, in Essex, to Joshua Robinson and James Addison, theirs heirs and assigns, to the use of his son John Robinson, for life, and after his death, upon trust to sell the estate, and apply the proceeds for the benefit of the children of his said son. And if only one child, then the testator devised the estate to such one child; and if no child should live to acquire a vested interest upon trust to sell the estate, and pay a moiety of the interest of the proceeds to be invested to his daughter, the plaintiff, Jane Gibson, for life, for her separate use, and to pay the other moiety to his daughter, the plaintiff, Dorothy Jemima Robinson, for life, for her separate use, and after the decease of either daughter upon trust for the benefit of her children. And in case either of the testator's daughters should die without having children, who should acquire a vested interest in the trust monies, then upon trust for the surviving daughter and her children. The testator also gave to the said Joshua Robinson and James Addison, their executors, administrators, and assigns, five and a-half shares in the Leeds and Liverpool Canal, upon trust, to permit and suffer his son, the plaintiff, John Robinson, and his assigns, to receive the yearly produce thereof for his and their own use, and after his decease upon the same trusts as were declared of the freehold estate at Althorn. And after devising a freehold house, situate in Old Bond Street, London, upon trust for his daughter, Jane Gibson, for life, for her separate use, and after her decease upon trust for her children, in manner therein mentioned, the testator gave and bequeathed five other shares in the Leeds and Liverpool Canal unto the said Joshua Robinson and James Addison, upon the same trusts, for the benefit of his daughter, Jane Gibson, and her children, as he had declared, of his freehold house in Bond Street; and after devising another freehold house in Dean Street, London, upon trust for his daughter, Dorothy Jemima Robinson, for life, for her separate use, and after her decease upon trust for her children in manner therein mentioned; and in case of her death without issue, then to his other daughter, Jane Gibson, and his son, John Robinson, and their respective families, in moieties. The testator gave and bequeathed five other shares in the Leeds and Liverpool Canal unto the said Joshua Robinson and James Addison, upon the same trusts, for the benefit of his said daughter, Dorothy Jemima Robinson, and her children, as he had declared of his freehold house in Dean Street, London. And as to all the rest and every part thereof unto the said John Robinson and James Addison, and the survivor of them, and the heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, of such survivor, for ever, upon trust, for the separate use and benefit of the said Dorothy Jemima Robinson, for her life, and of her issue after her decease; and, in default of issue, for the use and benefit of the said John Robinson and Jane Gibson during their respective lives, and of their respective issue after their several deceases, and appointed the said Joshua Robinson and James Addison executors of his will. At the date of this will the testator was possessed of fifteen and a half shares of £10 each, in the Leeds and Liverpool Canal, between that time and his death (which happened in October, 1824) he sold the whole of such shares, and was not at the time of his death possessed of any shares in the said canal. The bill alleged, that the several bequests of the shares in the Leeds and Liverpool Canal were in the nature of general legacies, and that the testator not being at the time of his death possessed of or entitled to any shares, the several legatees of such shares, upon the testator's death, were entitled to have so much of his personal estate as at the end of one year after his death would have been sufficient to purchase the said canal shares, according to the current market price thereof, invested upon the trust, and for the intents and purposes by the will declared, and to have the interest thereof accounted for and applied in the same manner as the dividends in respect of such shares would have been applicable under the trusts of the will. And prayed that it might be declared that the several bequests, contained in the will, of the said shares, were general and not specific legacies, and that the plaintiffs and the other persons entitled under such bequests were entitled to have so much money as at the end of one year, next after the decease of the testator, would have been sufficient for the purchase of fifteen and a half shares in the said Leeds and Liverpool Canal, according to the then current market price thereof, raised and paid out of the testator's personal estate; and to have such money, when raised, laid out and invested upon the trusts by the will declared concerning the same; and that it might also be declared that the plaintiffs, John Robinson and Jane Gibson, were entitled to receive and be paid interest after the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, from the end of one year after the death of the testator, on the amount which should be required to be invested to purchase the said legacy of five and a half shares in the said Leeds and Liverpool Canal, to the plaintiff, John Robinson, and his children; and the said interest to be shared by the plaintiff, Jane Gibson, and her children. The Canal Act then passed

Geo. 3, by which it was enacted, that the sum of £260,000. or such part thereof as should be raised by the several persons thereinbefore named, and by such other person or persons who should at any time within one year from the passing of that act become a subscriber or subscribers to the said navigation, should be divided and distinguished into 2,600 equal parts or shares, at a price not exceeding £100. per share; and that the said 2,600 shares should be, and they were thereby vested, in the several persons thereinbefore mentioned, and their several respective executors, administrators, and assigns, to their and every of their proper use and benefit, proportionably to the sum they and each of them should severally subscribe and pay thereunto; and that all and every the said shares should be deemed to be personal estate, and be transmissible as such. Much evidence was given, showing the difficulty of buying shares in the canal: the defendants showing that such shares were not generally in the market, and that there was no current market price for them; but that sales and purchases of them were more in the nature of private bargains, and the plaintiffs showing the very reverse, that such shares were constantly bought and sold, and that there was a current market price for them.

Mr. Kindersley, for the plaintiffs, contended that a gift of a certain sum of any particular stock is not of itself specific, though the testator died at the date of his will precisely the sum of stock bequeathed; that the inclination of the court is against specific legacies. (Innes v. Johnson, 4 Ves. J. 568.) The will did not describe the shares as actually belonging to the testator, the words were, "I give and bequeath unto Robinson and Addison, the trustees, five and a half shares in the Leeds and Liverpool Canal;" but there were no such words as "my shares," or "shares now in my name." He submitted that the bequest must be considered as a general and not a specific bequest, and therefore the legatees were entitled to have  $15\frac{1}{2}$  of the canal shares purchased for their benefit out of the proceeds of the testator's estate. The act declares that the shares shall be deemed to be personal estate, and transmissible as such. He cited Coleman v. Coleman, 2 Ves. J. 639; Bronsdon v. Winter, 10 Ves. 57 (which is not very accurately reported. See 4 Ves. J. 573, per Master of the Rolls).

Mr. Pemberton, for the defendants, the residuary legatees, contended, that looking at the language of the will, and the circumstances of the testator having  $15\frac{1}{2}$  canal shares when he made it, it was impossible to suppose that after he sold the shares he could have intended other shares to have been bought. That for all purposes except those of descent the shares were real estates, or in the nature of chattels real, and were therefore specific. Suppose a testator bequeathed a leasehold house in Berkeley Square, or elsewhere, and afterwards sold it, the legacy was specific and adeemed by the sale; that so here the canal shares were specific legacies, and adeemed by the testator's sale of them. To hold otherwise would be unjust, and defeat the testator's manifest intention, who could never have looked to have re-purchased those shares, which are now at a much greater price than he sold them for.

Mr. Cooper, for the defendants, the executors, said that, although the testator had died in 1824, it never had entered into the minds of the legatees to claim to have the legacies considered as general legacies, and canal shares bought out of the residue, until the year 1836, just before the bill was filed.

Lord LANGDALE said that he was of opinion, upon the cases that he was bound to hold, that the legacies were general and not specific. It had been often held that legacies of stock of the precise amount of what the testator was possessed did not make the legacies specific. There must be words referring to the stock as standing in the testator's name for the court to decree the legacy specific. It was true there might be difficulty in purchasing shares in this canal, but that must not deprive the legatees of the benefit of the bequest. There might be something in the Leeds and Liverpool Canal Act that might justify the argument that the shares, except for purposes of descent, were to be treated as real estate. If so, the devise of such shares, like the devise of all real estates, might be regarded as a specific devise. He would give judgment on some future day.

His Lordship now gave judgment, and after stating all the facts of the case said, the number of shares given corresponded with those he was possessed of at the time of making the will; but the will contained no words showing an intention to give the shares which he then had. The testator subsequently sold his shares in the canal, and died in 1824 not possessed of any. Various arguments had been used to show that the gifts were specific. It was also said that they were an estate in land, and that the parties became entitled to the shares as a real and specific legacy. There were times when the shares were not purchaseable for money. The testator may have meant those shares as gifts, but there was no ground on which he could act, and there was no evidence that the testator meant to give specific shares to each. The canal was common property, and the shares were divided among the members of the corporation, which was directed should be deemed to be personal and to be transmissible as such: and were not frequently sold, yet that was not the case in this instance.

to prevent their being sold; and as the testator did sell them, and left none at his death to answer the legacies of such shares, yet he left ample property from which the shares might be bought. He did not by his will designate the shares. He was, therefore, of opinion, that the bequests had no quality of specific legacies, but that they were general legacies.

REGINA v. D'OYLEY, Clerk.

CHURCHWARDENS—Where is the proper place to elect them—Who has the common right to preside at such elections—RIGHT RECTORS.

The following judgment of the Court, delivered by LORD DENMAN in this case, is of considerable importance, upon a question so agitated by party parish agitators, as that of rectors of parishes.

Their lordships thought the proper person to elect the churchwardens was a convenor within the precincts of the church, and a rector had a common right to preside for ecclesiastical purposes the head of a church, and as being the owner of the free church. Although the churchwardens were temporal officers, yet they were so far from interfering with ecclesiastical matters, that the rector had a right to interfere. The authorities confirmed that opinion, and the 5th of George IV. was decisive; that act did not confer a right on the rector by enactment, nor by custom, but it was a recognition of his right, assuming then that he had a right, what was to be considered what power was upon him, and whether he had the functions according to law. The act required notice to be given of a poll, but it did not say by whom that notice was to be given; they apprehended the rector was the proper person to give notice, as he was at the head of the parish, and that one of the churchwardens was to be elected, and candidates present must make the declaration or be sworn that they had fallen. The question then was, who was to do that? Certainly not the rector, but the person presiding at the election was to make that declaration. It was then demanded; the parishioners were to be asked whether a poll was to be taken, and if so, who was to be the person to grant it. In the absence of the rector the poll would be taken directly, but otherwise the

Upon that rule coming on for argument, the plaintiff contended that the defendant had no jurisdiction in this case, to issue the warrant for the seizure, and that the present form of action was, consequently, the proper one; and that the justices had power to levy a rate only in the instances where the whole of the township was in the county for which the rate was levied.

TINDAL, C. J. now delivered the judgment of the Court, and said—The Court was of opinion that the defendant had not adopted the proper course to direct the rate to be levied by the overseer of Cheadle Bulkeley, although that officer resided within the borough. The mayor had not, therefore, the authority to levy, as he had done, on the plaintiff. On the second ground of objection, that the action was in the form of trespass, and not case, the Court thought that the proper course had been adopted. The verdict was, consequently correct, and the rule must be discharged.—Rule discharged.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER—June 29.
Sittings at Nisi Prius.

MILBANK v. OLDREY.

APOTHECARIES—What Proof is necessary for an Apothecary to maintain an Action under the Statute 55 Geo. III. 194.

The plaintiff, an apothecary, brought the present action against the defendant, to recover the sum of £38. 14s. 10d., the amount of a bill for drugs supplied and money lent to the defendant.

The defendant paid 12s. 4d. into court, on the count in the declaration for money lent; and upon the count for goods sold pleaded that the plaintiff was not practising as an apothecary on or previous to the 1st August 1815, so as to entitle him to maintain the present action under the Statute 55 Geo. III. c. 194. s. 21 of which acts, that no apothecary shall be allowed to recover any charges claimed by him, in a court of law, unless he shall prove at the trial that he was practising prior to or on the 1st August, 1815, that he has obtained a certificate required by that act.

The plaintiff proved that in 1809 he was appointed assistant-surgeon to the Tipperary regiment of militia, and so continued till the 25th of July, 1815, during which time he was in the habit of attending to the general treatment of various detachments, as well as that on one occasion, in 1814, he attended the family of a lady as accoucheur and apothecary. No evidence was given that he continued to practise after the time he obtained his discharge in 1815 till 1818, when it was shown that he was again appointed to a situation that previously held by him. Under the circumstances the who was a half-pay officer and in indifferent health, was received into the plaintiff's house as a lodger and boarder, and so remained for space of six months, during all which time was suffering from "bronchites" and other ailments, for the relief of which he was treated by the plaintiff constantly. When this connexion between the parties ceased, the bill was sent in the amount of £38. 11s. 6d., but payment being refused, Dr. Johnson was called in by the defendant, for the purpose of arbitrating between them. On this gentleman's recommendation the plaintiff consented to take the sum of £30. his bill; but the defendant rejected these terms and hence this action became necessary.

Mr. Whately, for the defendant, submitted that the plaintiff ought to be nonsuited for want of sufficient evidence to bring the case within provisions of the act of George III., coupled with the case of "The Apothecaries' Company v. Roby," 5 B. and Ald. 949, under which it contended that the plaintiff ought to shew that he had been actually practising on, as well prior to the 1st of August 1815, (a) and urged that the plaintiff's appointment and practice as assistant-surgeon in the militia was not that species of proof contemplated by the act of Parliament; or if such practice was enough, then the evidence would go to shew that the plaintiff had ceased to practise on his discharge, on the 25th of July, in which case also he could not maintain this action.

PARKE, B. thought that the practice was sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to sue, but would not serve the point under the act, on the authority of the case cited, for the consideration of the court above, it being a question for the jury to say whether the plaintiff might not have meant to practise generally after his discharge as he had done before.

Mr. Whately, for the defendant, said the jury would take the bill into their hands, and, exercising their discretion, they would say by their verdict whether any one man could, as a matter of possibility—whether it came within the realm of physical possibility, that one man could, the course of six months, actually swallow boxes of pills, 137 leeches, and 124 mixtures, besides enduring the application of 2 blisters, 131 leeches? He could not but think of witty physicians who described such a course of treatment in the following language:—

"If patients and for me, I physician, what would I do?"—L. LESTER.

If they die, what's that to me?—L. LESTER.

PARKE, B. said that he was not under any circumstances, as apothecary, wise, the plaintiff would not be action for the value of the leeches. he might take upon himself to sell, yet were not included in the act enumerating the other articles, and for which, therefore, he might recover, whether he had practised before the act passed or not.

Verdict for the plaintiff—Damages 30*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.*

(a) This is the leading case upon the subject, and was an action for a penalty on the statute 55 G. 3. c. 104, for practising as an apothecary without having obtained the certificate required by that act. At the trial, the defendant put in evidence to shew that he had been practising as an apothecary in town, in June and some part of July, 1815, including the 12th of July in that year; but as the evidence, such as it was, did not extend to the first day of August, the defendant having before that day left town and became an assistant to an apothecary at Chatham, the judge was of opinion, that no person was exempt from this penalty who was not in practice as an apothecary on the 1st of August; the jury found their verdict for the plaintiffs. A rule to shew cause why there should not be a new trial was obtained, and upon shewing cause it was contended by the plaintiffs, first, that the direction was right in point of law, and if not so, then secondly, that there was no evidence that the defendant had, at any time, practised as an apothecary within the meaning of this statute. The Court was all of opinion, that the direction was right in point of law. The statute was passed on the 12th of July, 1815, but it may be said generally to take its effect from the 1st of August following.

LORD TENTERDEN in giving the judgment of the Court, said (b), the great object of the statute, as appears by the preamble to the 7th section, was to prevent danger to the health and lives of the King's subjects by ignorant and incompetent practitioners. For this purpose provisions were made regarding two classes of persons, viz. persons practising as apothecaries and persons acting as assistants to apothecaries. It would be would be found engaged in each of those branches at the time, (whatever that should be) at which the penalties imposed by the act might be made to take effect, and it was reasonable that some, at least, of such persons should be exempted from its enactment; and we are to learn from the language of the statute, what is the precise time at which a person must have been so engaged in order to be thus exempted.

There are five sections in which the time is mentioned, viz. the 14th, 17th, 20th, 21st, and 29th. The 14th regards apothecaries and is a prohibitory clause, and it runs thus, "from and after the 1st of August it shall not be lawful for any person or persons (except persons already in practice as such) to practise as an apothecary, unless," &c. Now, the word "already," as here used, is of doubtful import, it may either relate to the 1st of August, or to the passing of the act. The 17th section relates to assistants, and is the prohibitory clause as to them, and it is thus—"from and after the 1st of August it shall not be lawful for any person or persons (except the persons then acting as assistants) and except those who have served an apprenticeship to act as an assistant." In this clause there is no ambiguity, the word "then" plainly and obviously refers to the 1st of August.

The 20th section is the penal clause; it embraces both the classes, viz. apothecaries and assistants, with a difference, however, as to the amount of the penalty; and it is thus—"if any person (except such as are then actually practising as such) shall after the first of August, act or practise as an apothecary without, &c. he shall forfeit £20. And if any person, except such as are then acting as such, and except those who have served an apprenticeship, shall after the first day of August, act as an assistant, he shall forfeit £5."

the first of August. And this seems to indicate that the word already, as used in the 14th section, is there used to denote the same day, unless it was intended that no apothecary should be exempt from the penalty, who was not actually in practice both on the 12th of July, and the 1st of August.

The 21st and 29th sections speak of apothecaries only, and do not mention assistants or apothecaries.

The 21st section relates to the recovery of charges, and it is thus: "No apothecary shall be allowed to recover any charges claimed by him in a court of law, unless he shall prove at the trial that he was in practice prior to or on the 1st of August, or that he has obtained a certificate," &c. Now, it was well observed by Mr. Campbell, that this clause relates only to the proof to be given at the trial, and the legislature might not think it expedient to require proof of the precise day, which might lead to questions as to actual employment and practice on that day, but might reasonably conclude, that he who could prove himself to be in practice before the 1st of August, and was in practice, and claimed charges for practice after that day, was really in practice on that day. We, therefore, do not see any thing in this section that may reasonably control the plain language of the 20th section; and it is not necessary to say, whether the word or ought in this 21st section to be read as and, which has been the construction put on that word in some other statutes, and which may perhaps be its proper construction in this place. The only remaining section to be noticed is the 29th, the general saving clause. It enacts that the act shall not lessen, prejudice, or defeat the rights, authorities, privileges, and immunities, vested in and exercised, and enjoyed by either of the two universities of Oxford and Cambridge, the Royal College of Physicians, the Royal College of Surgeons, or the said Society of Apothecaries, except such as have been altered, varied, or amended by the act, or of any person or persons practising as an apothecary previously to the 1st of August, but the said universities, colleges, and persons shall have, &c. all such rights, &c. save and except as aforesaid, in as beneficial a manner as they might have done if the act had not been passed.

Now, if the words previously to the 1st of August are to be taken in their large and unqualified sense, this saving clause will be quite irreconcilable with the 14th section, whether the word "already" there used, be referred to the day of the passing of the act, or to the 1st of August; and also with the 20th section, which plainly mentions the 1st of August, and the inquiry in any proceeding on the statute may always be, not whether the party was in practice on the 12th of July, or on the 1st of August, but whether he had been in practice at any remote period of his life. It is impossible to suppose that this was intended, and it seems to us that the only mode of reconciling all the clauses, and carrying the plain object of the law into effect, is to consider those apothecaries only to be exempt from its provisions, who were in practice on the day on which the act took effect, that is the 1st of August. This construction is not inconsistent with the words of this clause, for the clause contains only a saving of the rights of those persons who were in practice before the 1st of August, except as altered or varied by the act, and that alteration is to be found in the 20th section, which imposes the penalties on persons not in practice on the 1st of August. It is not necessary, as I have before observed, to say in this case whether a person, claiming the exemption, must have been in practice both before and on the 1st of August. If the meaning of this saving clause be doubtful, then according to all sound rules of construction, the plain sense of the penal clause must prevail. Attending to all the parts of this saving clause, it appears to have been introduced ex majori cautela, and not intended to control any previous enactment; we think the language of it too doubtful, to have the effect of controlling the plain words of the penal clause, and we are consequently of opinion, that the direction at the trial was right, and that the rule for a new trial must be discharged.

INSOLVENT DEBTORS' COURT—Sept. 8.

SITTINGS.

The Court will meet again on Tuesday next to hear applications for bail, and then adjourn until the 22nd instant, the time appointed for the hearing of cases.

Allowance to Prisoners under Sec. 118 of the Insolvent Act.

Four applications were made by prisoners in Whitecross-street Prison, for an allowance under the 118th section of the late act, out of the fund in court, arising from the interest on unclaimed money, and in each case a sum was ordered, thereby enabling the poor prisoners to file their proceedings and appear for hearing. It is understood that about £300. a-year arises from the fund in question, and a great number of persons have been assisted who would otherwise have had to remain in confinement. It is required by the court that in all cases the gaolers should give certificates, that the parties applying are in distressed circumstances, and cannot otherwise obtain their liberation but by an allowance of the money vested in the discretion of the commissioners under the 118th section.

3 & 4 VICT. Cap. 96.

18. And be it enacted, that it shall be lawful for the Postmaster-General at any time hereafter, with the consent of the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, by writing, under his hand, to declare that letters enclosed in stamped covers, or having a stamp or stamps affixed thereto, (such stamps being provided under or in pursuance of the said recited act or of this act, and being equal in value or amount to the rates of postage to which such letters would be liable under this act if sent by the post pre-paid,) may be sent, conveyed, and delivered otherwise than by the post, under and subject nevertheless to all such regulations and restrictions as the Postmaster-General, with such consent as aforesaid, may think fit, which declaration shall be inserted in the London Gazette before coming into operation; and from thenceforth, so long as the said declaration shall continue in force (but no longer), any such stamped letters may be sent, conveyed, and delivered otherwise than by the post accordingly: Provided always, that it shall be lawful for the Postmaster-General, with such consent as aforesaid, at any time, by writing, under his hand, inserted in the London Gazette, to rescind and annul any such declaration and the authority thereby given, or to alter and vary any of the regulations and restrictions therein contained, and to make and establish any new or other regulations and restrictions respecting the sending, conveying, or delivering of such stamped letters otherwise than by the post, as the Postmaster-General, with such consent as aforesaid, shall deem expedient: Provided also, that nothing herein contained shall authorize or be construed to authorize any person to make a collection of stamped letters for the purpose of being sent or conveyed otherwise than by the post.

19. And be it enacted, that the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes shall from time to time provide proper and sufficient dies or other implements for expressing and denoting rates or duties of one penny and two-pence, or rates or duties of any other value or amount as may be directed by the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, for the purposes herein mentioned; and it shall be lawful for the said Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes to use for the like purposes any dies, plates, or implements which have been provided, made, or used under or in pursuance of the said recited act of the last session of Parliament; and all stamps and impressions which have been or shall be made or expressed by or from any such last-mentioned dies, plates, or other implements shall be valid and available for the purposes of this act.

20. And be it enacted, that the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes shall cause a separate account to be kept of the stamp duties arising under this act; and it shall be lawful for the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, and they are hereby empowered, from time to time to direct the said Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes to authorize their Receiver-general to pay over such sum and sums of money arising from the said stamp duties as the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury shall think proper to the account of the Receiver-general of her Majesty's Post-office at the Bank of England; and all such sums of money which shall be so paid over shall be held by the said last-mentioned Receiver-general subject to all such and yearly sums now charged by law or by ble out of the Post office revenue, and all other charges, outgoings, and disbursements to which the Post-office revenue is at present liable.

21. And be it enacted, that the rates or duties which shall be expressed or denoted by any such stamps as aforesaid shall be denominated and deemed to be stamp duties, and shall be under the care or management of the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes for the time being; and all the powers, provisions, clauses, regulations, directions, fines, forfeitures, pains, and penalties contained in or imposed by the several acts now in force relating to stamp duties shall (so far as the same may be applicable, and may be consistent with the provisions of this act), in all cases not hereby expressly provided for, be of full force and effect with respect to the stamps to be provided under or by virtue of this present act, and the paper on which the same shall be impressed, or to which the same shall be affixed, and shall be observed, applied, enforced, and put in execution for the raising, levying, collecting, and securing of the rates or duties denoted hereby, and for preventing, detecting, and punishing all frauds, forgeries, and other offences relating thereto, as fully and effectually, to all intents and purposes, as if such powers, provisions, clauses, regulations, and directions, fines, forfeitures, pains, and penalties, had been herein repeated and specially enacted with reference to the said last-mentioned stamps and rates or duties respectively: Provided always, that the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes shall not make or allow any allowance or discount on the payment to them of any of the said duties arising under this act, or on the purchase from them of stamps denoting the said duties, unless they shall be directed to do so by the Lords of the Treasury.

22. And be it enacted, that if any person shall forge or counterfeit, or cause or procure to be forged or counterfeited, any die, plate, or other instrument, or any part of any die, plate, or other instrument, which hath been or shall or may be provided, made, or used by or under the directions of the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes, or by or under the direction of any other person or persons legally authorized in that behalf, for the purpose of expressing or denoting any of the rates or duties which are or shall be directed to be charged under or by virtue of the authority contained in the said recited Act of the last Session of Parliament, or under or by virtue of this Act; or if any person shall forge, counterfeit, or imitate, or cause or procure to be forged, counterfeited, or imitated, the stamp, mark, or impression, or any part of the stamp, mark, or impression, of any such die, plate, or other instrument which hath been or shall or may be provided, made, or used as aforesaid, upon any paper or other substance or material whatever;

or if any person shall knowingly and without lawful excuse (the proof whereof shall lie on the person accused) have in his possession any false, forged, or counterfeit die, plate, or other instrument, or part of any such die, plate, or other instrument resembling or intended to resemble either wholly or in part any die, plate, or other instrument which hath been or shall or may be so provided, made, or used as aforesaid; or if any person shall stamp or mark, or cause or procure to be stamped or marked, any paper, or other substance or material whatsoever, with any such false, forged, or counterfeit die, plate, or other instrument, or part of any such die, plate, or other instrument as aforesaid; or if any person shall use, utter, sell, or expose to sale, or shall cause or procure to be used, uttered, sold, or exposed to sale, or shall knowingly and without lawful excuse (the proof whereof shall lie on the person accused) have in his possession any paper, or other substance or material, having thereon the impression or any part of the impression of any such false, forged, or counterfeit die, plate, or other instrument, or part of any such die, plate, or other instrument as aforesaid, or having thereon any false, forged, or counterfeit stamp or impression, resembling or representing, either wholly or in part, or intended or liable to pass or be mistaken for the stamp, mark, or impression of any such die, plate, or other instrument, which hath been or shall or may be so provided, made, or used as aforesaid, knowing such false, forged, or counterfeit stamp, mark, or impression to be false, forged, or counterfeit; or if any person shall, with intent to defraud her Majesty, her heirs or successors, privately or fraudulently use, or cause or procure to be privately or fraudulently used, any die, plate, or other instrument so provided, made, or used, or hereafter to be provided, made, or used as aforesaid, or shall with such intent privately or fraudulently stamp or mark, or cause or procure to be stamped or marked, any paper or other substance or material whatsoever with any such die, plate, or other instrument as last aforesaid; or if any person shall knowingly and without lawful excuse (the proof whereof shall lie on the person accused) have in his possession any paper or other substance or material so privately or fraudulently stamped or marked as aforesaid; then and in every such case every person so offending, and every person knowingly and wilfully aiding, abetting, or assisting any person in committing any such offence, and being thereof lawfully convicted, shall be adjudged guilty of felony, and shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be transported beyond the seas for life, or for any term not less than seven years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding four years nor less than two years, as the Court shall award.

23. And be it enacted, that if any person shall fraudulently get off or remove, or cause or procure to be gotten off or removed, from any letter or cover, or any paper or other substance or material, the stamp or impression of any die, plate, or other instrument so provided, made, or used, or hereafter to be provided, made, or used as aforesaid, with intent to use, join, fix, or place such stamp or impression for, with, or upon any other letter, cover, paper, or other substance or material; or if any person shall fraudulently use, join, fix, or place for, with, or upon any letter or cover, or any paper or other substance or material, any such stamp or impression as aforesaid which shall have been gotten off or removed from any other letter, cover, paper, or other substance or material; or if any person shall fraudulently erase, cut, scrape, discharge, or get out of or from, or shall cause or procure to be so erased, cut, scraped, discharged, or gotten out of or from any letter or cover, or any paper, or other substance or material, any name, date, or other matter or thing thereon written, printed, or expressed with intent to use any stamp or mark then impressed or being upon such letter or cover, paper, or other substance or material, or that the same may be used for the purpose of defrauding her Majesty, her heirs or successors, of any of the rates or duties aforesaid; or if any person shall make, do, or practise or be concerned in any other fraudulent act, contrivance, or device whatever, not specially provided for by this or some other Act of Parliament, with intent or design to defraud her Majesty, her heirs or successors, of any of the rates or duties aforesaid; every person so offending in any of the several cases in this clause mentioned shall forfeit and pay to her Majesty, or her heirs and successors, the sum of twenty pounds, to be recovered with full costs of suit and all expences attending the same.

24. And whereas under the laws in force it is provided that no licence shall be granted to any person to deal in or to retail stamps in any town or place in Ireland (except within the district of the Dublin metropolis) where a distributor of stamps shall have been appointed by the Commissioners of Stamps, and shall reside and act as such distributor, and it is expedient to alter such restriction so far as the same relates to persons who may be licensed solely for the purpose of dealing in or retailing stamps denoting the duties on the postage of letters; be it therefore enacted, that it shall be lawful for the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes to grant licence to any person or persons to deal in and to retail stamps denoting the stamp duties on the postage of letters in any town or place in Ireland, whether a distributor of stamps shall have been appointed in such town or place, and shall reside and act as such distributor therein, or not, any thing in any Act or Acts contained to the contrary notwithstanding.

25. And be it enacted, that no licence which shall be granted by the said Commissioners to deal in and retail stamps of the description aforesaid only, nor any bond to be taken on the granting of any such last-mentioned licence, shall be subject or liable to any stamp duty.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS.

We have complaints of the irregular delivery of this paper from some of our country friends. We will only say that it ought to be delivered with the London Saturday delivery of letters, and that we take every pains, and spare no expence, to ensure such delivery. We beg, therefore, that when any such neglect occurs, "THE EDITOR" may be informed of it by letter.

We have to regret also that our Reporter, last week, occasioned the case of *Percival v. ### ON THE ENGLISH LAW OF BAILMENTS.

LOCATIO CUSTODIÆ.

AGISTERS OF CATTLE.

THE case we last quoted opened a new and more liberal light upon the doctrine of lien. It was argued in Scarfe v. Morrison, (a) that the decision in Chapman v. Allen (b) might, perhaps, be supported on the ground that a lien on the milch kine sent to agist would have been inconsistent with the object of the bailment, there being certainly no other authority to shew that there can be no lien for agistment. The question had considerable discussion in the recent case of Jackson v. Cummins, (c) which was an action of TRESPASS for breaking and entering an out-house and premises belonging to the plaintiff, and seizing and driving away ten cows the property of the plaintiff, and converting and disposing of the same to the defendant's own use.

The defendant pleaded first not guilty; secondly, as to taking two of the cows, that the said cows for eight months had been depastured, agisted and fed by the defendant for the plaintiff in and upon certain lands of the defendant, at the request of the plaintiff, for a certain reward and remuneration to be paid the defendant by the plaintiff, and there was due and owing to the defendant from the plaintiff £16. 5s. for and in respect of the said two cows, and that it was agreed between the plaintiff and defendant that the defendant should retain, have and take and keep the possession of the said two cows so long as the said sum of £16. 5s. should remain unpaid: that the said two cows then and at the time of the said agreement, were in the possession of the defendant, and so remained until the plaintiff fraudulently, unlawfully, and wrongfully, took them out of the same; that afterwards, and after the said agreement, and whilst the said two cows were in the possession of the said defendant, under the same, and whilst the said defendant had a lien upon the same by law and by the agreement aforesaid, and just before the said time when, &c. the plaintiff wrongfully, unlawfully, and surreptitiously, and contrary to the said agreement, with force and arms broke and entered the close of the defendant in which the said two cows were depasturing and agisting as aforesaid, and wrongfully, fraudulently, unjustly, and unlawfully took, carried, and drove away the same out of the said close of the said defendant without paying the said sum so agreed to and then due to the defendant. The plea concluded with a justification by the defendant.

The plaintiff took issue on the first plea, and to the second replied de injuria.

At the trial before PARKE, B., it was proved that the cows had been depastured on land belonging to the defendant. The jury found that there was no such agreement as stated in the plea; that the defendant should retain and keep possession of the cows until the amount due for the pasturage was paid, and thereupon found a verdict for the plaintiff; leave was reserved to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit, in case the Court should be of opinion that a lien existed at common law for the agistment of cattle. A rule was accordingly obtained.

The Court was of opinion, that the rule ought to be discharged. Mr. BARON PARKE, who delivered the judgment, said, the first question is, whether it was competent for the defendant under this plea, which speaks of a lien by agreement, to set up a claim for a lien at common law? If it were necessary to decide that question, I should say that I think it was competent for him to do. The plaintiff, it is true, might have demurred specially to the plea, for duplicity in setting up two distinct grounds of lien, viz. by force of an agreement, and by the general law; but as it is, the averment of the agreement for a lien may be rejected, and the claim of lien under the general law supported, should such really exist. I also think that after the recent decision in Owen v. Knight, as to the effect of lien in actions of trover, the defendant would have done better to have pleaded that the plaintiff was not possessed of these cows, which plea would have been supported by proof of the lien, giving to the defendant a special property in them at the time of the trespass. It is not, however, necessary to decide either of these points; because I think that by the general law no lien exists in the case of agistment. The general rule, as laid down by BEST, C.J. in Bevan v. Waters, (c) and by this Court in Scarfe v. Morgan, is, that by the general law, in the absence of any special agreement, whenever a party has expended labour and skill in the improvement of a chattel bailed to him, he has a lien upon it. Now the case of agistment does not fall within that principle, inasmuch as the agister does not contribute any additional value on the article, either by the exertion of any skill of his own, or indirectly by means of any instrument in his possession, as was the case with the stallion in Scarfe v. Morgan; he simply takes in the animal to feed it. In addition to which I have the express authority of Chapman v. Allen, that an agister has no lien; and though possibly that case may have been decided on the special ground that there had been an agreement between the parties, or a conversion of the animal had taken place, still it is also quite possible that might have proceeded on the more general principle that no lien can exist in the case of agistment; and it was so understood by this Court in Judson v. Etheridge. (f) The analogy also of the case of the livery stable keeper, who has no lien by law, furnishes an additional reason why none can exist here, for this is a case of an agistment of milch cows, and from the very nature of the subject matter, the owner is to have possession of them during the time of milking, which establishes that it was not intended that the agister was to have the entire possession of the thing bailed, and there is nothing to shew that the owner might not for that purpose have taken the animals out of the field wherein they were grazing, if he had thought proper so to do. This claim of lien is therefore inconsistent with the necessary enjoyment of the property by the owner. As to the case of the training groom, it is not necessary to say any thing, as it has not been formally decided; for in Jacobs v. Latour, (g) the point was left undetermined. It is true there is a Nisi prius decision of Burr, C. J. in Bevan v. Waters, that the trainer would have a lien on the ground of his having expended labour and skill in bringing the animal into condition to run at races; but it does not appear to have been present to the mind of the judge, or was the usage of training to that effect explained to him, that when horses are delivered for that purpose, the owner has always a right during the continuing of the process, to take the animal away for the purpose of running races for plates elsewhere. The right of lien therefore, must be subservient to this general right which overrides it; so that I doubt if that doctrine would apply here the animal delivered was a race horse, that case differs much from the ordinary use of training. I do not say that the case Bevan v. Waters was wrongly decided;

(d) 4 Blng. N. C. 54.

I only doubt if it extends to the case of a race horse, unless perhaps he was delivered to the groom to be trained for the purpose of running a specified race, when of course these observations of mine would not apply. But at all events I am clear that this agister has no lien, as his case certainly does not come within the general principles which have been established, in addition to which, such a claim would be inconsistent with the more general right exercisable by the owner of the cattle.

So that the doctrine at the present day, may be safely held to be, that no lien exists for agistment, except under a special agreement.

PROBLEM XXI. VOL. IV.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER.

What amounts to notice of claims and incumbrances—taking for granted that there is no difference between actual and constructive notice in its consequences?

ANSWER TO PROBLEM 6.—VOL. 4. (Continued from p. 311.)

3. Cases in which it has been decided whether the sheriff may seize fixtures in an execution on a writ of fieri facias.

I introduce a few cases and authorities under this head, because in the discussion of King's case (supra) it was stated in support of the assignees' right to the fixtures in that case, that "they might have been reached by an execution (I presume) against the tenant."

The sheriff under this writ cannot sell things fixed to the freehold, and which go to the heir and not to the executor (Winn v. Ingelby, 5 B. & Ald. 625; 1 D. & R. 247, S. C.; and see Steward v. Lombe, 4 Moore, 281; 1 B. & B. 506, S. C.; Scorall v. Boxall, 1 Y. & I. 398); such as furnaces, ovens, doors, windows, &c. (Com. Di. Execution); hearths, chimney-pieces, &c. (Poole's Case, 1 Salk, 368; Elwes v. Maw, 3 East, 38.) In the 7th edition of Archbold's Practice by Mr. Chitty, it is laid down that "where a mill with mill machinery was demised for a term, and the tenant without leave severed the machinery, it was held that the property in the machinery reverted to the landlord, and that it could not be taken under a fi. fa.; and so it would be in every case where the tenant severs from the freehold, fixtures which he cannot lawfully remove; but the sheriff may sell utensils fixed by the tenant for the purposes of his trade, such as vats, coppers, or the like; so he may sell fixtures, which may be removed by the tenant. Where the sheriff takes a lease and fixtures in execution, he must sell the fixtures separately if he cannot find a purchaser for the whole." In support of this doctrine the cases following are cited in the work alluded to:—Farrant v. Thompson, 5 B. & Ald. 826; see Steward v. Lombe, ub. sup.; Poole's case, and Elwes v. Maw, ub. sup.; Duck v. Braddyl, McClel. 217; Storer v. Hunter (sup.); per Parke, B. Minshull v. Lloyd, 2 M. & W. 459; Barnard v. Lee, 1 Stark, 43.

(f) 1 Crompt. & Mee. 473; 3 Tyrw. 954.

(g) 5 Bing. 130. 2 M. & P. 201.

4. Cases on the right to fixtures as decided between the executor and the heir-at-law.

I am induced to bring these cases before you, not for the purpose of lengthening my answer to this problem, but because it appears (p. 207) that upon the question of "order and disposition," a learned judge has always understood the rule on which the decision of the question before us turns, to be, with regard to the trade fixtures of a bankrupt, that the assignees are entitled to such of them as an executor can claim against the heir-at-law.

"Things that are affixed to the tenement, and are made parcel of the freehold, belong to the heir, and not to the executor." (Swinb. part 6, s. 7.) The general rule thus stated is exemplified in the following manner:—"With respect to wainscot, this being annexed to the house either by the lessor or the lessee, becomes parcel of the house; and there is no difference whether it be affixed with nails or by screws, or irons thrust through the posts or walls of the house, and any other such like thing affixed to the freehold or to the ground with mortar and stone; as tables dormant, mangers, leads, and such like; these also belong to the heir and not to the executor. (Id.) The like of millstones, anvils, doors, keys, window shutters, none of which being chattels, go to the heir."

In 21 Hen. 7, an executor taking away a furnace set up in the middle of a house, and not fixed to any wall, the heir brought an action of trespass against him, and it was adjudged that the furnace should go to the heir. But in Day and Austin, Lord Dyer's opinion was stated to be that where the furnace is not affixed to the wall, the lessee might within his term take it away, but otherwise if it was fixed to the wall (per Walmsley, J.—Law of Test. 342); but in the case of Harvey and Harvey, M. 14 Geo. 2, in trover, by the executor against the heir, it was held by Lee, C. J. that hangings, tapestry, and iron backs to chimnies, belonged to the executor, who recovered accordingly against the heir. (2 Str. 1141.) And the law seems now not to be held so strict as formerly; for if these things can be taken away without injury to the fabric of the house, it seems that the executor shall have them; as tables, although fastened to the floor, furnaces, if not made part of the wall, grates, iron ovens, jacks, clock cases, pumps, and such like, although fixed to the freehold by nails or otherwise. (Grymes v. Boweren, 6 Bing. 437; 4 Moo. & P. 143; 4 Burn's E. Law, 301.)

The important case of Lawton v. Lawton was decided in 1743, and in which the question for decision was "whether a fire engine (or steam-engine), set up for the benefit of a colliery by a tenant for life, shall be considered as personal estate, and go to the executor, or fixed to the freehold, and go to a remainder man."

For the plaintiff (who was a creditor of the tenant for life) evidence was read to prove that the fire-engine was worth to be sold £350., and that it is customary to remove fire-engines; and it was urged that the testator had died greatly in debt, and it would be hard when he had been laying out his creditors' money in erecting the engine that they should not have the benefit of it, but that the strict rule of law should take place. And it was compared to the case of a cyder mill, which is let very deep into the ground, and is certainly fixed to the freehold, and yet L. C. B. Comyns, at the assizes at Worcester, upon an action of trover, brought by an executor against the heir, was of opinion that it was personal estate, and directed the jury to find for the executor. And Lord Chancellor Hardwick, on the question of the fire-engine, whether it should be considered as personal estate, and consequently applied to the increase of assets for the payment of debts, said, "It appears in evidence that in its own nature it is a personal moveable chattel, taken either in part or in gross before it is put up. But then it is insisted that fixing it in order to make it work is properly an annexation to the freehold. In the old cases they go a great way upon the annexation to the freehold; and so long ago as Henry the Seventh's time the courts of law construed even a copper and furnaces to be part of the freehold. Since that time the general ground the courts have gone upon, of relaxing this strict construction of law is, that it is for the benefit of the public to encourage tenants for life to do what is advantageous to the estate during their term. What would have been held to be waste in Henry the Seventh's time, as removing wainscot fixed on by screws, and marble chimney-pieces, is now allowed to be done. Coppers, and all sorts of brewing vessels, cannot possibly be used without being as much fixed as fire-engines; and brewhouses, especially, pipes must be let through walls, and supported by walls, and so notwithstanding this, as they are laid for convenience of trade, landlords will not be allowed to retain them. The old rules of law have been relaxed chiefly between landlord and tenant, and not so frequently between executor and heir-at-law, or tenant for life and remainder-man. But even in these cases it admits the consideration of public expediency for determining the question." In conclusion, Lord Hardwicke said, "Upon the whole I think this fire-engine ought to be considered as part of the personal estate of Mr. Lawton, and go to the executor for increase of assets," and he decreed accordingly. (3 Atk. 13, 4, B. E. L. 301; et vide Western's Conv. vol. 4, p. 16, where the Law of Fixtures is very ably deduced, and clearly arranged.) A similar decision was made a few years afterwards by the same judge in a case closely resembling Lawton v. Lawton in its material circumstances (Lord Dudley v. Lord Warde, Ambl. 113; Western's Conv. vol. 4, p. 17); and these decisions, and the principles upon which they were decided, have been recognized and confirmed by subsequent judicial authorities. (Lord Mansfield in Lawton v. Salmon, 1 H. Bla. 260, n.; Lord Ellenborough in Elwes v. Maw, 3 East, 54; and Lord Lyndhurst in Trappes v. Harter, supra); and trade fixtures have, between the executor and the heir or remainder-man, been considered to belong to the former, either when they were erected exclusively for the purposes of trade or for a mixed purpose, "between enjoying the profits of the land and carrying on a species of trade" (3 Atk. 16); as in the case of the cider-mill, before-mentioned. But if the property be essential to the value and enjoyment of the real estate, it cannot be removed by the executor or administrator, but will descend to the heir as parcel of the inheritance. Thus in the said case of Lawton v. Salmon, the salt pans in salt works, erected by the testator were considered as merely the means of enjoying the inheritance of the land wherein the salt spring rose, and not as accessories to a trade, and therefore Lord Mansfield held that they must go to the heir, and not to the executor; and apparently for a similar reason it has been held that the executor is not entitled to remove things erected on the land for agricultural purposes, (Elwes v. Maw, sup.) nor greenhouses, conservatories, or the like, that are let into the ground or attached to a permanent building. (Buckland v. Butterfield, 2 Bro. & B. 54; 4 B. Moore, 440, vide 3 East, 56.)

The ancient rule, that whatever is annexed to the freehold is thereby made part of the freehold, and subject to all its incidents and qualities has thus been considerably relaxed in favour of the personal representatives of the deceased owner of the land. But this relaxation is not considered to be carried so far between the personal representative of tenant in fee and the heir, as between the personal representative of tenant for life or tenant in tail, and the remainder-man or reversioner, nor between these latter parties so far as between the parties whose relation to each other is the principal object of this problem, viz. tenant and landlord. (Vide 3 Atk. 16; 2 East, 91, 3 Id. 51.)

The right of the personal representative may also, it seems, be extended by the custom of the neighbourhood to articles which would not elsewhere be removeable fixtures; for instance, a granary built on pillars in Hampshire, is by custom a chattel, and belongs to the executor. (Viner's Ab. tit. Executors (U.), pl. 74.) It will also depend upon the manner in which the thing is fixed, whether it shall be considered to be so annexed to the soil as to become part of the inheritance, and transmissible together with it. Thus a barn set upon blocks or pattens, but not fixed in or to the ground (Culling v. Suffnall, Bull, N. P. 34); and a post windmill, constructed upon cross traces laid upon brick pillars, but not attached or affixed thereto (Rex v. Londonthorp, 6 T. R. 377), and other buildings erected in a similarly detached manner, have been held to continue mere chattels. (Rex v. Otley, 1 B. & Ad. 161; Wansborough v. Maton, 4 Ad. & El. 884; 6 Nev. & M. 367); and generally, in order to constitute such an annexation as shall raise a case of fixtures, it is not enough that the article has been laid upon the land and brought into contact with it, but it is necessary that the soil should have been displaced for the purpose of receiving the article, or that the chattel should be cemented, or otherwise fastened to some fabric previously attached to the ground. (Amos & F. on Fixt. 2.)

A tenant having a right of removing fixtures must exercise it during his term, otherwise he will be considered as having abandoned it in favour of the reversioner (Lyde v. Russell, 1 B. & Adol. 394); and therefore an executor or administrator of a tenant from year to year should take care to remove or dispose of the fixtures before the expiration of his notice to quit. (See Lovelass on Wills, Ed. 12, 62.) E. A.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LEGAL GUIDE.

CASE OF FROST THE CHARTIST,

THE JUSTICE OF HIS SENTENCE CONSIDERED.

Sir,—The leisure of the long vacation induces me to refer to this case, which, in my judgment, is the most important as regards the administration of our laws that has ever yet taken place. Every one knows that on the trial an objection was taken, that the copy of the indictment, the panel of the jury, and the list of witnesses had not been delivered at one and the same time. The point was reserved for the opinion of the fifteen judges; the trial proceeded, and the prisoner was found guilty of high treason, and the sentence of the law was pronounced upon him. The question was afterwards argued at very great length before all the judges, who almost immediately made known their decision; and that is the point which appears to me to strike at the root of every thing dear to us. The judicial opinion, far from being unanimous, was, I must say, pronounced with "indecent haste!" If a jury do not agree, they are locked up until they do, or at all events for many hours; and be it recollected that their opinion is asked upon matters of fact, depending very frequently upon contradictory testimony: but the opinion of the judges was required upon the law of the land, of which they were supposed to be conversant; but it turns out that judges are, like other men, liable to disagree. Did they, however, follow the course that would have been adopted with regard to a jury? Did they "lock themselves up in some convenient room without meat, drink, or fire, candle-light excepted;" and so endeavour to reconcile their different opinions? Did they shew to the world, that after what is termed "solemn argument," there was "solemn deliberation?" On the contrary, that opinion was promulgated almost instantaneously; and what was it? A majority of three had decided that the objection was valid, and therefore that the trial was a farce. Why then was the prisoner not set at liberty? Why, by some extraordinary chance, a majority of three had determined that the objection, if good, was not made in time; that it ought to have been before plea pleaded. If it had been made before the plea it would have gone for nothing, as the trial would have been postponed and fresh documents delivered. Does not this question then as to "time" become a mere quibble; and ought not the prisoner in common sense to have had the benefit of the decision of the majority of three, that the objection was a good objection? But how much it is to be regretted that there should have been such a difference of opinion. Surely judges are not so stubborn in their judgments that the arguments of each other have no weight with them. Upon general subjects we find them agree; and yet we must feel assured that there is some little compromise of opinion between them. But might not this have been a compromise in order to reduce the severity of the punishment, or, in other words, "to fritter away the law." For heaven's sake, if judges cannot agree, let us call in a little common sense to our aid, and we shall feel that if the objection was a good one the prisoner ought to have the full benefit of it, and not to be met by legal quibbles arising from inconsistency of opinion among those who, as the administrators of the law, ought to be masters of it. What are we to think of our laws, when those who deal them out to us cannot come to an unanimous opinion upon them? Why do not the judges themselves frame drafts of bills to be laid before Parliament upon strictly legal subjects? They would by these means be far better employed than by finding fault with almost every Act of Parliament which is brought before them—which it certainly is the common practice of one judge on the bench to do. Maintaining, as I have said, that justice has not been dealt out to the prisoner, I also contend that the want of unanimity in the judges has cast a blot on the judicial character that will not be easily removed.

I remain, Sir,

Your very obedient servant,

JUSTITIA.

ROLLS' COURT.—July 6.

GREENLAW v. KING.

ANNUITY.—Whether a person placed in a fiduciary situation is allowed to contract for his own benefit.—ANNUITY purchased by a party holding that character aside.

This suit was instituted to set aside an annuity granted by the Rev. Hugh Fraser, under an Act of Parliament for raising money for building a new Rectory house to, or in trust for the late Bishop of Rochester, the Bishop of the Diocese.

The bill stated that the Rev. Hugh Fraser was the Rector of the parish church of St. Mary, Woolwich, Kent, and the Bishop of Rochester was patron of the living. The Rectory house being in a very dilapidated state, it was thought advisable to obtain an Act of Parliament for sale of the present house, and to build another. Accordingly, by an Act of the 49 Geo. 3, intituled "An Act to enable the Rector of the said Parish, for the time being, to grant building leases of the glebe lands belonging to the Rectory, and to sell the present Rectory house and garden, and build a new Rectory house." The Rectory house and garden were vested in the Rev. Avery Hall and Alexander Fraser, upon trust for sale, and the money to arise thereby was to be invested in the purchase of Navy or Exchequer bills, and applied towards building a new Rectory house, garden, and offices; and it was provided that such new rectory house should be built to the satisfaction of the Bishop of Rochester for the time being, at a price not exceeding £2,000, within a limited time, and that in case the money arising from the sale of the rectory house and garden should fall short of, and not be sufficient to answer the purposes of the act, the rector for the time being was empowered to take and receive of and from any person or persons, to whom he should grant any lease or leases under the said act, any sum or sums of money, by way of fine as might be necessary, but so as such fine should not in the whole exceed the sum of £3,000. Another act was passed in the 52 Geo. 3. for enlarging the powers of the said act, which after reciting that the trustees had sold the rectory house and garden, and after defraying the expenses of the sale, and of the said act, invested the residue of the money arising therefrom in the purchase of exchequer bills; and also, with the consent of the Bishop of Rochester, had subsequently sold such exchequer bills, and applied the produce thereof towards defraying the expense of building a new rectory house, garden, and offices, and that the said Hugh Fraser, with the approbation of the Bishop of Rochester, had granted and contracted to grant building leases of part of the said glebe lands in favour of divers persons at reserved rents, amounting in the whole to a sum exceeding £100. per annum, and had taken premiums or fines amounting to about £1,500.; and that the building of the said rectory house had been proceeded in, and was then nearly completed; and that, towards carrying on the said works, the sum of £2,100. or thereabouts, had been expended; and that after the application of the produce of the exchequer bills, in which the residue of the money arising from the sale of the old rectory house and garden had been invested, and the amount of the said premiums or fines, there would be wanting the sum of £2,000. or thereabouts, to enable the said Hugh Fraser to carry the purposes of the said act into execution. It was enacted that it should be lawful for the rector for the time being by bond or bonds, grant or grants, deed or deeds, or by some other instrument valid in the law by him sealed and delivered in the presence of and to be attested by two or more credible witnesses, by and with the consent of the Bishop of Rochester for the time being, to borrow any such sum or sums of money not exceeding in the whole the sum of £2,000., as might be necessary towards defraying the expense of the act, and for finishing and completing the said rectory house, garden, and appurtenances, in the manner directed by the first act, by the sale of one or more annuity or annuities, upon one or more life or lives, and to secure the payment of such annuity or annuities by a grant or charge upon the ground rents reserved under the leases then granted, or which might be granted under and by virtue of the said act. And it was further enacted, that, if the amount of the ground rents should be found insufficient for the purpose of borrowing the said sum of £2,000., it should be lawful for the rector for the time being, to charge the said annuity or annuities upon the rents and profits of the said rectory. And it was further enacted, that the money to arise by sale of the said annuities, should upon the receipt thereof, (subject to the payment of the costs, charges, and expenses, preparatory to and attending the applying for and obtaining and passing the act) be invested in the purchase of Navy or Exchequer bills, in the joint names of the said George Avery Hatch, and Alexander Fraser, their executors, administrators, and assigns, and that such navy or exchequer bills should from time to time be sold, and the money thence arising be applied and disposed of towards defraying the expenses of finishing and completing the said new rectory house, garden, offices, and appurtenances. And that when and as soon as the said new rectory house, garden, and offices, should have been finished and completed to the satisfaction of the Bishop of Rochester, for the time being, a declaration in writing to that effect under the hand and seal of the Bishop, should be a sufficient release and discharge to the said George Avery Hatch and Alexander Fraser, for all the monies which might have been applied by them or by the said Hugh Fraser, under their authority, for and towards the expense of building, finishing, and completing the said new rectory house, garden, and offices, pursuant to an account thereof to be by them rendered and approved of, under the hand and seal of the Bishop of Rochester for the time being. And that in case there should be any balance remaining in the hands of the said trustees, after the purposes of the said act should have been carried into effect, it should be lawful for the Rector for the time being to lay out and expend the same, by and with the approbation of the Bishop of Rochester for the time being, towards the making of permanent improvements upon the rectory house, garden, and glebe lands of the said rectory. After this Act was obtained, the Rector advertised to grant an annuity for £2,000. through his surveyor Mr. Hogg, and required tenders to be made for such annuity, but no person could be procured to advance the money at less than £9. per cent, for two lives, which was offered by one Mr. Hill, and was accepted, but on applying to the Bishop for his consent, his Lordship thought £9. per cent. too high a rate of interest, and said that he thought he could procure one Mr. Broderip to purchase an annuity at £8½. per cent. This however was not done, and the Bishop offered to become himself the purchaser of the annuity at that rate, if lower terms could not be procured. Mr. Fraser and the trustees appointed by the act accepted this offer and abandoned that of Mr. Hill; but the Bishop was aware of the difficulty of naming himself in the annuity deed, as the grantee of the annuity, and he therefore proposed that it should be granted to his son, the defendant, Mr. Walker King, (then a minor) but it being objected that he was incapable of binding himself, it was agreed that the name of Mr. Venables should be inserted in the annuity deed, as a trustee for the Bishop, and thus the matter was settled by all the parties, and by an indenture dated the 19th January, 1813, and made between the Bishop of Rochester of the first part, the Rev. Hugh Fraser of the second part, the Rev. Avery Hatch and Alexander Fraser of the third part, and Thomas Venables of the fourth part. The Bishop, it was witnessed, pursuant to and by force and virtue, and in exercise and execution of the power and authority to him given or reserved by the act, did consent that the said Hugh Fraser should borrow the said sum of £2,000. from the said Thomas Venables, for the purposes of the said act, by the sale to him of an annuity of £170. for the lives of two sons of the Bishop, and the life of the survivor.

And it was further witnessed that, in consideration of £2,000. paid to the said Avery Hatch and Alexander Fraser by the said Thomas Venables, the said Hugh Fraser did give, grant, bargain, and sell and confirm unto the said Thomas Venables, his executors, administrators, and assigns, one annuity, or clear yearly rent or sum of £170, to be paid and payable for and during the lives of the said two sons of the Bishop, and the life of the survivor of them, and to be charged and chargeable upon and yearly issuing, and payable out of all and singular the rents reserved by the several building leases then already granted in pursuance of the said acts: and the said Hugh Fraser charged the said ground rents, and also the rents and profits of the said rectory of the parish and parish church of St. Mary's, Woolwich, with the payment of the same annuity. On the 20th January, 1813, Mr. Venables executed a Declaration of trust of the annuity in favour of the Bishop, and in the year 1820 assigned over the annuity to his son, the said Walker King. The Bishop died in 1827, and the annuity was paid by Mr. Hugh Fraser till the time of his death, which took place in 1837, when the present plaintiff, Mr. Greenlaw, was instituted to the living, and he finding that a great portion of the income arising from the Rectory was absorbed in paying this annuity, he refused to pay it, and filed the present bill against Walter King, the annuitant and the representatives of Mr. Venables, who had also died. The bill alleged that £2,000 was an inadequate price for the annuity, and submitted that under the circumstances aforesaid the plaintiff ought to be relieved from further paying it, and that the indenture of the 19th January, 1813, ought to be delivered up to be cancelled, and prayed that it might be declared that the grant of the annuity was fraudulent and void, and that it might be set aside; and that it might be declared that all sums which had been paid on account of the annuity ought to be considered as applied in or towards satisfaction and discharge, first of the interest and then of the principal of the said sum of £2,000, or of so much thereof as from time to time remained undischarged, and that an account might be taken for the purpose of ascertaining whether, according to the declaration aforesaid, any thing and what remained due in respect of the said sum of £2,000 and interest, and if upon the taking of such account, it should be found that by means of such several sums so paid in respect of the said annuity, the whole of the said principal sum of £2,000, together with interest for the same, had been satisfied and discharged, then that the plaintiff might be relieved from further paying the said annuity, and that the said defendants might be decreed to deliver up to the plaintiff the indenture of the 19th January, 1813, to be cancelled; but if, on the taking of such accounts, it should be found that any thing still remained due and owing in respect of the said principal sum of £2,000 and interest thereon, then on payment of what might be so found to be due, the plaintiff might be relieved from further paying the said annuity, and that the said defendants might be decreed to deliver up to the plaintiff the said indenture to be cancelled. It was admitted by the defendant King in his answer, that the payments made in respect of the annuity would together amount to more than £2,000 with interest from the time of granting of the annuity; but he insisted upon the length of time and acquiescence on the part of the predecessor of the plaintiff, as grounds to dismiss the plaintiff's bill, and submitted to any inquiry the Court should direct.

Mr. Pemberton, for the plaintiff, did not charge the Bishop with any fraud, and contended that the Bishop was totally precluded from purchasing the annuity consistently with the policy of the law and the principles and rules of the Court regarding Trustees, which character the Bishop filled in the present case in a pre-eminent degree, and cited Grover v. Hugell (a), where a person had entered into an agreement for the purchase of land, which was formerly part of the glebe of a Rectory, and had been before sold for the redemption of the land tax, and the Court held upon the general rule in equity, that a man cannot place himself in a situation in which his interest conflicts with his duty, that the purchaser was not bound to complete his purchase, it appearing upon the prior sale for the redemption of the land-tax the Rector was himself the actual purchaser, and made use of the name of his Curate in the conveyance.

Mr. Richards, for the defendants, relied upon length of time and the acquiescence of Mr. Fraser, as sufficient grounds to warrant the Court in dismissing the bill—he cited Champion v. Rigby (b), Howard v. Ducane (c), where Lord Eldon held that Trustees who had a power of sale or exchange with the approbation of the tenant for life, might sell to or exchange with the tenant for life himself; and in such a case the tenant for life stood in a relation to the property, and to the person in remainder very analogous to that of the late Rector in this case, and he insisted that though a trustee for sale cannot purchase from himself, yet it had not been determined that a trustee cannot purchase from his cestui que trust.

Lord LANGDALE said, it was manifest that the Bishop had a most important duty conferred upon him by the Acts of Parliament. He was not only to protect the right of patronage vested in the see and its interests, but also the Rectory and its interests, as well as the interests of all future Rectors. The Bishop, by the course he had adopted, had made himself an interested party, and though it was not done with a view to take any sinister advantage, yet when a person is placed in a fiduciary situation he was not allowed to contract for his own benefit. The impossibility of determining the advantage derived in each particular case had been the cause of the sale. In ex parte Bennet, (d) LORD ELDON explained the principle of the rule upon which purchases by trustees of the trust property are set aside, and he did so in that case because LORD ROSSLYN had said more than once, that to affect the sale the trustee must make an advantage, but that was not LORD ELDON's opinion. "The principle," his Lordship said, "is deeper; viz. that if a trustee can buy in an honest case, he may in a case having that appearance; but which from the infirmity of human testimony may be grossly otherwise;" and upon this principle I must decide this case. I am therefore of opinion that the transaction cannot stand; and as the principal and interest has been paid by the money received, the annuity must cease, and the deed must be given up to be cancelled. Time only began to run against the plaintiff from the period he became rector, and he has committed no wrong. Costs to be paid by the defendants.

BOSANQUET v. RAINSFORTH.

JOINT STOCK BANKING COMPANIES—PRACTICE—Construction of 7 Geo. 4. c. 46, ss. 12, 13, (a)—What is the proper course to be adopted for obtaining execution against Proprietors of Shares.

In this case a rule nisi had been obtained against certain individuals, calling upon them to shew cause why a suggestion should not be entered upon the roll for the purpose of making them chargeable as private and separate individuals, and why execution should not issue against them as proprietors of shares returned to the Commissioners of Stamps, upon a judgment obtained in an action against the registered officers of the Company.

Judgment had been obtained against the defendant as the registered public officer of the Leamington Joint Stock Bank.

LORD DENMAN this day gave the judgment of the Court, and observed, It was admitted that according to the Act of Parliament this personal liability could only be created by the interposition

(a) S. 12, "All and every judgment and judgments, decree or decrees, which shall at any time after the passing of this Act be had or recovered, or entered up as aforesaid in any action, suit, or proceedings in law or equity against any public officer of any such co-partnership, shall have the like effect and operation upon and against the property of any such co-partnership, and upon and against the property of every such member thereof as aforesaid, as if such judgment or judgments had been recovered or obtained against such co-partnership."

S. 13, "Execution upon any judgment in any action obtained against any public officer for the time being of any such corporation or co-partnership carrying on the business of banking under the provisions of this Act, whether as plaintiff or defendant, may be issued against any member or members for the time being of such corporation or co-partnership; that in case any such execution against any member or members for the time being of any such corporation or co-partnership, shall be ineffectual for obtaining payment and satisfaction of the amount of such judgment, it shall be lawful for the party or parties so having obtained judgment against such public officer for the time being to issue execution against any person or persons who was or were a member or members of such corporation or co-partnership at the time when the contract or contracts, or engagement or engagements in which such judgment may have been obtained, was or were entered into, or became a member at any time before such contracts or engagements were executed, or was a member at the time of the judgment obtained: Provided always, that no such execution as last mentioned shall be issued without leave first granted, on motion, in open court, by the court in which such judgment shall have been obtained, and when motion shall be made on notice to the person or persons sought to be charged, nor after the expiration of three years next after any such person or persons shall have ceased to be a member or members of such corporation or co-partnership."

of the Court; and the question was, whether such interposition ought to be effected in the manner proposed by the rule, or in the form of a scire facias. It was, in fact, a question in what manner new parties were to be placed upon the record, which, according to antecedent usage, must be by scire facias, the proceeding by suggestion being only appropriate to the introduction of collateral facts, as the change of name or death of parties. No party ought to be chargeable with any liability without full notice and opportunity of defending himself, and this could most effectually be done upon a scire facias. In Bartlett v. Pentland,<sup>(b)</sup> it was determined that if an Act of Parliament authorizes the making an officer of the Company a nominal defendant, and enables the plaintiff to take out execution against the individual partners as being the real defendants, it is necessary that he should in some way have the authority of the Court before he can have such execution. A scire facias is the usual course in such cases. A suggestion is applicable only to collateral facts affecting other parties than those upon the record, and that was not the point in Bartlett v. Pentland.—Rule discharged.

HAUGHTON v. BRINE and another.
STAMPS—AGREEMENT—PRACTICE—ENTRIES
in the Books of an Association.

The plaintiff, who had been secretary to the Brighton and Sussex Zoological Association, brought this action against the defendants, who were two of the directors, for £20, the alleged amount due to him for four weeks' salary at £5 a week. The defendants pleaded non assumpsit.

The books of the Association were produced, in which were found the following entry: "Resolved, that J. Haughton be secretary, at a salary of £5 per week," which was signed by the defendants. This was refused on the part of the defendants to be received as evidence, it being contended that it was an agreement, and could not be received without a stamp.

The plaintiff had a verdict for the amount claimed.

Mr. Mansell afterwards obtained a rule nisi for a new trial, on the grounds—1st, that the resolution of the Company, by which the plaintiff was appointed secretary, was not admissible in evidence from the want of an agreement stamp; and 2nd, that the jury ought to have found, upon the evidence, that the plaintiff was discharged before the period for which he claimed remuneration.

TINDAL, C. J., said that the only real question was, whether the resolution of the directors came within the operation of the Stamp Act. There is no evidence to show that the plaintiff was present when the resolution was made and signed, nor is he a party to it, and we are of opinion that the resolution of the Association did not come within the terms of the Stamp Act, and therefore had been properly received in evidence, although unstamped; and that the other question had been properly referred to the jury, with whose finding upon it there was no just ground for being dissatisfied.—Rule discharged.

JOINT AND SEVERAL PROMISSORY NOTE—EVIDENCE—COMPETENCY of one of the makers of a Promissory Note, who was a SURETY for the others, to be a WITNESS to prove the making of the Note by all the makers.

This was an action against the defendant Stephen Thomas, by the payee of the following note:

"Haverfordwest, May 9, 1835.

"Twelve months after date we jointly and severally promise to pay George Page or order £100, with lawful interest at £5 per cent per annum, value received. STEPHEN THOMAS,

J. A. ALLEN,
JOHN JENKINS."

"Witness—JAMES THOMAS."

At the trial the witness James Thomas denied his signature, and John Jenkins, one of the makers of the note, was called, who proved on the voir dire the signing of the note by all the makers, and that himself and J. A. Allen signed it as sureties for the defendant.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for £125, principal and interest, leave being reserved to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit.

Mr. Evans accordingly obtained a rule nisi.

Mr. Wilson now showed cause against the rule, and contended that the evidence of a surety on a promissory note had been improperly received to prove the handwriting of the defendant, who was sued as the principal on the same note. He cited York v. Blott,<sup>(a)</sup> where the plaintiff called T. S., one of the makers of the note, an uncertificated bankrupt, who acknowledged his own and proved the defendant's signature to the note, and it was resolved upon the authority of Lockhart v. Graham,<sup>(b)</sup> that T. S. might be allowed to be a witness to prove the handing of the defendant to the note, and the reason given was that if the plaintiffs recovered against the defendant, T. S. would be liable to them for contribution; or if they failed in the action, they might resort to T. S. for the whole, and then T. S. would be entitled to contribution from the defendant: so that quidcunque videtur T. S. stood indifferent.

LORD ABINGER.—Does this case apply here? Here, if the plaintiff recovers, the witness will be discharged from liability.

Mr. Wilson. This witness is only a surety.

Mr. Williams followed on the same side, intending that as a co-trespasser might be called, might one who would be liable on a note under a certain state of things—Buller's N. P. C. 286, and Hall v. Curzon, 9 B. and C. 646.

Mr. Evans distinguished the case of co-trespassers from co-sureties, on the ground that there was no right of contribution between them.

LORD ABINGER gave judgment, and said, it is the opinion of the Court that the evidence the witness was admissible in the same manner as the evidence of the indorser of a bill of exchange is admissible in an action against the acceptor, the witness is presumed to stand indifferent.—Rule discharged.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER CHAMBER,

July 6.

Appeals from the Court of Exchequer.

VYSE v. WAKEFIELD.

Covenant—Practice—Pleading—Covenant to effect a Life Policy of Insurance, and not to go beyond the limits of Europe—on breach Declaration, must aver that the Defendant had notice of the Policy having been effected, or of its containing a Condition upon which the breach is alleged.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Court of Exchequer, in which the defendant had verdict on demurrer.

By an indenture, dated the 3d March, 1827, the defendant, Edward Gibbon Wakefield, entered into a covenant with the plaintiff that he would at any time, at the request of the plaintiff, appear at the office for insurance of lives within the bills of mortality, or before the agents of any such office in the country; where he might happen to be residing, or happen to be, and then and there to answer such questions as might be required, concerning the state of his health, to enable the plaintiff, if he should think proper, to insure the defendant's life; and should not afterwards do, or as far as with him should lay, permit to be done, any act, deed, matter, or thing whatsoever, whereby any such insurance might be, or become void, or be prejudiced or affected in any manner whatsoever.

In pursuance of this covenant, the defendant did, on the 8th March, 1827, appear at the Rock Insurance office, London, where the plaintiff insured his life for £3000. at an annual premium of £81. 17s 6d—the policy contained the usual proviso, that in case the insured should go beyond certain limits of Europe it should become void.

The defendant subsequently went to reside at Canada, in North America, beyond the limits of Europe, by which the policy had become void, and the plaintiff brought his action against the defendant for breach of covenant.

The defendant demurred to the declaration for the want of an averment, that the defendant had notice that the policy had been effected, and that it contained such a condition for making it void.

Upon this demurrer the defendant had judgment, Lord Abinger stated the rule to be, that when a party stipulates to do a certain thing in a certain specified event which may become known to him, and with which he can make himself acquainted, he is not entitled to any notice; but when it is to do a thing which lies within the peculiar knowledge of the opposite party, then notice ought to be given to him.

PARKER, B. expressed his doubts upon this question. He considered the general rule to be, that a party is not entitled to notice unless he has agreed for it; though there are cases where the law requires that he should have notice, and he thought this to be one of those cases. There is certainly notice by the plaintiff to the defendant of his intention to effect a policy, but no notice that the policy was effected, or of the conditions of such policy as applied to the covenant of the defendant, for breach of which the action was brought.

Mr. Henderson supported the appeal; but

The COURT stopped the argument, being clearly of opinion that the averment of notice was necessary, and that no such averment, or any thing equivalent to it, was found in the declaration.

Judgment of the Court below affirmed.

26. And be it enacted, that the Commissioners of Excise, or such person or persons as the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury shall direct, shall cause to be provided such moulds, frames, or instruments, or machinery or parts of machinery, as may be necessary for the making of paper, to be used as covers, or envelopes, or stamps, and to receive the impression of the dies, plates, or other instruments which have been or shall be provided, made, or used by or under the direction of the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes, or of any other person or persons legally authorized in that behalf, for the purpose of expressing or denoting any of the rates or duties of postage which are or shall be directed to be charged under or by virtue of the authority contained in the said recited Act of the last Session of Parliament, or under this Act, which paper shall have such distinguishing words, letters, figures, marks, lines, threads, or other devices worked into or visible in the substance of the same as the said Commissioners of Excise, or such other person or persons so directed by the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, shall from time to time order and direct; and it shall be lawful for the said Commissioners of Excise or other person or persons, from time to time as they shall see fit, to alter or vary any such words, letters, figures, marks, lines, threads, or other devices, either by the removal of any of them, and substitution of other words, letters, figures, marks, lines, threads, or other devices, or by any change in the position or arrangement thereof; and all such moulds, frames, or instruments, machinery or parts of machinery, shall be provided, and all such paper shall be made and manufactured, under such regulations, and by such person or persons, as the said Commissioners of Excise or other person or persons as aforesaid shall from time to time appoint or contract with for that purpose; and all the said moulds, frames, or instruments, and machinery or parts of machinery, shall be kept by such officer or officers or other person as the said Commissioners of Excise, or other person or persons directed by the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, shall appoint; and all the paper so made shall, as the same is required, be delivered over to the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes, or to such officer or warehouse keeper as such last-mentioned Commissioners shall direct to receive and take charge of the same.

27. And be it enacted, that all contracts and agreements to be entered into by the Commissioners of Excise for or relating to the supply of any such paper as aforesaid shall be made in the name of the Secretary for the time being to the said Commissioners, and his successors in office, for and on behalf of her Majesty, her heirs and successors.

tracted with certain persons for the manufacture and supply of and have supplied to the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes, for postage envelopes and covers and stamps, certain quantities of paper made and manufactured with certain words, letters, figures, marks, lines, threads, or devices worked into or visible in the substance of such paper, according to the samples thereof annexed to such contracts; be it enacted, that all paper so made and supplied, or which hereafter shall be made or supplied under any such contract or contracts, shall be deemed and taken to be paper subject to and the same shall be subject to all the enactments and provisions of this Act in the same manner as if the same had been made and supplied under the enactments and provisions herein-before contained.

29. And be it enacted, that if any person shall make, or cause or procure to be made, or shall aid or assist in the making, or shall knowingly have in his custody or possession, not being legally authorized by the Commissioners of Excise, or other person or persons appointed by the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, and without lawful excuse (the proof whereof shall lie on the person accused), any mould, frame or other instrument having therein any words, letters, figures, marks, lines, or devices peculiar to and appearing in the substance of any paper heretofore or hereafter to be provided or used for postage covers, envelopes, or stamps, or any machinery or parts of machinery for working any threads into the substance of any paper, or any such thread, and intended to imitate or pass for such words, letters, figures, marks, lines, threads, or devices; or if any person, except as before excepted, shall make, or cause or procure to be made, or aid or assist in the making, or shall knowingly have in his custody or possession, any paper in the substance of which shall be worked or shall appear visible any words, letters, figures, marks, lines, threads, or other devices peculiar to and worked into or appearing visible in the substance of any paper heretofore or hereafter to be provided or used for postage covers, envelopes, or stamps, or any part of such words, letters, figures, marks, lines, threads, or devices, and intended to imitate or pass for the same; or if any person, except as before excepted, shall knowingly have in his custody or possession, without lawful excuse (the proof whereof shall lie on the person accused), any paper in the substance whereof shall be worked or shall appear visible any such words, letters, figures, marks, lines, threads, or devices as aforesaid, or any part of such words, letters, figures, marks, lines, threads, or devices, and intended to imitate or pass for the same; or if any person, except as aforesaid, shall by any art, mystery, contrivance, cause or procure, or aid or assist in causing or procuring, any such words, letters, ures, marks, lines, threads, or devices as aforesaid, or any part of such words, letters, figures, marks, lines, threads, or other devices, and intended to imitate or pass for the same, to appear marked into or visible in the substance of any paper whatever, then and in every such case every person so offending shall for every such offence be adjudged a felon, and shall be transported for the term of seven years, or shall be imprisoned at the discretion of the court before whom such person shall be tried, for any period not less than two years.

30. And be it enacted, that if any person not lawfully authorized, and without lawful excuse the proof whereof shall lie on the person accused) who shall purchase or receive, or take or have in his custody or possession, any paper manufactured and provided by or under the directions of the Commissioners of Excise, or other person or persons appointed to provide the same by the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, for the purpose of being used for postage covers, envelopes, or stamps, and for receiving the impression of the dies, plates or other instruments provided, made, or used under the directions of the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes, or other person or persons legally authorized in that behalf, before such paper shall have been duly stamped with such impression and issued for public use, every such person shall for such offence be guilty of a misdemeanour, and being convicted thereof, shall, at the discretion of the court before whom such person shall be tried, be imprisoned for any period not more than three years nor less than six calendar months.

31. And be it enacted, that in all cases in which there now is or shall be a treaty between the Postmaster General and the post office of a foreign country, for collecting and accounting for the British postage on foreign letters sent by the post from the United Kingdom to that foreign country or to any other foreign country, the Postmaster General may, so long as the treaty or agreement shall continue in force, receive upon any such foreign letters from the sender the postage, both British and foreign, in one entire sum, and upon foreign letters addressed to places within her Majesty's dominions may, whether there shall be any such treaty or not, charge the foreign postage in addition to the British postage, and he may account for and pay over to the foreign countries entitled to receive the same, the amount of all such foreign postage; and it shall be optional with the sender of a letter addressed to any foreign country included in such treaty, or to any foreign country to which such treaty shall extend, either to pay the British and foreign postage thereof in one entire sum, or to send the letters without paying any postage, either British or foreign, or he may otherwise pay the British postage only; and, subject to this enactment, the postmaster-general may cause the postage of all letters sent out of the United Kingdom to be paid or stamped on being put into the post-office.

32. And be it enacted, that the foreign postage marked on any letter or newspaper, or other printed paper brought into the United Kingdom, shall in all courts of justice and other places be received as conclusive evidence of the amount of foreign postage payable in respect of such letter, newspaper, or other printed paper, in addition to the British postage; and such foreign postage shall be recoverable within the United Kingdom and other her Majesty's dominions as postage due to her Majesty.

33. And be it enacted, that it shall be lawful for her Majesty's postmaster-general to charge on all letters conveyed by the post between places within any of her Majesty's colonies, or conveyed by packet-boats between one part of her Majesty's dominions and another part of the same dominions, or between her Majesty's dominions and foreign parts, or between one port in any foreign country and another port in the same or any other foreign country, where post communications shall be established, and where rates of postage have not hitherto been authorized by law, and also to charge on all letters conveyed by any vessels to or from any of the colonies, or between any of the colonies, or between any of the colonies and a foreign port, and on all letters which shall be brought by the master of any vessel to the post-office in any of the colonies, such rates of postage as the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, by warrant under their hands, shall from time to time direct.

34. And be it enacted, that it shall be lawful for her Majesty's postmaster-general to require the postage from time to time payable for letters transmitted by packet-boats or private ships between places out of the United Kingdom to be paid by the sender on the tender or delivery of such letters at the post-office, or other place appointed by the postmaster-general for the receipt of such letters.

35. And be it enacted, that the owners, charterers, or consignees of vessels inward-bound, and the owners, consignees, or shippers of goods on board vessels inward-bound, shall have their letters by such vessels free from postage (except as herein-after mentioned) if delivered at the port of the ship's arrival; and if delivered at any other place within the United Kingdom, on payment of the postage, as on pre-paid inland letters, according to the scale of weight and number of rates herein-before mentioned, from the port of arrival to the place of delivery, and if delivered in any of her Majesty's colonies, on payment of the colonial rates of postage to which letters in such colony may be liable, on conveyance from such port of arrival to the place of delivery, provided the letters brought by any one vessel to any one such person shall not collectively exceed six ounces in weight (except in the case of letters brought by vessels coming from Ceylon, the Mauritius, the East Indies, or the Cape of Good Hope, into any port of the United Kingdom, for an owner, charterer, or consignee of such vessel, in which case they may be collectively twenty ounces in weight), and the owner, charterer, or consignee shall be described as such on the address and superscription; and in the case of owners, shippers, or consignees of goods, it shall also appear by the ship's manifest that they have goods on board the vessel; and the persons hereby exempted shall be entitled to have their letters which come within the above conditions before the master of the vessel delivers the other letters in his charge to the post-office: Provided nevertheless, that all ship letter gratuities payable by law to masters of vessels bringing any such letters, shall in all cases be paid to the post-office by the parties to whom the same may be addressed (in addition to any postage payable thereon) before delivery of such letters to the parties entitled to receive the same, whether such letters shall be delivered at the port of arrival of such vessel or elsewhere.

REVIEW OF NEW BOOKS.

ADVENTURES of an ATTORNEY in SEARCH of PRACTICE, or a DELINEATION of PROFESSIONAL LIFE. SECOND EDITION. London, Saunders & Otteley, Conduit-street, 1840.

We have read this interesting book, and at once pronounce it a nut that every professional man should crack during the vacation.

We assuredly have heard before of Attornies in want of practice—Attornies in good practice—Attornies in bad practice, and Attornies of all shades and grades. There are few persons who really know more about them than we do.—We could write a red book and a black book, with names fair and names foul.—The communications we receive for the purpose of publication, would astonish the many highly honourable attornies which the profession boasts of; but we think it better for the attornies at large to suppress all such communications. We know also that a race of men are springing up in the profession quite unknown to it in the olden time. Men of fortune, and of education, men whose honour and reputation will be (we trust) above all price.

The author of this work, in speaking of "the non-respectable of his body," says—

It must be confessed that till within the last forty or fifty years an attorney's title to be ranked even among the middle classes of society was very equivocal. * * *

Legal business itself was at this period of a very inferior stamp: now and then cases might arise on family settlements—on real titles—on complicated relations of debtor and creditor—or doubtful customs in trade or commerce; but these were comparatively rare, and by no means constituted the bulk of legal practice; that was to be found in petty personal disputes or delinquencies—in small controversy between small people. * * *

In our days though this inferior business remains and is even extended as population is extended, and the lower classes have acquired greater property, yet it by no means forms the principal inducement to enter the profession. So intimately has commerce become interwoven with law, in all its branches, that there is scarcely any important transaction in which the merchant can engage, that does not more or less require the counsel of his solicitor, till long familiar with the subject has made him half a lawyer himself. The law of Insurance, the law of principal and factor, of lien, of partnership, of bankruptcy, of bills of exchange, and many other heads that might be mentioned, enter into the daily affairs of the counting house. So many, too, of our patrician families, have in late years found it convenient to place their money in mercantile or banking houses, and consequently to raise capital by the mortgage or sale of their patrimonial estates, that questions of pure conveyancing often become entangled with commercial law, and the nobleman, not less than the merchant, is thrown more frequently and more entirely into the hands of his attorney. The immense increase of public companies and parliamentary business, and even the growing importance and independence of our colonies, have largely contributed to swell the stream of professional profit, and at the same time to purify its source, by giving a legitimate and acknowledged value to the solicitor's services. The gradual elevation of our duties has naturally led to the introduction among us of many young men from that rank of life, who less than half a century ago, would have spurned the calling as derogatory to their birth; and attornies in the higher walks of the profession have in our stances, established for themselves an acknowledged title to rank with the first circles, though I do not say the most fashionable, for I by no means class these among the most worthy, or the most important; but though by this accession of better born, and therefore, generally, better educated men, we have improved our social position, and can now enumerate hundreds among us who are not less gentlemen by birth, by feeling, and by manners, than we are by Act of Parliament, there still remains too much of that low business which was once the staple of our trade, not to attract many low people into the profession; the rather because if once admitted here, the best prizes are as open to them as to others, if by happy accident they can insinuate themselves into the first or second class of competition: indeed, to be an attorney is itself a great step in life, a sort of gentility of station, in the estimate of the lower ranks of shopkeepers and mechanics; nor does it require any great outlay of money to give a son a title to the name, provided no lavish expenditure has been made in his previous education. Let it not be supposed that I feel contempt for this humble and even laudable ambition; far from it, for I profess principles too liberal, as well in politics as I trust in Christian faith, to deride it; but I will think myself at liberty to protest against the absurdity, as well as the silly pretension of placing a boy of sixteen in an attorney's office, without any preparatory education beyond the Latin Grammar, and too often less than that, simply to qualify him to be a gentleman, whilst his brothers are tinkers and tailors, and his father a Bow-street runner, or a Sheriff's officer.

The author in treating of an honest and respectable Attorney, says,

If I were asked to define the professional character to which I should most willingly trust myself, in an affair of delicacy or importance, involved in intricate details of circumstance, and tangled perhaps with much of personal and private feeling, I should select a man distinguished by calm energy, a clear head, and sound common sense: if in addition to this, he were gifted with a cheerful disposition, and marked, not by studious delicacy of mind, but by that enlarged honesty which is usually intended by "honourable principle," I should consider that he possessed the finest qualities for a useful attorney. Of course there are not many who come up to this standard; but in proportion as they approach it, and as the general nature of their business implies that they keep it constantly in view, a prudent man may consider himself safe in their hands. If my work were not necessarily anonymous, and anonymous praise, however sincere, goes for nothing, I could with ease name a hundred so-licitors that well deserve to be classed with such as I have here described.

Again, upon the subject of Attornies' charges, he says,

How many unprofessional readers will stare (if I chance to find any), when I remark that one of the most difficult problems that an attorney has to solve, is to what extent he may properly make any charge at all! Yet I rejoice to say, for it is to the credit of my profession, that with the respectable members of it, this is frequently a perplexing question. It occurs in many ways: the most common is this:—An old and valuable client becomes acquainted with a case of great hardship, and perhaps oppression, involving legal points; he calls on his attorney, and avowedly on benevolent impulse, asks his opinion; the opinion involves, as a matter of course, inquiry into fact and evidence, for very few clients understand the value of the one, or detail the other with accuracy; the sufferer is sent to explain his grievance: it admits of redress; the client liberally offers to indemnify against disbursements; the attorney can do no less than wave profits; and thus a suit is begun gratuitously, partly from charitable feeling, yet more from anxiety to oblige a client, and time and labour are soon bestowed to a most inconvenient extent. In a simple case like this, there is no help for it: matters must proceed to an end in the usual routine, and compensation must be found in conscience; but this simple case admits of many variations, and then the difficulty begins. The client may go no farther than just asking an opinion; the opinion is, on the whole, favourable; the injured pauper is not poor enough to claim a pauper's privilege; if you desert him, you offend your client, who, ignorant of the expence, as well as trouble, that the offer implies, expects you will spontaneously take up the case; partial success follows; a wrong-headed jury—and nineteen out of twenty are wrong-headed,—give ten pounds damages for a broken leg, when they would not have their own gouty toes trod upon for fifty; some thirty more are recovered for taxed costs, and (the case has occurred to myself) after receiving these "party and party" allowances, you remain more than twenty out of pocket. You may gain a verdict for your pauper client, and swallow up all the fruits of his triumph, even to repay extra costs out of pocket! Reason and equity would say, in such a case, that the attorney is excusable for pocketing the damages, as well as the costs; yet character and interest forbid it. It is a hard case: but the attorney must relinquish all, though successful; and to retain the character of a gentleman, must abandon, not only reputation, but bare indemnity. The most annoying of all causes that a man can undertake is where he recovers damages, moderate or temperate damages, as they are called, that is to say, fifty pounds for the loss of an eye, or thirty for the crippling of a limb, for a humble client thrust upon him by a wealthy patron, or adopted out of christian charity! How often have I known jurymen vaunt with self-complacency, of their justice, when some poor devil has obtained from this same justice, just enough to pay his surgeon's bill, after having been disabled for life by a drunken coachman, or a larking dandy: while the attorney who has brought the action for mere compassion, has had the pleasure of hearing himself branded by Counsel, as a wretch prowling about the streets for quarrels, and obtains for his benevolence, taxed costs that will just pay for coach hire and a blue bag to take his papers home!

An axiom on the question of costs is so obviously true, that we cannot avoid surprise at our clients so often losing sight of it. If they wish only to pay their attorney like a shoe-black, they will soon have only shoe-blacks for their attorneys. No man can limit himself as to the extent of costs, without cramping his exertions to a degree that may prove highly injurious to his client's interests.

We wish that our space permitted our extracting some of the very trite and amusing anecdotes with which the work abounds. The writer is a man of considerable intelligence and practical experience, and the advice he gives to young practitioners is of that solid kind as to be invaluable. The work is written more as a lesson to the young generation than as an exposure of knavery—illustrations there are of no very delicate hues, but they all lead to the end the author intended his work should reach, viz.—raising the respectability of his Profession. The narratives are written with good sense, good taste, and good feeling; and there is nothing that can be called offensive in the whole work. The first edition certainly appeared to contain an unmerited attack upon the BAR; but in the Preface to the present Edition the Author has explained that away. We think that whether for instruction or amusement, no professional man should be without it in his library.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"A Subscriber from the first."—For your courteous letter accept our very best acknowledgments. We repeat our wish to please, as far as we can, all our subscribers.

Vox ab Ulstero, (Newtown, Ireland), and H. B. P. shall have attention.

Mr. Fisher, Calcutta.—Your article is inadmissible.

J. B.—We believe all the material decisions upon the New Will Act are to be found in the work. The section is very obscure; but we advise you not to omit on any occasion an attestation clause, or probate in any case will not be granted without very sufficient evidence of the due execution according to the statute; besides, under a devise of property for sale, a purchaser would not (or should not) accept the title without such evidence.

ESSAY.

ON THE ENGLISH LAW OF BAILMENTS.

VADIUM OR PAWN.

WE will now direct our consideration upon the fourth class of Bailments, vadium or pawn or pledge.

In the Civil Law it was called Pignus, and defined thus:—Pignus appellatum a pigno, quia res, quæ pignori dantur, manu pignoris continentur. Unde etiam videri potest, quod idam putant, pignus proprie rei mobilis constitui; (a) but there appears to have been a distinction between pignus and hypotheca, that where the thing was delivered to the creditor it was called pignus; but where it remained with the debtor, although pledged in security, it was called an hypotheca. (b) And yet we find Justinian to say there was no difference between a pledge and an hypotheca. Inter pignus autem et hypothecam (quantum ad actionem hypothecariam attinet), nihil interest; nam de qua re inter creditorem et debitorem convenerit, ut sit pro debito obligata, utraque hac appellatione continetur; sed in aliis differentia est; nam pignoris appellatione eam proprie rem contineri dicimus, quæ simul etiam traditur creditori, maxime si mobilis sit; at eam, quæ sine traditione nuda conventionione tenetur, proprie hypothecæ appellatione contineri dicimus. (c) Pothier defines it to be a contract, by which a debtor gives to his creditor a thing to detain as security for his debt. (d) Domat

(b) Dig. Lib. 13. tit. 7. l. 9. s. 2.

(c) Inst. Lib. 4. tit. 6. sec. 7.

defines it as being an appropriation of the thing given for the security of an engagement. (e) This is certainly a more comprehensive definition, because the former definitions apply solely to cases of debt, but the security may be pawned for any engagement besides debt. (f) Lord HOLT, in Coggs v. Bernard, (g) defined it thus: — “When goods or chattels are delivered to another as a pawn, to be a security to him for money borrowed of him by the bailor; and this is called in Latin, vadium, and in English a pawn, or a pledge.” (h) And in his observations upon it in the same case, he considered two things, “First, what property the pawnee has in the pawn or pledge; and, secondly, for what neglects he shall make satisfaction. As to the first, he has a special property, for (i) the pawn is a securing to the pawnee that he shall be repaid his debt, and to compel the pawnor to pay him. But if the pawn be such as it will be the worse for using, the (k) pawnee cannot use it as clothes, &c.; but if it be such as will be never the worse, as if jewels for the purpose were pawned to a lady, she (l) might use them; but then she must do it at her peril: for whereas if she keeps them locked up in her cabinet if her cabinet should be broke open, and the jewels taken from thence, she would be excused; if she wears them abroad, and is there robbed of them, she will be answerable. And the reason is, because the pawn is in the nature of a deposit, and, as such, is not liable to be used. And to this effect is Ow 123. But if the pawn be of such a nature as the pawnor is at any charge about the thing pawned to maintain it, as a horse, cow, &c. then (m) the pawnee may use the horse in a reasonable manner, or milk the cow, &c. in recompence for the meat. As to the second point Bracton gives you the answer: ‘Creditor, qui pignus accepit re obligatur, et ad illam restituendam tenetur; et cum hujusmodi res in pignus data sit utrique gratia, scilicet debitoris, quo magis ei pecunia crederetur, et creditoris quo magis ei in tuto sit creditum, sufficit ad ejus rei custodiam diligentiam exactam adhibere, quam si præstiterit, et rem casu amiserit, securus esse possit, nec impediatur creditum petere.’ (n) In effect, if a creditor takes a pawn, he is bound to restore it upon the payment of the debt; but yet it is sufficient if the pawnee use true diligence, and he will be indemnified in so doing, and notwithstanding the loss, yet he shall resort to the pawnor for his debt. Agreeable to this is 29 Ass. 28, and Southcote’s case is. But indeed the reason given in Southcote’s case is, because the pawnee has a special property in the pawn. But that is not the reason of the case; and there is another reason given for it in the book of Assize, which is indeed the true reason of all these cases, that the law requires nothing extraordinary of the pawnee, but only that he shall use an ordinary care for restoring the goods. But, indeed, if the money for which the goods were pawned be tendered to the pawnee before they are lost, then the pawnee shall be answerable for them, because the pawnee by detaining them after the tender of the money is a wrong doer, and it is a wrongful detainer of the goods, and the special property of the pawnee is determined. And a man that keeps goods by wrong, must be answerable for them in all events; for the detaining of them by him is the reason of the loss. Upon the Sed, ut pignus utriusque gratia datur, et debitoris, quo magis pecunia ei credatur, et creditoris, quo magis ei in tuto sit creditum, placuit sufficere, si, ad eam rem custodiendam, exactam diligentiam adhibeat; quam si præstiterit, et aliquo fortuito casu rem amiserit, securus esse, nec impediri creditum petere.

Sir William Jones defines a pledge thus:— A bailment of goods by a debtor to his editor, to be kept till the debt is disarged," (o) and according to Pothier it may treated in the common law, as in the civil r, as a contract founded in the law of ture, of reciprocal obligations, and of tual benefit. (p)

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LEGAL GUIDE. SUPPLEMENTARY ANSWER TO PROBLEM 11.—VOL. 4.

INTERESSE TERMINI.—What is it?

SIR,—I lay before you my ideas of an intere termini, its nature, properties, and effect in

1. It is a technical phrase denoting the inst which accrues to a lessee for years, on the cution of the lease; and which continues to until he enters on the premises leased. It is interest in the term. It is his right of y on the tenement at the time from which lease is to commence (a).

Some allege it to be a right only, and not an te, the estate notwithstanding being still he lessor; others maintain it to be more than ight. (b) It is not a vested interest, not g accompanied with a delivery of possession, is supposed to be similar to a naked right.
stranger can acquire a naked right in land ate from possession; but an interesse ter- is no right in land, but a mere interest in
rm. (c) It is said to be merely an execuinte est; but I submit it might be more arly denominated an interest derived from an executory contract; for the interest being created by the execution of the lease, is in esse, and ceases to be executory, whilst the contract from which it springs remains executory during the continuance of the interesse termini. (d)

Whilst there are a variety of opinions as to whether it is an estate or a right only, the fact may be best ascertained by a consideration of its nature and properties. Mr. Preston holds that it is not an estate; and, in this opinion, he is strengthened by the view taken of it in *Rawlings
v. Walker* (e), that it has all the properties and consequences of a right only, and not of an estate; and it would seem that he is supported, to some extent, by the fact, that an interesse termini cannot be enlarged by a release; for, a release which must enure to enlarge an estate, cannot work without a possession joined with an estate (f). But this rule is not less applicable to any other estate with which possession is not joined; and consequently, does not shew that an interesse termini is not an estate. And, Lord Coke says, that this peculiarity is incident to an interesse termini, because "the lessee has not possession in the land at the time of the release made" (g). An interesse termini cannot be the object of a confirmation, neither can it be surrendered; yet, withal, an interesse termini may be conveyed to the owner of the freehold, which would be a surrender in substance, though not in form; for, by its union with the freehold from which it arose the interesse termini would be extinguished (h), and it has been decided that an assignment of it, by the lessee to the lessor will have that operation (i). But, let attention be turned to the definition of the word "estate" itself, and try, does an interesse termini fall within its terms? Mr. Preston defines the word estate to be "the interest which any one has in lands, or in any other subject of property" (k).
Now, if the definition had limited its meaning to the interest which any one has in lands, an interesse termini clearly cannot be comprehended within its meaning, for the reason given, that it is not a right in lands but a mere interest in the term (l). But if a term for years be a subject of property, a matter which, perhaps, admits not of a doubt, an interesse termini is an estate according to Mr. Preston's own definition.
Again, "the word estate is a general term, being applied to every species of property which a man may have an interest in" (m); here the term is applied to the substance of the property; but, "the word, in its most comprehensive sense, signifies the interest which a person has, in any subject of property whatever," so that the idea which the word estate gives rise to in the lawyer's mind, is of an immaterial, not of a material nature, it conveys to his mind the idea of an interest in property, and not the substantial property itself, which is only the object of that interest. The properties which are incidental to an interesse termini are the result of its peculiar quality of estate; and do not prove it to be a mere right; for though an interesse termini cannot be surrendered, nor confirmed, nor can be the foundation of a release to enlarge the estate, it is not from any essential similarity to a mere right.

It cannot be released because he, to whom the release is made, must have some estate in possession, in deed, or in law (n). It cannot be surrendered, because it is not that description of estate to which the class of conveyances called surrenders are applicable. It cannot be confirmed, because the owner has not possession of the land; but this does not prove that it is not an estate, it only shews that the owner has not possession joined with an estate. Its similarity to a naked right is attempted to be proved by the circumstance of it being held that it cannot merge any estate, nor be itself merged (o). Yet Mr. Preston admits, that if an interesse termini unite with the freehold out of which it is to arise, it will be discharged (p); and Lord Coke says, that "by a surrender in law, an interesse termini may be drowned" (q). Yet, supposing its incapability of merging or being merged, even that is no argument, that it is not an estate, for it is the doctrine of merger, that both estates "must come to one, and the same person in one and the same right, else, if the freehold be in his own right, and he has a term in right of another (ex autre droit), there is no merger." So, also, if he who hath the reversion in fee, marries the tenant for years, there is no merger (r). Further, a man may have, in his own right, both an estate tail and a reversion in fee, and the estate tail, though a less estate, shall not merge in the fee (s). Lord Coke occasionally calls it an estate (t); and, remarking on a section of Littleton, where an interesse termini is spoken of as a right, says that, "this is not so to be understood that he hath but a naked right; for, then he could not grant it over" (u). And, in Laffyn's case, Judges Walmsley and Daniel said, an interesse termini "is well grantable over;" and in this it differs from a mere right, such as a chose in action, which, by the strict rules of the ancient common law, could not be transferred to another person; for no chose in action could be assigned or granted over (v). But where an interesse termini vests in possession, the owner may grant it before entry, even though the lessee continue in possession (w). And that fact, and also the fact that it is devisable prove that it is an estate; because the properties of being devisable and transferable were, at common law, peculiar to estates, and not attached to naked rights.

Interesse termini are of two kinds, present and future, present, when they entitle their owners to immediate possession, as where a lease for years is made to commence immediately, and the lessee has not yet entered. Future, when they do not entitle the owner to possession, till a future time, as, where a freeholder makes a lease to A. to commence at Michaelmas next. But future interesse termini are not necessarily estates in remainder; for estates commencing by way of remainder are fed with possession of the owner of the particular estates on which they are raised, and by which they are supported, and a remainder cannot be created without a particular estate. There must necessarily be some precedent to the estate in remainder (r). An estate created to commence at a distant period of time, without any intervening estate, is therefore strictly no remainder, it is the whole of the gift and no residuary part. Future interesse termini may commence without any intervening preceding estate, or they may commence by way of remainder after another interesse termini; and they may be either vested or contingent, as they may be limited to commence on events contingent or not contingent. An interesse termini is, in some respects, a perfect term, and has the properties of an estate for years. The lessee may enter, though he neglect to do so during the life of the lessor (y). He may grant or devise his interest (z); and it is transmissible to his executors, and it may be divested, and put to a right, into which it is said to be converted by ouster of its owner. But though it is in some respects an estate for years, it is not an estate for all purposes (aa). They are not as estates for years are, sufficient foundation for confirmation (bb), nor for a release to enlarge state (cc), nor is a transfer of it to the freeholder called a surrender (dd) but a release. Nor is the state which remains in the lessor acknowledged by law under the name of a reversion (ee). Nor can the owner of an interesse termini maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit; for to maintain this action, the plaintiff must have possession actual or constructive. Neither can he maintain an action ejectione firmæ (ff).

Interesse termini are estates for years. But if so, then they may be merged, as it is now nearly settled, that one term of years may merge in another (gg); and as all terms of years are equal in the eye of the law, a lease of 1,000 years may merge in a term of one year, if the latter be the term in reversion. The writer in the Law Magazine puts a case of which the following is an outline:—Where A. termor for one hundred years, makes to B. an estate for 20 years, to commence at the end of 80 years, it is not an interesse termini, being part of an estate perfected by possession. Now, if A. seised in fee grants an estate for life to B., who having become seised, makes a lease to C. for 10 years, from Michaelmas next (if B. should so long live). This, I should suppose, would give C. an interesse termini, and yet his term would, I apprehend, be a part of an estate perfected with possession. (hh) VOX AB ULSTERO.

your valuable journal to the insertion of my communications now emboldens me to address you, in forwarding the following observations upon that part of the principles of equity jurisprudence which relates to the conditions annexed to gifts or legacies in restraint of marriage, and the distinctions raised by courts of equity upon them. I propose confining the present communication to the former of these, and, should it meet with your concurrence, to consider the latter in a second letter the ensuing week. The three great heads of equitable concurrent jurisdiction are Accident, Mistake, and Fraud. It is of the last-mentioned I would now speak, which is thus generally defined by Labeo:—“Dolum malum esse omnem calliditatem, fallaciam, machinationem ad circumveniendum, fallendum, decipiendum alterum adhibitam,” and the Digest says, “Labeonis definitio vera est.” (lib. 4. tit. 3. l. 1. s. 2.; id. lib. 2. tit. 14. l. 7. s. 9.) This is descriptive of positive actual fraud, but there is another class of frauds which, as distinguished from the former, are treated as implied or constructive frauds, by which (as a learned writer says) are meant such acts or contracts as, though not originating in any evil design or contrivance to perpetuate a positive fraud or injury upon other persons, are yet, by their tendency to mislead or deceive other persons, or to violate private or public confidence, or to impair or injure the public interests, deemed equally reprehensible with positive fraud, and therefore are prohibited by law, as within the same reason and mischief as acts and contracts done malo animo. And it is for the protection of public interests, and from considerations of public policy, that courts of equity include within their jurisdiction the class of cases it is my present intention to consider, under the head of Constructive Frauds. In the civil law all gifts, bequests, &c. in restraint of marriage generally, were held void, as inconsistent with public policy; “Si testator rogasset heredem ut restitueret hereditatem mulieri, si non nupsisset dicendum erit compellendum heredem, si suspectam dicat hereditatem, adire, et restituere eam mulieri, etiamsi nupsisset Pothier,” (Pand. lib. 5. tit. 1. n. 33.); and this upon the ground, “Quod in fraudem legis ad impediendas nuptias scriptum est, nullam vim habet.” (Lib. 35. tit. 1. n. 35.) And courts of equity in acting upon this and other cases of a similar nature, have been much influenced by these doctrines of the civil law. (1 Fonbl. Eq. B. 1. c. 4. 10.) It is not here necessary to enter into detail upon the probable causes which introduced and facilitated the progress of the civil law doctrine into the English courts of equity, and I therefore refer all who wish for information upon this head to the arguments of Lord ROSSLYN in Stackpole v. Beaumont

(3 Ves. Jr. 96); and to the case of Scott v. Tyler (2 Bro. C. C. 432), where the subject is treated with much learning and ability by Lord THURLOW, who lays it down that devises of land follow the rule of the common law. And Legacies of money follow the rule of the canon law. The doctrine, as to restraints on marriage, and the conditions creating the same, has, however, undergone important changes; and that which is at present supported and administered by courts of equity is far better calculated for the benefit of mankind, and the advantage of society in general, than that which was asserted in the Roman law; for though it upholds the general freedom of choice in marriage, it does not fail to preserve a just and proper control in the parents, and a reasonable power in all persons, to qualify and restrict their bounty in such a manner, and on such conditions, as the general right of dominion over property in a free country justifies and protects upon grounds of general convenience and safety. The general result of the modern English doctrine on this subject, may be shortly stated by saying, that conditions annexed to gifts, devises, and bequests in restraint of marriage, are of force and binding, provided they be reasonable in themselves, and are void when they operate in any manner as an undue restraint upon the freedom of marriage as against public policy and the due economy and morality of domestic life; for instance, a condition that a child should not marry till 50 years of age, or should not marry any person in the same town, county, or state, would of course be void, and be deemed a mere evasion or fraud upon the law. (Scott v. Tyler.) But the same principles of public policy which annul such conditions when they tend to a general restraint of marriage will confirm and support them, when they merely prescribe such reasonable and provident regulations and sanctions, as tend to protect the individual from those melancholy consequences, to which an over hasty, rash, or precipitate match would probably lead (Fonblanque, B. 1. c. 4.); and some provisions against such improvident matches, especially during infancy, or until a certain age of discretion, cannot be deemed an unreasonable precaution for parents and other persons to affix to their bounty. Thus a legacy given to a daughter to be paid her at twenty-one years, if she did not marry till that period, would be held good; for it postpones marriage only to a reasonable age of discretion.<sup>(a)</sup> And a condition annexed to a gift or legacy, that the party should not marry without the consent of parents or trustees, or other persons specified, is held good; for it does not impose an unreasonable restraint upon marriage. Desbody v. Beyville (2 P. W. 547). Also a condition that a widow shall not marry is no unlawful injunction, for it is not a general restraint of marriage. A condition to marry or not to marry Titus or Mævius is good; so also a condition prescribing due ceremony and a due place of marriage is good; and so are other conditions of a similar nature, if not used evasively, as a covert purpose to restrain marriage generally. Scott v. Tyler, Godolphin's Orphan's Legacy (pl. 3. c. 17; Ayliffe Pand. B. 3. p. 374).

Having now seen what the general state of the law is with regard to conditions annexed to gifts or bequests in restraint of marriage, we have paved the way for the consideration of those nicer distinctions resorted to by courts of equity in order to escape from the positive direction of the party imposing such conditions, which will be the subject of my next; and I cannot do better than close this letter by adopting the words of M. Fonblanque, that "the only restrictions which the law of England imposes, such as are dictated by the soundest policy, and approved by the purest morality. That a person professing to be affectionate shall not be unjust that professing to assert his own claim, he shall not disappoint or control the claims of nature nor obstruct the interests of the community; that what purports to be an act of generosity shall not be allowed to operate as a temptation to that which militates against nature, morality, and sound policy, or to restrain from doing that which would serve and promote the essential interests of society, are rules which cannot reasonably be reprobated as harsh infringements of private liberty, or even reproached as unnecessary restraints on its free exercise," and, "on these considerations are founded those distinctions which have from time to time been recognised by our courts of equity, respecting testamentary conditions with reference to marriage, and which I purpose to consider in my next.

says Justitia, "was afterwards argued at very great length before all the judges."

Now, in an argument, and particularly one of very great length, we naturally conclude that every thing was said on the subject that could be said, that the matter was duly considered and debated in all its bearings; and I should think there could be little doubt but that it was so:—wherefore then the necessity of solemn deliberation after such solemn argument? Why deliberate on a point on which nobody had any thing more to say? Nor do I see very clearly what would have been gained if the judges had locked themselves up for the purpose.

A majority of three had decided that the delivery of the list of witnesses was not a good delivery in point of law. A similar majority decided at the same time that the objection was not taken in due time, both which decisions were given together as their judgments on the questions reserved. I don't understand how the decision on the second question was the result of an extraordinary chance as discovered by Justitia, neither do I understand why the decision on the first ought to have effected the conviction, and the decision on the second have gone for nothing. The effect of the two together appeared to my weak mind to be that the objection was not valid, because not taken in time. Had it been taken in time, the error could have been rectified. In other words, the hole could under no circumstances have been big enough for Mr. Frost to slip through.

Every honest man will unite with Justitia in lamenting that there should have been a difference of opinion on this and other occasions, when perfect unanimity would have looked so much better. But if the learned gentleman will refer to the letter which accompanied the opinions, (b) he will see that doubtful points, under similar circumstances, are uniformly settled by the majority of the judges, which would seem to imply that perfect unanimity is not always a matter of course.

With all proper respect for Justitia and his letter, I cannot but think that had his friend, the miserable prisoner, obtained a free pardon instead of a commutation of his sentence, it would have cast a much larger blot on the judicial character, and one which would with much greater difficulty have been removed.

I am, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

OPINION OF SIR FREDERICK POLLOCK, AS TO SENDING SHIP LETTERS BY VESSELS OUTWARDS.

We copy, from the Liverpool Times of yesterday, the following opinion, which appears to have been given by Sir Frederick Pollock, on a subject of considerable importance to the merchants of Manchester, as well as to those of Liverpool, London, and other parts; and which appears to have been obtained at the instance of the British and American Steam Navigation Company:—

"I am of opinion, that the directors or agents of the company cannot in any office, or on board the ship, legally receive letters brought to them for conveyance to the United States.

"The receiving letters from any person who may choose to bring them, by suspending a bag into which they may be put, or by authorising the captain to receive all that may be delivered to him, is only a mode of 'making a collection.' When the letters are got together, they are a 'collection,' whether 'gathered' or brought and received; and I think a person who opened a bag for the receipt of letters generally would be deemed thereby to 'make a collection.'

"I am of opinion, that the penalties imposed by the act 1st Victoria, c. 36, would be incurred by the proceedings of the company in being parties (in the manner above detailed) to a collection of letters being made.

(Signed) "FREDERICK POLLOCK.

"Temple, Sept. 17, 1840."

The Liverpool Times has not explained why this opinion was obtained at the present time by the Steam Navigation Company; but we learn from another quarter that the post office authorities have sent notice to the agents for one of the transatlantic steamers (we believe the British Queen), to the effect that they were not at liberty to collect letters to be sent abroad by their vessel; though it was admitted that the sending of letters by private vessels, without the intervention of the post-office, was strictly legal. The power of sending letters, however, will be of very little use, unless somebody can lawfully receive them for the purpose of transmission.

As the circumstances out of which the existing practice of sending letters by private ships arose are not generally known, and as the matter is likely to excite considerable interest among mercantile men, we may probably be excused in giving a short explanation of them. In the year 1814, an act (54 Geo. III., c. 155) was passed, requiring all outward letters by steam vessels to be sent to the post-office, to be there taxed and stamped; after which, the parties were allowed to put them on ship-board themselves. This was found to be such an intolerable hindrance to the correspondence of the country, that, in the following year, deputations were sent from various quarters to represent to the then Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Vanaitart) the absolute necessity of repealing the clause; and they suggested, as a compromise for the abandonment of the tax on outward letters by private ships, an advance on the rates of postage on inward letters. Mr. Vanaitart, after some conferences with these deputations and with Sir Francis Freeling, agreed that clauses should be introduced into a postage bill then before Parliament (55 George III., c. 153), advancing the rate of inward postage to 8d, at which it has continued ever since, and expressly exempting all outward letters by private merchant vessels.

In some of the later post office acts, undoubtedly, clauses have been introduced, making it illegal to collect letters; but these attracted no particular attention, being generally supposed to refer to a practice which prevailed at one time in London, of receiving letters at coffee-houses for a fee of 3d or 6d each, and then forwarding them by private vessels.

We think it is tolerably clear, from the preceding facts, that if the opinion of Sir F. Pollock is correct, and parties are prevented by the recent post-office act from receiving letters for transmission by private ships, the privilege conferred by the 55th George III., of sending outward letters by private merchant vessels without charge, becomes a dead letter, and very great inconvenience (to say nothing of the expence) must necessarily result to parties engaged in commerce with foreign countries, and especially with

RYCRAFT v. CHRISTY.

SEPARATE USE.—Whether a bequest to a feme covert or her assigns for life, for her and their own absolute use and benefit, creates a trust for her separate use, so as to enable her to dispose of the bequest as a feme sole.

This Bill, filed in January, 1835, by Ann Rycraft and Pamela Rycraft by their next friend, against Wm. Miller Christy, the executor of the will of John Price, deceased, and Henry Rycraft, the husband of the plaintiff Ann Rycraft, for the due administration of the estate of Mr. Price, according to the trusts of his will.

It appeared by the Bill that Mr. Price, by his will, bequeathed all his leasehold messuages or tenements, personal estate and effects, unto William Miller Christy, his executors, administrators, and assigns, upon trust for sale; and the testator directed that his trustee should stand possessed of the produce thereof, and also of such part of his personal estate as consisted of money, upon trust, after payment of his debts, funeral and testamentary expences, to invest the same upon Government or real securities, and to pay the interest, dividends, and annual produce thereunto, or permit the same to be received and taken by, Ann Rycraft, or her assigns, during her life, for her and their own absolute use and benefit. And after her decease, as to as well the said securities as the interest, dividends, and produce thereof, upon trust to pay, assign, or transfer the same to his natural daughter Pamela, by the said Ann Rycraft, her executors, administrators, and assigns: and appointed the said Wm. Miller aid testator, deduct, pay, and allow unto the said Ann Elf, her executors, administrators, and assigns, for the maintenance and support of the said child, the sum of seven shillings weekly and every week, until the said child should attain the age of 16 years, in case such child should so long live. And the said Ann Rycraft covenanted for herself, her heirs, executors, and assigns, to indemnify and save harmless the said William Miller Christy, his executors and administrators, against all actions, suits, claims, and demands of, from, or by any person or persons whomsoever, in respect of the payment to the said Ann Elf of such seven shillings a week, until her said child attained the age of 16 years, in case such child should so long live. And the said Ann Rycraft and thereby agree to allow to the said William Miller Christy such weekly sum of seven shillings, out of the dividends and interest payable to her as aforesaid. Ann Rycraft was married to the defendant Henry Rycraft, but she had, for many years previous to the execution of the said agreement with the said Wm. Miller Christy, lived separate and apart from him, and still continued to do so. The defendant, Henry Rycraft, by his answer, disclaimed all interest in the trust funds. At the hearing, the Master was ordered to inquire and state to the Court whether Ann Rycraft's agreement for the payment of seven shillings a week to Ann Elf was binding on her, and the Master reported that it was binding upon her. To this report the plaintiffs excepted.—The exception now came on for argument. Three questions were discussed: first, whether the words of the bequest were sufficient to create a trust for the separate use of Mrs. Rycraft?—secondly, if not, then whether the subsequent disclaimer by her husband would have that effect?—lastly, whether the agreement, being voluntary, was such as would be enforced by a Court of Equity? Lord LANGDALE said, the case was not without difficulty, but as the husband had put in his answer, and did not dispute the agreement made by his wife, and as the fund was in the hands of the defendant, and the trust for the testator's natural daughter was therefore executed, he thought the agreement, although voluntary, was one which ought to be enforced against the plaintiff. He stated the will of the testator, and said he did not consider that the gift to "Ann Rycraft, or her assigns, during her life, for her and their own absolute use and benefit," constituted a gift to her separate use. At all events, the disclaimer by the husband not only left the trust fund at her own disposal, but gave effect to the agreement she had made with Mr. Christy, which was certainly of a meritorious nature. He thought the Master was quite right in his finding: no fraud was shown as having been practised upon Mrs. Rycraft, who had herself carried the agreement into effect, by allowing the payments made by the executor to Ann Elf, in pursuance of it; and this Court will carry into effect a voluntary agreement perfected in every way as the present.—It is a trust executed, and upon this there can be no doubt.—Exceptions over-ruled.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS—June 13.
Sittings in Banco.

MARRIOTT v. STOURLEY.

SHOPKEEPERS' NEGLIGENCE in exposing their goods to the danger of Passengers, and their consequent liability to an action for damages.

This was an action in which the plaintiff sought to recover damages for the injury sustained by him in consequence of the alleged negligent conduct of the defendant in his mode of exposing his goods for sale. The cause was tried at the last spring assizes for Northamptonshire, when it appeared that the plaintiff's pony ran away with his cart, and having come in contact with some ploughs and other articles which the defendant, who was a shopkeeper at Peterborough, had exposed for sale in the street in front of his shop; the plaintiff was thrown down, and received the injury complained of. For the defendant it was contended that his goods were not improperly exposed for sale, but in the usual manner in which those of country shopkeepers are generally placed, and that in all events the plaintiff himself was to blame in putting the cart to a vicious pony, which already run away with a cart that same morning and was still in an excited state when he attempted to put him in harness the second time, and that there was want of due care on the part of the plaintiff. The Judge cited Butterfield v. Forrester, (a) and directed the jury that if the evidence proved a want of due care on the part of the plaintiff he was not entitled to a verdict, and the jury found accordingly for the defendant.

Mr. Serjeant Goulburn had obtained a verdict to show cause why there should not be a new trial, on the ground that the case had not been properly left to the jury, and that the verdict was against evidence.

The rule now came on for argument.

TINDALL, C. J. in giving the judgment of the Court said, Lord ELLENBOROUGH had clearly explained the law (b) in the case of

(a) 11 East 60.

(b) Lord Ellenborough there observed, "It is not to cast himself upon an abatement, but to be made by the fault of another. If he does not himself use common care of it, if he do not himself use common care to be in the right. He cannot be said to be in the right, if he does not use common care to be in the right."

by the learned judge who tried the cause and which applied to this case. — Rule refused.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER—May 30.
Sittings in Banco.

BERNEL v. CURTEIS.

LANDLORD AND TENANT.

AGREEMENT for a Lease.—Where it shall be construed to amount to a present demise or only as a contract for a Lease.—COSTS of LEASE.—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS when it begins to run upon such an agreement.

Mr. Humfrey moved in this case to enter a nonsuit, or to reduce the damages, pursuant to leave reserved for the purpose at the trial of the cause before Lord ABINGER, C. B., when the plaintiff had a verdict for £18; viz. £10 for the costs the plaintiff had been put to in having a lease prepared, which the defendant had refused to execute, and £8 for use and occupation.

The facts of the case were these:—

The plaintiff and defendant, so long back as 1825, entered into the following agreement.

"Memorandum of agreement, dated Oct. 15, 1825, between David Curteis of the one part, and James Bernel of the other part. The said David Curteis agrees to take and the said James Bernel agrees to let on lease for the term of 21 years, to be computed from the date hereof, all those, &c., at and after the net yearly rent of £32, payable quarterly, to commence from Michaelmas Day last, without any deduction, and the said lease to contain the same covenants as are in the lease from Sir J. O. to the said James Bernel. All erections now on the premises are to be left. The expense of the lease and counterpart to be borne by the said David Curteis, and to be prepared by the solicitor of the said James Bernel."

Under this agreement the defendant entered into possession of the premises, and occupied them until 1838, when he gave notice to quit, upon which the plaintiff called upon him to execute a lease of the premises, which, as he contended, he was bound to do under the terms of his agreement. The lease having been drawn up and presented to the defendant, he refused to execute it, contending that the agreement itself operated as a lease, and that there was no necessity for any further expense. The plaintiff and also a small sum for the use and occupation of the premises, which resulted in the jury finding £10 for the costs of preparing the lease, and £8 for the use and occupation rent, and the motion was now made for a nonsuit, on the grounds that the agreement in question was a lease in itself, and that the statute of limitations was a bar to the action. He cited Alderman v. Neate (1), and Doe dem Phillips v. Benjamin (b).

Mr. Humfrey contended that this instrument contained words of a present demise, in which case as a lease was already in existence, of course the plaintiff was not justified in going to the expense of having another drawn so as to charge the defendant therewith. If this view of the case were correct, then the defendant would be entitled to nonsuit the plaintiff. The other point also had reference to the plea of the statute of limitations, under which the cause of action having arisen more than six years ago, the charge of preparing the lease could not be supported by the plaintiff.

LORD ABINGER, C. B., said there was no ground for the application on either of the points. The parties did not intend the agreement to be anything else than an agreement to grant and to execute a future lease of the premises, for the expense of preparing which the defendant was liable. With respect to the statute of limitations, it was equally manifest that the time was to be calculated from the moment at which a cause of action arose, which could only have been when the lease was offered, and the defendant refused to execute it according to his agreement, and not from the date of that agreement itself, which could not give any right of action till a breach of it had been committed.

The other judges concurred.

Rule refused.

(1) 4 Mee. & Wels. 704, S.C. which was an action to recover damages for the non-repair of certain premises; and the question turned on this, whether the agreement, the foundation of the action, was to be construed as a demise, or only as a contract for a lease. The agreement between the parties (which was stamped with a lease stamp) was, that Edmittee agreed to pay the rent and all taxes, and other outgoings, and also to keep the premises in repair. And the parties agreed that a lease and counterpart of the premises should be prepared and executed before the 1st of January then next, with covenants and agreements, pursuant to the now stating agreement, and such other general clauses as are usually contained in leases. There was also a proviso, by which Edward Sheppard agreed to convey the fee to the committee at a fixed price. The committee took possession and paid rent. No lease was ever executed. Edward Sheppard died, and his heir-at-law brought assumpsit after notice of dilapidations.

LORD ABINGER, C. B. in giving the judgment of the court said that,—It was contended by the defendant's counsel that this agreement could not operate as an absolute demise for 99 years; and he urged in support of the proposition, the circumstance of its containing a stipulation for the execution of a lease at a future period. But so many cases are to be found where agreements have been held to operate as actual demises, notwithstanding the insertion of a stipulation similar to the above, that this argument cannot be sustained. It was then suggested that it might have been optional on the part of the defendants to treat it as a lease or not; but we think on the view of the whole instrument that it is a question for our decision, whether or not the words it contains are sufficient to amount to a present demise, if it can be collected from the circumstances of the case, that it was the intention of the parties at the time when it was executed, that it should be such. Here the parties agree that the term in question is to commence from the 25th of March, 1782 at a certain yearly rent; on this the question arises, when would the first year's rent become due? No one can suppose for a moment that this can be at any other period than the Michaelmas; in which case the term immediately on the date of the agreement, and if so, what was the term in question but the one for ninety-nine years mentioned in the agreement? If, however, the first half year's rent be not considered as accruing due at Michaelmas 1782, it must necessarily become so at Lady-day next following: and on that construction we are to suppose that although the lessor created a tenancy for ninety-nine years from March 1782, at a half-yearly rent, still no rent was to be payable till the expiration of a full year from the date, and consequently the last half year's rent would become due at the end of a half year after the term had expired. It is much more probable that the rent should be made payable within the term, than after its expiration, as in the latter event, the landlord's remedy by distress would be gone. We think it would have been better if the Court had not given so wide a construction to instruments of this nature; but on construction of all the cases taken together, we do not avoid the conclusion that an agreement for the execution of a lease at a future period does not necessarily contradict the nature of an instrument of this description as amounting to a present demise. Besides the agreement in this case, containing the stipulation for a lease usually found in actual demises, we find no provision to prevent the death and moribundity of such an agreement, which would prevent the operation of the specific agreement for repair and payment of rent, and the proviso that the lease shall be put in end to, if the rent is not paid, and the repairs are performed. All these reasons we think that the law in this case will effect from the date of the agreement.

It appears of the operation of a lease as an actual demise were a lease for years. Pearce v. Har, 4 Bing. 175, where a lease was brought before the Court. Waller v. Green, 15 F. 1. Park v. Bentley, 12 F. 28. Sugden, 5 Term Rep. 165.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.—Sept. 16.

IN RE JAMES MOORE.

BANKRUPTCY ACT.—Construction of Sect. 3.

—What is a sufficient Assignment of a Trader's effects to constitute an Act of Bankruptcy.

Mr. Walker applied to the Court on behalf of a creditor of James Moore, late of New Bond Street, hatter and army accoutrement maker, whose debt was £400., that a fiat of bankruptcy should be issued against him, on the ground that he had parted with his business and the good-will of his business; that he had executed a conveyance of his property to certain trustees; and that, being a trader and unable to pay his debts, he had, under all the circumstances, committed an act of bankruptcy.

Mr. Sermon opposed the application on the ground that Mr. Moore had not assigned "all" his property to the creditors' trustees, and though embarrassed in consequence of not being able to get in large outstanding debts, and particularly a sum of £30,000. due to him from the Spanish Government, had nevertheless not for a moment contemplated the commission of an act of bankruptcy.

HOLROYD, C., said, the question was, whether a fiat should issue against Mr. James Moore, of Bond-street, on the ground of his having parted with his property under certain deeds. The third section of the Bankruptcy Act said, "That if any trader shall make any fraudulent gift, conveyance, or transfer of his goods or chattels, so as to defeat his creditors, he shall be guilty of an act of bankruptcy." The deeds in question were severally executed on the 24th and 28th July last. By the former, Mr. Moore assigned the lease of his premises, and the good-will of his business, in Bond-street, to Mr. Geo. Armand, for the sum of £3,600; and on the 28th he signed another deed, naming three of his principal creditors as trustees for the general body of creditors, and reciting his former assignment to Armand; the second deed also contained an account of the debt due to Mr. Moore by the Spanish Government for £30,000., which, with interest, was secured by bills on Mr. Carbonell, together with large outstanding debts; it also contained two other covenants—one, that a dividend was to be made by the trustees twice a year, and the other that Mr. Moore was not to be sued; and, therefore, the question was if either of these deeds constituted an act of bankruptcy—for it was quite clear that if either was a conveyance of "all" the trader's property from him, it would certainly amount to an act of bankruptcy, without any imputation whatsoever of fraud—as such a conveyance would completely put it out of his power to carry on his business. But if the deed on the face of it did not show that, and the first deed did not do so, then some further evidence of his having assigned away the great bulk of his property would be necessary to sustain a fiat. That, however, not having been done, it would next become necessary to show that either was a "voluntary" deed, and also that, when it was executed, Mr. Moore had bankruptcy in his contemplation. But neither of the deeds showed that he had parted with "all" his property; nor was any evidence offered to show that either deed was a voluntary deed, and clearly the first deed was not an act of bankruptcy. Then was the second otherwise? He certainly thought not. Was it then to be considered as a voluntary deed? It stated upon the face of it that, in consequence of his not being able to pay his creditors, he "had made the deed," &c. So that the proposal must have come from Mr. Moore. But then, besides its being voluntary, was it in his contemplation to commit an act of bankruptcy? Sufficient evidence was shown to prove he was insolvent at the time.

Mr. Sermon—No, sir, with submission, only that he was in embarrassed circumstances.

HOLROYD, C.—Well, in embarrassed circumstances. His bills were dishonoured for three or four months before the execution of the deed, and that certainly showed insolvency; but insolvency of itself was held not to be sufficient, unless bankruptcy was contemplated. The evidence adduced in the case fell short of that. Nor was it clearly shown that "all" his property was assigned, nor that he had not at this moment some interest in the shop in Bond-street.

Mr. Walker said that the evidence fully proved the shop to be in the possession of Mr. Armand.

Mr. Sermon—And it should not be forgotten that the trustees had paid a dividend.

HOLROYD, C. had no doubt that with a little more evidence as to the extent of the property assigned to the trustees under the second deed, an act of bankruptcy would be proved to have been committed by Mr. Moore, but until that was supplied the fiat could not be issued.

Fiat refused.

The Court this day resumed its sittings, to hear cases, for three weeks.

3 & 4 VICT. Cap. 96.

36. And for encouraging masters of vessels, not being post-office packets, to undertake the conveyance of letters, be it enacted, that the postmaster-general may allow to masters of vessels, on letters and newspapers conveyed by them for or on behalf of the post-office between places within the United Kingdom, a sum not exceeding two shillings and sixpence for each and every number of one hundred of such letters and newspapers, and for any less number in the like proportion, and may allow to the masters of vessels bound from the United Kingdom to the East Indies a sum not exceeding one penny for each letter, and one halfpenny for each newspaper conveyed by them for or on behalf of the post-office, and may allow to the masters of all other vessels a sum not exceeding twopence for each letter conveyed by them for or on behalf of the post-office from the United Kingdom to places beyond sea, and may allow to the masters of all vessels not exceeding twopence for each letter brought into the United Kingdom, which they shall deliver at the post-office at the first port at which they touch or arrive, or with which they communicate, (all which gratuities may be paid at such times and places, and under all such regulations and restrictions as the postmaster-general shall in his discretion think fit;) and every master of a vessel outward-bound shall receive on board his vessel every post letter-bag tendered to him for conveyance, and having received the same shall deliver it, on his arrival at the port or place of his destination, without delay; and every master of a vessel inward-bound shall cause all letters on board his vessel (except those belonging to the owners of the vessel, or of the goods on board, which do not exceed the prescribed weights), to be collected and enclosed in some bag or other envelope, and to be sealed with his seal, and to be addressed to any of her Majesty's deputy-postmasters, that they may be in readiness to send on shore by his own boat, or by the pilot boat, or by any other safe and convenient means, in order that the same may be delivered to the first regular post-office which can be communicated with, and at the regular port or place where the vessel shall report, shall sign a declaration in the presence of the person authorized by the postmaster-general at such port or place, who shall also sign the same, and the declaration shall be in the form or to the effect following; (that is to say,)

I, A. B., commander of the [state the name of the ship or vessel], arriving from [state the place], do, as required by law, solemnly declare, that I have, to the best of my knowledge and belief, delivered or caused to be delivered to the post-office every letter-bag, package, or parcel of letters that were on board the [state the name of the ship], except such letters as are exempted by law.'

And no collector, comptroller, or principal officer of the customs, shall permit such vessel to report till such declaration shall be made and produced; and no vessel shall be permitted by any officer of the customs to break bulk, or to make entry in any port of the British dominions, until all letters on board the same shall be delivered to the post-office, where posts are or hereafter may be established, and from whence such letters may be despatched by post, except such letters, commissions, and other matters and things as are exempted by the post-office acts from the exclusive privilege of the postmaster-general, and also except all such letters as shall be brought by a vessel liable to the performance of quarantine, all which last-mentioned letters shall be delivered by the person having possession thereof to the persons appointed to superintend the quarantine, that all proper precautions may be by them taken before the delivery thereof; and when due care has been had therein, the said letters shall be by them despatched in the usual manner by the post; and the principal officer of customs at every port shall search every vessel for letters which may be on board contrary to the post-office acts, and may seize all such letters and forward them to the nearest post-office; and the officer who shall so seize and send them shall be entitled to a moiety of the penalties which shall be recovered for any such offence; and in case an officer of her Majesty's customs shall find a letter superscribed as the letter of an owner or charterer, or consignee or shipper, exceeding the weight herein-before limited, then the officer shall seize so many of the letters as shall reduce the remainder within the proper weight, and he shall take the same to the nearest post-office, and the postmaster of the place shall pay to the officer delivering the same any sum the postmaster-general, with the consent of the Lords of the Treasury, may think fit, not exceeding two shillings and sixpence for every post letter so seized; and the postmaster-general may appoint any person to demand, from the masters of vessels arriving at or off a port of the United Kingdom, all letters on board the same not exempted by the post-office acts; and the master of any such vessel shall forthwith deliver all such letters on board to such person, on his demanding the same.

37. And be it enacted, that the penalty which, by an act passed in the first year of the reign of her present Majesty, intituled "An Act for consolidating the Laws relating to Offences against the Post Office of the United Kingdom, and for regulating the Judicial Administration of the Post Office Laws; and for explaining certain terms and expressions employed in those Laws," is imposed on every master of a vessel outward-bound to Ceylon, the Mauritius, the East Indies, or the Cape of Good Hope, who shall refuse to take a post letter-bag delivered or tendered to him for conveyance by an officer of the post-office, shall henceforth extend and apply to the master of every vessel outward-bound who shall refuse to take a post-letter bag, delivered or tendered to him for conveyance by an officer of the post-office; and that the penalty which, by the said act of the first year of the reign of her present Majesty, is imposed on every master of a vessel who shall refuse or wilfully neglect to make the declaration of having delivered his ship letters to the post-office, as required by an act passed in the first year of the reign of her present Majesty, intituled "An Act for the Regulation of the Duties of Postage," shall henceforth extend and apply to the master of every vessel who shall refuse or wilfully neglect to make the declaration of having delivered his ship's letters to the post-office, as is required by this act; and that the penalty by the said first-mentioned act imposed on every collector, comptroller, or officer of the customs, who by the said last-mentioned act is required to prohibit any vessel reporting until the requisites of such last-mentioned act shall have been complied with, and who shall permit such vessel to report before the requisites of such act shall have been complied with, shall henceforth extend and apply to every collector, comptroller, or officer of the customs who by this act is required to prohibit any vessel reporting until the requisites of this act have been complied with, and who shall permit such vessel to report before the requisites of this act shall have been complied with.

38. And whereas the postmaster-general hath, with the concurrence of the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, made regulations by which the public are enabled to remit small sums of money through the post-office by means of money orders; be it enacted, that such mode of transmitting money through the post-office may have continuance so long as the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury shall see fit; and the postmaster-general is hereby authorized to demand and receive for the use of her Majesty, in respect of such money or money orders, such rates of poundage as, with the consent of the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, he may from time to time consider reasonable, which poundage shall be applied in the same manner as the post-office revenue is or shall be applicable by law; and all such money orders and the payment thereof shall be subject to such regulations and restrictions as the postmaster-general, with the consent of the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, may from time to time direct.

39. And whereas it may be expedient that certain post letters should be registered; be it enacted, that in case the postmaster-general shall at any time deem it expedient that all or any post letters should be registered by the post-office, the postmaster-general may, with the consent of the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, forward letters so registered without charging any additional rate for the registration thereof, or he may charge for any letter so registered such rate of postage, in addition to any other rates payable under the post-office acts, as the postmaster-general, with the consent of the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, shall from time to time direct (but such registration shall not render the postmaster-general or the post-office revenue in any manner liable for the loss of any such post-letters or the contents thereof); and all registered letters shall be delivered to the post-office, and also be delivered by the post-office at or between such hours in the day, and under all such regulations, in every respect, as the postmaster-general shall from time to time appoint; and the postmaster-general may therein require such registration rate to be paid on the letter being put into the post-office.

Fourth, the said printed papers shall be put into the post office at such hours in the day, and under all such regulations, as the Postmaster General may appoint, including therein the payment of postage on such as are going out of the United Kingdom when put into the post office, if the Postmaster General shall so require.

Fifth, all foreign newspapers brought into the United Kingdom under this Act are to be printed in the language of the country from which they shall have been forwarded, unless the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury shall in any case direct that any foreign newspapers shall be exempted from the restriction hereby imposed.

45. And be it enacted, that the Postmaster General may examine any printed paper or any packet which shall be sent by the post, without a cover or in a cover open at the sides, in order to discover whether it is contrary in any respect to the conditions hereby required to be observed, or to any regulations which the Postmaster General, with the consent of the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, may from time to time make in respect of any paper or packet of such a description, and also, in the case of newspapers, to ascertain in what language the newspapers brought into the United Kingdom from any foreign country shall be printed and published; and also in order to discover whether the newspapers printed and published in the United Kingdom (except those printed in Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, Sark, or Man, which, for the purposes of this Act, are to be considered as part of the United Kingdom) are duly stamped; and in case any one of the required conditions has not been fulfilled, the whole of every such paper or packet shall be charged with treble the duty of postage to which it would have been liable as a letter, except as to foreign newspapers not printed in the language of the country from which they shall have been forwarded, which shall be charged with full postage as letters; and as to every such printed paper going out of the United Kingdom, the Postmaster General may either detain the paper or forward the same by the post, charged with treble the duty of postage to which it would have been liable as a letter; and in case a newspaper printed in the United Kingdom (except as aforesaid), and transmitted by the post under this Act, shall appear not to have been duly stamped, the same shall be stopped and sent to the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes.

46. And be it enacted, that in all cases in which a question shall arise whether a printed paper is entitled to the privilege of a newspaper or other printed paper hereby privileged, so far as respects the transmission thereof by the post under the post office Acts, the question shall be referred to the determination of the Postmaster General, whose decision, with the concurrence of the Lords of the Treasury, shall be final.

BANKRUPTCIES IN 1839.

The total number of Bankruptcies in England and Wales, in the last year, was 1083, being an excess over the previous year of 240. Of these there were connected with manufactures, 223; with agriculture, 105; and of other classes, 755. Of the former there were connected with the cotton trade, 51; woollen, 24; silk, 8; and linen, 4; iron wares, 19; building trades, 47; and miscellaneous manufactures, 64. Connected with agriculture there were 5 farmers, 41 corn, hay, and hop dealers, and millers; 23 cattle and wool dealers, 11 dealers in coaches and horses, and 25 brewers, maltsters, and distillers. Of miscellaneous trades there were 114 inn keepers and victuallers, 172 merchants, bankers, warehousemen, agents, and wholesale dealers; 421 shopkeepers, tradesmen, and retail dealers; and 43, not included in any of the above. The greatest number of Bankruptcies, or 259, occurred in Middlesex; and the next, or 246, in Lancashire. In Rutlandshire there were none, and there was but one in the counties of Huntingdon and Westmoreland. In the whole of Wales there were but 17.

ESSAY.

ON THE ENGLISH LAW OF BAILMENTS.

VADIUM OR PAWN.

THERE is a distinction between pawns and mortgages—a pawn is confined to personal property—a mortgage is confined to lands, (a) or as described by FLEMING, C. J. a mortgagee has an absolute interest in the land, whereas the other (the pawnee) has but a special property in the goods to retain them for his security (b). This distinction was very fully explained by BURTON, J. in Ryan v. Rolle, (c) who, after citing the authority from Justinian we have here quoted (d)—Nam Pignoris appellatione eam proprie rem contineri dicimus, quæ simul etiam traditur creditori maxime si mobilis sit; at eam, quæ sine traditione nuda conventiono tenetur, proprie hypothecæ appellatione contineri dicimus, observed,—If this passage stood alone, it might go a great way to prove what it was cited for: but when I produce authorities to show that Pignus is as valid without a delivery as with one, it must be allowed that these passages have been so interpreted, that pignus can only be of goods capable of delivery, and hypotheca of goods not capable of delivery (e).

Delivery is then not of the essence of a pawn in the Roman Law; and other countries adopting the Roman Law have corrected this, that if a pawn be not delivered, it shall not effect a purchaser for a valuable consideration. But if this had been the true distinction, it would have no influence unless the Roman hypotheca and an English Mortgage were of the same nature, which they are not; for an hypotheca gave only a lien and no property, with a right to be satisfied on failure of the condition; a mortgage with us is an immediate conveyance, with a power to redeem, and gives a legal property.

If a man gives an hypotheca or pignus with a condition, that if the money is not paid at a day the pawnee shall enjoy the goods at such a price, that is not in the nature of a pawn, but a sale (f). Si fundum parentes tui ea lege vindiderunt: (ut) sive ipsi, sive hæredes eorum emptori pretium quandocunque, vel intra certa tempora obtulissent, restitueretur; teque parato satisfacere conditioni dictæ, hæres emptori non paret, ut contractus fides servetur, actio prescriptis verbis, vel ex vendito tibi dabitur: habita ratione eorum, quæ post oblatam ex pacto quantitatem ex eo fundo adversarium pervenerunt. This is the description of an English mortgage in the Roman Law, and as to the sale of moveables, Si à te comparavit is, cujus meministi, et convenit, ut si intra certum tempus soluta fuerit data quantitas, sit res inempta, remitti hanc conventionem rescripto nostro non jure petis. Sed si se subtrahat ut jure domini eandem rem retineat: denunciationis et obsignationis depositionisque remedio contra fraudem potes juri tuo consulere. (g)

All that can be argued from the Roman Law with regard to pawns will be foreign to the question, and so will what may be argued from the English Law with regard to pawns, for delivery is of the essence of an English pawn (h), and no authority contradicts these resolutions.

There is scarce any book that treats upon pawns, but considers them as in the possession of the pawnee; as where it is debated whether a pawn may be used, and the difference laid down between a pawn and a distress is, that a distress may not be used because the party in that case comes into possession by act of law, and in the other by the act of the party (i).

The delivery is nothing but the bare custody, and it is not like to a mortgage; for then he that has interest ought to have the money, but in the case of a pledge, it is only a special property in him that takes it, and the general property continues in the first owner, upon tender of the money secured by the pawn by the pawner, the property is returned constantly to the pawner without claim (k).

If after tender of the money to the pawnee and he refuse to return the pledge, the qualified property is determined, and should the pledge be stolen after such tender and refusal the pawner may maintain trover, as the tender and refusal amounted to payment; because otherwise no man could again come to his own, since pawns are over the sale lent; but after recovery of the pledge by an action of trover, the pawnee may, nevertheless, have his action for his debt against the pawner, because though the security ceases, yet the duty remains, inasmuch as the money lent is not paid back to the party from whence it came (l).

The pawn is complete by a delivery, but on a conditional or absolute sale, the sale is complete by the contract, and the party is entitled to a delivery of the goods as soon as he has paid the price (m).

If the pawner make default in payment at the stipulated time, the pawnee has a right to sell the pledge, and this he may do of his own accord, without any previous application to a court of equity (n), or he may the pawner for his debt, retaining the pawn, that being a mere collateral security for the due payment of the debt at the time stipulated. If the pawnee sell the pawn after default made in payment of the money at the time specified, the surplus of the produce after satisfaction of the debt, belongs to the pawner who is liable for any deficiency.

A pawn therefore differs on the one hand from a lien which conveys no right to sell, but only a right to retain till the debt be satisfied, and on the other hand, it differs from a mortgage which conveys the whole legal title conditionally to the mortgagee, and if breach is made in the condition, the title and property in the thing mortgaged becomes absolute at law in the mortgagee, and the mortgagor has only a right in equity to redemption upon payment of the debt, but a pawn conveys only a special property in the thing pawned, the general property is not conveyed, but remains in the owner, (o) and upon default being made in payment of the debt at the time specified, the entire property of the thing pawned does not vest in the pawnee, who only gains, by such default a right to sell the pawn, accounting to the pawner for the surplus beyond the debt, and if the pawnee neglects to exercise that right, the pawner, in whom the general property is vested, may redeem the pawn at any time (p).

Bacon, in observing upon the difference between a pawn and a mortgage, says: There is a great difference between a pawn and mortgage of lands, for if goods be pawned without mention of time for redemption they may be redeemed after the death of the pawnbroker; but if lands are mortgaged without any mention of the time for redemption, they cannot be redeemed after the death of the feoffee in mortgage; for when the feoffment is made to the mortgagee and his heirs, the limitation is absolute and the condition only goes in derogation of that absolute feoffment; so that as far as the condition doth not extend the absolute words in the feoffment must take place; and from hence it is that a condition must be taken strictly, and can never be extended, because since the condition goes in defeasance of the estate absolutely limited, it absolutely must come in to shut out all extended construction; and therefore in this case where the feoffment is made on condition that the feoffor pay so much money to the feoffee, the money must be paid to the feoffee during his life; for money is not limited to be paid to his heirs, and therefore there the words of the absolute feoffment take place; but where goods are pawned the pawnbroker hath but a qualified property, the absolute ownership is in the person that deposits them; and this property cannot be extended beyond the intent for which it was created; and that is only for securing the money lent. For should the property be thus extended it would be to the injury of him that has the absolute ownership. Now the intent of the parties in not limiting a time of redemption, was plainly in ease of the pledger, and therefore the time of redemption must be during his life, (q) and he cannot be confined to the life of the pawnbroker, for that might fall more to the disadvantage of the person pledging than if a time had been limited; and there are no absolute words to induce such a rigorous construction contrary to the design of the parties; but if the pledger doth not redeem during his own life his executors cannot redeem, for then the words and intent both agree to make an absolute property to the pawnbroker. (r)

(q) In such case therefore the statute of Limitations will not attach, 1 Ves. 278.; and if the pledger become bankrupt, his assignee may file a bill in Equity for the redemption of the pledge for being a stranger to what is due, he cannot otherwise ascertain the precise sum he is to tender.—Id.

PROBLEM XXIII. VOL. IV.

SECURITY for COSTS at COMMON LAW.

In what cases will proceedings be stayed until a plaintiff give security for costs?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LEGAL GUIDE.

ANSWER TO PROBLEM 9.—VOL. IV.

What acts amount to a private nuisance?

SIR,—A private nuisance is such as only affects or interferes with an individual in his individual capacity. (Holth. L.D.)

In attempting an answer to this problem, I shall consider first; What is such a nuisance, and second, What is not.

The ten following cases may serve to denote sufficiently the rules as applicable to the first class, commencing with which I may observe, that:—

1. It is such a nuisance, where one person so builds a house as to cause it to overhang that of his neighbour, thereby causing the rain to fall from the former upon the latter (Baten's case, 9 R. 53. 6.)

2. The same rule prevails where a lessee of an upper room so overcharges that room with weight as to cause its falling in upon the room occupied by another person underneath. (Edwards v. Halinder, 2 Leonard. 93.)

3. So is the erection of anything offensive, as a pigstye or limekiln near another person's house, whereby the air in and round the same becomes contaminated. (Adreas' case, 9 Rep. 59.)

4. Where a person pulling down a house does so in a wasteful, negligent, and improvident manner, thereby occasioning greater risk to the owner of an adjoining house than in the ordinary course of performing the work he ought to have incurred (Walters v. Pfeil, M. & M. 365. et vide Mussey v. Goyder 4 C. & P. 161. Brown v. Windsor, 1 Crompton and J. 20. Dodl v. Home, 1 A. & E. 493. Trower v. Chadwick, 3 B. N. C. 334.)

5. Where a person whose land has been excavated to its extremity for mining purposes acquires by lapse of time a right of support from the adjoining land, for a house erected by him on the confines of his own, and the owner of the adjoining land excavates that, whereby the house sinks and becomes endangered. (Partridge v. Scott, 3 M. & W. 220.)

6. Where A. negligently constructed a hayrick at the extremity of his land by the spontaneous ignition of which B.'s house was burnt. It was held in this case that the judge properly left it to the jury to say whether A. had been guilty of gross negligence, viewing his conduct with reference to the caution that a prudent man would have observed (Vaughan v. Menlove, 3 Bingh. new Ca. 488.)

7. Obstructing the free passage of light and air, as, where the owner of adjoining land obstructs the free passage of light to any part of the space occupied by an ancient window which has been enlarged, although a greater portion of light is admitted by the unobstructed part of the enlarged window than was formerly enjoyed. (Chandler v. Thompson, 3 Ca. 80. & see sup. p. 132.)

8. Where A. disturbed B. in the use of a well, by throwing rubbish into it, whereby the water was shallowed, and the well rendered unfit for use. (Taylor v. Bennet, 7 C. & P. 371.)

9. It was also held to be a nuisance where the owner of two adjoining houses granted a lease of one of them to A. and subsequently leased the other, in which there was then certain windows existing, to B., after which the owner granted a new lease to A. who then so altered his tenement as to obstruct windows existing in B.'s house at the time of his lease, although the windows were not 20 years old at the time of the alteration. (Couts v. Gorham, M. & M. 396.)

10. So where a person heightens and builds on a party fence wall, whereby the windows of an adjoining house are darkened, as the Building Act, whilst authorizing the erection of such a wall, did not intend to protect the party from collateral consequences thereof. (Wells v. Odell, 1 M. & W. 452.)

Secondly.—The eleven following cases exist where the obstruction or interruption does not amount to a private nuisance.

1. As for such things as merely abridge the gratification of the plaintiff in the enjoyment of his property, as shutting out the prospect from his windows. (Aldred's Case, 9 Rep.)

2. Where the defendant kept his dogs near the plaintiff's house that his family were prevented from sleeping during the night. (Street v. Tugwell, S. N. P. 147.)

3. An action cannot be maintained for the reasonable use of one's rights though it be to the annoyance of another, as if a butcher, brewer, &c. use his trade in a convenient place. (Co. Dig. Act. on case for nuis. (C.))

4. Where the nuisance complained of began such by the party's own act who complained thereof. (Lawrence v. Obee, 3 Camb. 514.)

5. An action does not lie for pulling down a house whereby the adjoining house falls for want of shoring. (Peyton v. May of London, 9 B. & C. 725.)

6. Nor for digging away land, whereby a house being on adjoining land falls in, provided such house was not an ancient one, and no negligence appeared. (Wyat v. Harrison, 3 B. & Adol. 871. see sup. l. pl. 5.)

7. The owner of land adjoining other land, on which a house had been built, is not liable if within 20 years from the period the house was erected, he works mines under his own land so near its boundary as to cause the excavated land in which the house stands to sink, and the house to be thereby injured. (Partridge v. Scott, ubi sup.)

8. It is no nuisance merely to prevent an excess in the plaintiff's use of his right, as if A. has lights in an ancient house, and rebuilds the house, making lights in other places and larger, (Com. Dig. sup.) as

9. Where E. being owner of a house, enlarged it and inserted a window at one end in the part added, and at another end carried out the side walls, between which two windows had formerly stood in a straight line 5 feet, converting this end into a bow, and inserting two bow windows in the same direction, but not in the same situation as the former. It was held that whatever privilege against obstruction of light the windows of the original house possessed did not apply to the new windows. (Blanchard v. Bridges, 4 Adol. & Ell. 176.)

10. Where there is not such a diminution of light and air as renders the premises less fit for occupation. (Wells v. Oddy, ubi sup.)

11. Where the effect produced by throwing rubbish, &c. into a well is only to render it muddy for a short time an action will not lie. (Taylor v. Bennett, ubi sup.) E. A.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LEGAL GUIDE.

CASE OF FROST THE CHARTIST.

THE JUSTICE OF HIS SENTENCE CONSIDERED.

Sir,—My letter to you inserted in No. 21 of "the Legal Guide" has, it appears, provoked only two answers, one from "E. H." and another from "Candidus," but neither I maintain has removed me from my position.

First then as to E. H.

I admit the length of the argument, and that every thing was said that the very learned counsel who argued the case could address to the court, but still it did not produce an unanimous opinion. What I intended to convey was, that in a case of such very great importance, it behoved the judges to have endeavoured by every possible means to reconcile their opinions, and at least not to have allowed the world to know that they so differed, until they had taken some time to consider every bearing upon which they were at variance, in the hope that the result might have been unanimity; but if that desirable object could not have been attained, then we should all have been more satisfied with the decision of the majority. My great objection was as to the haste with which the opinions were promulgated.

I am perfectly aware that all doubtful points under similar circumstances are settled by a majority.

By a reference to the speech of the Marquis of Normanby (see Legal Guide, 3. 235.) E. H. will perceive that "the difference of opinion amongst the judges on the reserved points opened a door to the consideration of certain other points." It was this difference of opinion that saved the lives of men, relative to whom, so far from being a friend of the prisoner, I most decidedly concur in opinion with the noble Marquis, "that there never was an instance in which the lives of the convicts would have been more justly forfeited."

With respect to "Candidus," I am sure he could not think me serious as to the judges being locked up. I only intended to draw the distinction between the immediate decision of the judges, and the course pursued by those judges towards juries. I do not attempt to draw a parallel between the trial of an issue of fact and the decision of a point of law, because in my opinion, the former is of less importance than the latter; the one frequently having reference only to two or three parties, while the other affects the whole community. I am sure Candidus would not imagine that juries who return unanimous verdicts are always unanimous in opinion; a small minority will give way to a large majority, because they conceive that the many are more likely to be correct than the few. At the same time "I should presume each to be entitled to have a separate common sense opinion of his own." I must still hold, Sir, that in my opinion deliberation is some criterion of wisdom, and even of legal wisdom, as the judges often shew us by taking time to consider a case, when it is evident that at that moment they are not unanimous. Let us recollect that there is a world without the Inns of Court who yet take an interest in legal matters, and that every method should be resorted to in order to convince that world of the extreme purity of the judges of our land. I can assure Candidus that no man can entertain a higher respect for the judges than myself, and it was from a desire of representing what are the opinions of many that I first addressed you. These are days of wonderful improvement, if not intelligence; nothing falls from the judicial seat which is not commented upon, and if the judges differ upon great points, let some plan be devised by which so lamentable an occurrence may be obviated for the future. (1)

I am, Sir, yours, &c. JUSTITIA.

(1) We have not inserted the letter to us signed "Candidus," but we sent it to "Justitia." The principal argument in that letter was the following: — “Surely a parallel was not attempted to be drawn between the trial of an issue of fact, and the decision of a point of law. In the one case unanimity of opinion on the part of the jury is positively enjoined; in the other, (considering the frequent differences of opinion which hourly occur in practical points of law among the most enlightened members of our profession) it could scarcely be expected that on a question, involving such subtle legal intricacies as that under discussion, perfect unanimity should prevail among the fifteen judges, (entitled, I presume, to have each a separate legal opinion of his own,) when the bar and the profession generally were almost to a man divided in opinion on the subject.” Here this discussion must end.

Law Reports.

COURT OF CHANCERY—Feb. 29.

TANNER v. SMITH.

VENDOR and PURCHASER.—Specific performance—Injunction to restrain Action at Law—Time the essence of the Contract—CONDITION of SALE, that Vendor shall be allowed to rescind the Contract upon re-payment of the deposit money without Interest or Costs—an IRRATIONAL STIPULATION.

This bill was filed by the plaintiff on the 4th June, 1839, for the specific performance of an agreement entered into by the defendant at public auction.

The bill stated that the plaintiff, on the 8th February, 1839, put up for sale by public auction, the absolute reversion to some freehold ground rents and property in Hatfield street, Blackfriars road, subject to a life of seventy years, or thereabouts, and also to the following conditions of sale:—

“That the purchaser should pay to the auctioneer a deposit of £15. per cent. on the amount of the purchase money, and sign an agreement for payment of the remainder on or before Lady day then next, when the purchase should be completed, but if from any cause whatever the completion of the purchase should be delayed beyond that time then the purchaser should pay interest upon the residue of such purchase money after the rate of £5. per cent. from that time without prejudice to the vendor's right, under the 8th condition to resell the estate.

“That the vendor would within 20 days after the sale deliver to the purchaser, or his solicitor, an abstract of the title, and on or before Lady day then next would execute a proper conveyance to the purchaser, upon payment of the residue of the purchase money, and that all objections to the title which should not be made in writing to the vendor's solicitor within 10 days after delivery of the abstract should be considered to be waived.

“That the title deeds should remain in the hands of the vendor until all the lots should be sold and conveyed, when they were to be delivered to the largest purchaser in amount of the lots to which they related, who should enter into a proper deed of covenant, for producing and furnishing copies of the same; such deeds to be at the expense of the purchaser requiring the same.

“That all expenses attending the getting in and assigning or surrendering any term of years, whether already assigned to attend the inheritance or not, should be borne and paid by the person requiring the same.

“That all covenants for the production of title deeds or otherwise, were to be prepared and the execution thereof obtained, by and at the expense of the purchaser, requiring the same.

“That all attested, official, or other copies or extracts of deeds, wills, or other documents, whether of record or not; and all certificates, affidavits and declarations, and the production or inspection of any deeds, wills, probates, or other evidence of title, not in the vendor's possession, which should be required either for the purpose of verifying the abstract or otherwise, should be procured by and at the expense of the purchaser requiring the same, who should not require evidence of any births, marriages, deaths, times of death, intestacy, heirship, survivorship, matter of pedigree, failure of issue, representation or other fact, where the same should have been stated, taken notice of, or recognised in any deed or document, bearing date upwards of 35 years ago.

“That no purchaser should require any other identity of the different lots than that which the title deeds and documents, in the vendor's possession, should disclose.

“That in case any purchaser should raise objections to the title, not provided for by the conditions, and which the vendor should not be able or willing to remove, and the purchaser should insist upon such objections, the vendor should be at liberty by writing under his hand to rescind the contract, on repaying to such purchaser the deposit money, without interest or costs.”

The defendant attended the sale and became the purchaser of several lots at £3,300. He paid deposit of £496. 10s to the auctioneer, and signed the usual agreement to complete the purchase and abide by the conditions of sale on his part.

On the 27th February, 1839, the plaintiff delivered the abstract of title, and on the 9th March, the defendant considering that the ten days was to be computed, exclusive of the day of delivery of the abstract, delivered his objections to the title, among these objections were the following: That the abstract was not a perfect and proper abstract, being defective in many very important particulars, and amongst others because various deeds and wills referred to were not abstracted; beside many other defects. That the conditions of sale were of a very improper and depreciating character, and such as under the trust deed for sale, under which the property was put up to auction, ought not to have been made.

That none of the title deeds, writings, or other documents, through or by which the title to the premises is professed to be deduced, nor is any statement furnished where the same are to be respectively seen and may be examined, nor whether they will be delivered up to the purchaser; and if not delivered up who will covenant for their production; and that there is not upon the title any valid covenant for the production of any of them.

That there is no evidence of the identity of the estates sold; and that it does not appear that those mentioned in the abstract are the same as those sold.

That although the purchaser has delivered the above objections within the ten days from the receipt of the abstract, yet that as such abstract is not a proper and perfect abstract, he protests against being considered as admitting himself to be under any obligation to deliver objections within that or any other particular time, and therefore claimed and reserved to himself the full right of taking all other objections to which the title was or might be in any manner open, should it become necessary or advisable for him so to do, and having delivered the above objections, not because he considered himself, under the circumstance, in any manner bound by the condition of title to take objections within ten days from the delivery of the imperfect abstract received.

But from a desire to prevent useless trouble, discussion, and expense, and to satisfy the vendors at once, that they have not delivered a proper abstract, or shewn a good title, and that there is little if any probability that they will be able to do so, as indeed they must have been aware when they sold; and the purchaser therefore required that his deposit money might be forthwith repaid to him; and that unless it was returned, he would hold the vendors responsible, not only for interest on his deposit, but also for all his costs, charges, and losses, as well those already incurred; and will consider and treat the condition and sale by which it was stipulated, in case of objections being taken and not removed, that the vendors might rescind the contract on repaying to the purchaser his deposit money without interest or costs, as fraudulent and void. On the 12th March following, the vendors offered to furnish the defendant with an amended abstract of title in a few days, and that from its delivery they would extend the time for making objections to the title to a further ten days. On the 3rd April, the objections made to the title not having been removed by the plaintiff, the defendant brought an action for the recovery of the deposit money. On the 9th May following the plaintiff delivered a further abstract of title to the defendant's solicitors. On the 13th May a plea was put in to the action at law. On the 24th May the defendant replied, and delivered the issue, with notice of trial. The bill charged that the defendant had accepted the title, and that he was not now at liberty to raise objections thereto, and prayed a specific performance of the agreement of sale, and for an injunction to restrain the action at law. On the 15th June, 1839, the defendant put in his answer. On the 12th December following, the plaintiff amended his bill, and prayed a reference of the title to the Master.

The motion for the injunction to restrain the proceedings in the action at law came on to be heard on the 15th January last, when the VICE-CHANCELLOR observed, upon the various proceedings that had taken place, as stated in the bill, and said, that unless the conditions of sale were to be impeached, the injunction must go as a matter of course. The vendors sold under a power of sale in a mortgage deed, and he did not think the condition, in the event of the plaintiff being unwilling or unable to remove any objections made to the title, he should be at liberty to rescind the contract on repaying to the purchaser the deposit money without interest or costs, to be an unreasonable condition, or one which the purchaser would object to; and His HONOUR granted the injunction as prayed.

The defendant appealed from this order of the VICE-CHANCELLOR.

Mr. Wigram now appeared to support the appeal, and contended that the action ought to proceed, that time was of the essence of the contract; (Doloret v. Rothschild) (a), and that great injury would otherwise be done to the defendant, as he was liable to pay £5. per cent interest on the purchase-money while the contract continued open. It had been stipulated that an abstract should be delivered within twenty days, and objections taken within ten days after; but an incomplete abstract had been given, which was equivalent to no abstract at all. He submitted, therefore, that the Court would not upon motion try a question involving the merits of the cause. He cited Parker v. Frith (b), Lloyd v. Collett (c), Radcliffe v. Warrington (d).

Mr. Richards, for the vendor, contended that time was not of the essence of the contract, and that if the abstract, as delivered, was objected to, the plaintiff was at liberty to offer a further one. The injunction as allowed by the VICE-CHANCELLOR ought to stand; and the deposit being in the hands of the auctioneer, he thought the Court would order it to be paid into court.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said, he had repeatedly experienced the inconvenience of arguing the merits of a cause upon motion, and he would do all in his power to discourage the practice. The Court had been occupied during seven hours in discussing whether a deposit should be in the hands of one man or another until the hearing. The conditions of sale were of such a nature as he had not met with before; but he was not about to decide upon the effect of them now; he, however, would not interfere with the action, for one of the conditions seemed very oppressive—namely, that if the objections made to the title were such as could not be got rid of, the vendor was at liberty to rescind the contract, and repay the money without interest or costs. But when, how, or in what circumstances this was to be done the contract did not show. The vendor had reserved this benefit to himself, which seemed so irrational a stipulation, that perhaps the VICE-CHANCELLOR thought the objections should be confined to the original abstract. His Honour might have ordered the money into Court, for in such a contract as this, if the deposit is to be allowed to remain in the hands of the vendor or the auctioneer, much injustice might be done to the purchaser. As to the condition, if the vendor shall be unable or unwilling to remove the objections made to the title, and the purchaser should insist upon such objections, that then the vendor should be at liberty to rescind the contract without payment of interest or costs, the vendor gives himself the power to deal with the purchaser as he pleases; and, surely, nothing can be more unjust. But what is meant by these objections? Are they to apply to the first abstract delivered, or to the second? The condition for the delivery of the abstract states that the vendor will deliver an abstract within twenty days after the sale; and that the objections (if any) made to it are to be delivered within ten days after such delivery. I think the defendant has a legal right to recover his deposit money, and it would be inequitable for the Court to interfere with his legal rights.

Sittings in Banco.

HEBBLEWHITE v. M'MORINE.

JOINT STOCK COMPANIES.—A deed executed in blank void at the Common Law.

TRANSFERS OF SHARES in blank for the name of a transferee to be inserted after execution void at Law.

We have before reported this case at the min prius trial under the title of "Tubblewhite v. M'Morris" (a) and subsequently corrected (b). The question in this case turned upon the legal transfer of 50 shares in the London and Brighton Railway Company, which the defendant had contracted to purchase, at the trial the plaintiff had a verdict for the amount claimed (c).

Mr. Alexander subsequently obtained a rule for a new trial which was argued in Michaelmas term.

The Company had obtained an Act of Parliament, 1 Vict. c. 119, by which they are required from time to time, to cause the names and additions of the several persons who shall from time to time become entitled to shares in the said undertaking, with the number of shares to which they are respectively entitled, and also the proper name by which every share shall be distinguished to be fairly and distinctly entered in a book to be kept by the said company; and after such entry made to cause the common seal to be affixed thereto. And the said company shall from time to time cause a certificate or ticket, with the common seal of the said company affixed thereto, to be delivered to every such proprietor on demand, specifying the share or shares to which he is entitled in the said undertaking, and every such certificate or ticket shall be admitted in all courts whatever, as prima facie evidence of the title of such respective proprietors, their successors, executors, administrators, or assigns, to the share or shares therein; but the want of the said tickets shall not hinder or prevent the proprietor of any of the said shares for selling or disposing thereof, and provides that it shall be lawful for the several proprietors of the shares of the said undertaking, and their respective executors, and administrators, and successors, to sell and dispose of any shares to which they shall be entitled therein, subject to the rules and regulations there-mentioned, and directs, "that on every such sale the deed or conveyance (being executed by the seller and purchaser) shall be kept by the said company, or by the secretary or clerk of the said company, who shall enter a memorial of such sale or transfer as above, to be kept for that purpose, and endorse the entry of such memorial of such sale or transfer, and also on demand, make an indorsement of such transfer on the certificate of each share so sold, and deliver the same to the purchaser for his security, and each indorsement shall be considered in every respect the same as a new certificate, and until such memorial shall have been made and entered, the seller of the share shall remain liable to all future calls, and the purchaser shall have no part or share of the profits of the said undertaking, nor any interest in respect of such profits, as a proprietor of the said undertaking." and the 157th section provides "that no person or corporation shall sell or transfer any share, which he or they shall possess in the said undertaking, after any call shall have been made for any sum of money in respect of such share, unless he or they at the time of such sale or transfer shall have paid the full sum of money which shall have been called for in respect of such share.

The plaintiff and defendant had entered into the following contract:—

"Mr. Hebblewhite,
"Sir,—I have this day purchased from you 50 shares in the Brighton Railway Company, which are transferred, delivered, and paid for on or before the 1st day of March, 1839, or at any intermediate date that I may require them, by giving you for the said shares, at per share, together with all calls that may have been paid on the same; you hereby binding yourself, your heirs, executors, and assigns, to execute to me, or to my nominee, or nominees, a legal transfer of the said shares, for which I am to make payment to your order before the 1st day of March, 1839. It is understood and agreed that I shall be entitled to all new shares that may accrue, or be appropriated to the holder of the said 50 shares. It is also agreed, if the payment be not made on the 1st day of March, 1839, that you shall have full power to resell the said 50 shares at any price, at cost or risk, claiming from me any deficiency, and accounting to me for any surplus that may arise from the re-sale of them.—I am, &c.

"GEO. M'MORINE."

The question left for the jury by GURNEY, B. (who tried the cause) was, whether the plaintiff was a proprietor of the shares, and whether he was such before the transfer.

PARKE, B. now gave the judgment of THE COURT, and observed that three objections were made at the trial of the cause; first, that the plaintiff was incapable of executing a transfer of the shares on the 1st of March, Mr. Pritchard being on that day the owner of them; secondly, that the calls due not having been paid before the day of the transfer, such transfer was void by the Company's statute (s. 157); thirdly, that the conveyance tendered was void at common law, on the ground that at the time of its execution by Mr. Pritchard, a blank was left for the name of the transferee. The Court confined itself to the last objection, and referred to Texiera v. Evans, (d) in which LORD MANSFIELD held, that a bond was valid that was given with the name of the obligee, sum in blank, in opposition to which is Comyns Dig. (e) where it is said, if a deed be signed and sealed, and is afterwards written, it is no deed. This in truth was an attempt to make a deed negotiable like a bill of exchange, which the law does not allow. The Company's act requires all transfers to be by deed—this transfer was made in blank for the name of the transferee, to be inserted after it was executed, and is void at the common law. (f)

Rule made absolute for a new trial.

COSTS.—PRACTICE.—Judges' intention to certify to deprive a plaintiff of Costs under 43 Eliz. c. 6. s. 2.—Whether the Postea should be delivered out before the Certificate is granted.

Mr. Mansel moved for a rule to shew cause why the two following orders of Mr. BARON GURNEY should not be set aside.

"I order that the plaintiff's attorney forthwith produce before me the Record of Nisi Prius and the Postea in this cause for the purpose of indorsing thereon my certificate, pursuant to the Statute 43 Eliz. c. 6. s. 2. (a) that the taxation of (See Hullock, 19, 27; Walker v. Robinson, 2 Str. 1232; 1 Will. 93, S.C. Howard v. Cheshire Say, 260; Dand v. Sexton, 3 T. R. 37). costs herein be set aside; that it be referred back to the master to review his taxation with reference to the same certificate; that the judgment signed be altered as to the payment of costs, and that the plaintiff refund to the defendant the sum of £29. part of the damages and costs paid under protest."

The other order was to the same effect, with this addition, "that the defendant should pay to the plaintiff such costs as the plaintiff had incurred, by reason of the defendant not having applied to the associate to draw up the order before judgment was signed and the costs taxed."

It appeared that the cause had been tried before Mr. Baron Gurney, when the plaintiff had a verdict for one shilling damages, and his lordship stated (upon application being made for the purpose), his intention to certify to deprive the plaintiff of costs under the Statute 43 Eliz. c. 6. s. 2. That the plaintiff afterwards got the Postea which was indorsed, "Verdict for the plaintiff one shilling, costs 40 shillings," but the judge had not certified. The master taxed the costs in the usual manner, and the defendant paid them under protest.

Mr. Mansel insisted upon his judgment, upon the ground that, there could be no certificate after the final judgment, and cited Whalley v. Williamson. (b)

Mr. Mansel then cited Godson v. Lloyd (d), and Redit v. Lucock (e).

LORD ABINGER, C. B. stopped Mr. Cole, who appeared to shew cause against the rule, and observed, that as the plaintiff had obtained the postea without the certificate of the judge, and final judgment had been signed, he did not see how the Court could interfere.

COURT OF REVIEW.—August 1.

FIAT against — FRANKS.

PETITION of the OFFICIAL ASSIGNEE. OFFICIAL ASSIGNEE.—Their liability—Optional in an official assignee to let his name made use of in an action without an Indemnity.

This was a petition of Mr. Abbott, the official assignee, for an injunction to restrain the creditors' assignees from proceeding with an action for the recovery of one-third of a sum of £101. The petitioner was appointed official assignee in July, 1838, when Thomas Gurney and Henry Phillips were chosen by the creditors, who selected Mr. Hudson as solicitor to the firm. In December following an action was commenced against Thomas Hopper, by direction of the creditors' assignees, to recover certain property. The petitioner, on being named as co-plaintiff, asked an indemnity, when Mr. Hudson pledged himself by letter to make no personal charge, and he consented. A verdict for the defendant was given on the trial, with costs amounting to £95., for which a levy was made on the goods of the creditors' assignees. On the petitioner's refusing to pay one-third of the sum, an action was brought and declaration delivered. The petitioner had only in hand a sum of £9. 12s. belonging to the bankrupt's estate, which he tendered to the Court on being asked for its intervention on his behalf.

Mr. Craig opposed the application, upon the signature to the authority and declaration for bringing the action by the petitioner himself, who became an active party and intervened in the nomination of counsel. The costs to be recovered were not for Mr. Hudson's benefit, but were the costs of the defendant, to which the alleged indemnity could not extend. The creditors' assignees only asked the petitioner to contribute to the extent of his receipts from the bankrupt's estate. As this proposal had not been accepted, and as the petitioner had pleaded to the action which stood for trial on the 3rd instant at the Guilford assizes, they relied on the forbearance of the court from interference.

CROSS, J. said, it was optional in an official assignee to allow the use of his name without an indemnity; and it was to be regretted that the petitioner had ventured on that course in the present instance. A court of law would make no distinction between assignees. The petitioner not only appeared to have acquiesced, but in general, final, if the judge shall order to certify, and the Court will not interfere with the assizes, except in cases not within the statute, and in which the judge had no power to certify. (Whalley v. Williamson, 4 Dowl. 157; Gore v. Forall, 4 Dowl. 157.)

have acted voluntarily; whereas, had he appeared in the first instance, the court would have interfered before costs were incurred. He had undertaken to accept short notice for trial, and on that ground alone, he thought it was his duty not to interfere.

Petition dismissed with costs.

PREROGATIVE COURT.—July 21.

WILL of MARY ROBERTS.

Will dated and SIGNED in PENCIL.—Whether entitled to Probate, or to be regarded as a deliberative paper merely.

The deceased Mary Roberts had made her will in her own hand-writing, dated in 1836, which she bequeathed a very large property. The will was dated and signed by the testatrix in pencil. She died in April, 1839, without executing the will, or perfecting the date and signature, and probate was granted to the executor.

Mary Evans, one of the next of kin of the deceased, cited the executor to bring in the probate, and to prove the due execution of the will according to the Statute of Wills.

Dr. Phillimore opposed the paper, and observed, that the only question was, whether the presumption of law against an unfinished paper had been in this case repelled, or whether it was to be regarded as a deliberative paper merely. Decree for the probate to the executor.

3 & 4 VICT. Chap. 96.

47. And for providing for the transmission of newspapers between the United Kingdom and foreign countries free of postage, when satisfactory proof shall be laid before the Postmaster General that British newspapers addressed either to a person or to a place within a foreign country, and also that newspapers addressed to a person or a place in the United Kingdom from such foreign country, are respectively allowed to pass by the post within that country free of postage; be it enacted, that the Postmaster General may, with the consent of the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, transmit by the post British newspapers addressed to a person or to a place in such foreign country from the United Kingdom, to any port out of the United Kingdom, other than her Majesty's Colonies and possessions, free from postage; and he may, with the like consent, receive from such foreign country foreign newspapers free from postage, or he may, with the like consent, charge for every newspaper transmitted to or received from a foreign country a rate of postage which he may consider equivalent to the rates of postage payable in that country on newspapers either transmitted from or received in that country, but in all cases, whether the newspaper be transmitted free or otherwise, subject to a sea postage of one penny, payable on the newspaper being put into the post office, for every newspaper delivered at the post office to be conveyed by vessels not being post office packets, and also to a like postage for every newspaper received by vessels not post office packets, addressed to a person or to a place within the United Kingdom.

48. And whereas by reason of the postage which may be charged on newspapers in foreign countries, or from other circumstances, it may be expedient again to impose the rates of two-pence on newspapers; be it enacted, that the Postmaster General, with the consent of the Lords of the Treasury, may again charge and demand the said respective rates of two-pence on newspapers received from and sent to any foreign country.

49. And be it enacted, that the Postmaster General, with the consent of the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, may allow Colonial newspapers to pass by the post between places within any of her Majesty's Colonies, or by packet boat or private ship, from one colony to another colony, whether through the United Kingdom or not; and also allow foreign newspapers to pass through the United Kingdom either to her Majesty's Colonies or from one foreign country to another foreign country, by packet boat or private ship; and also allow British newspapers to be sent to the Colonies through a foreign country, and Colonial newspapers to be sent through a foreign country, to the United Kingdom, or through the United Kingdom to a foreign country, free of postage, or subject to such rates of postage and under all such regulations and restrictions as the Postmaster General, with such consent as aforesaid, may think fit.

50. And be it enacted, that every British newspaper sent by the post to places out of the United Kingdom shall in all cases be put into a post office or receiving office in the United Kingdom within seven days next after the day on which the same shall be published, the day of publication to be ascertained by the date of such paper; and in case a paper shall be put into a post office after the expiration of such seven days, the Postmaster General may either detain the paper, or forward it by post charged with full postage as a letter.

51. And be it enacted, that in case any person to whom a printed newspaper brought into the United Kingdom shall be directed shall have removed from the place to which it shall be directed, before the delivery thereof at that place, it may (provided it shall not have been opened) be re-directed and forwarded by post to such person at any other place within the United Kingdom free of charge for such extra conveyance; but if the newspaper shall have been opened, it shall be charged with the same rate as if it were a letter from the place of re-direction to the place at which it shall be ultimately delivered.

52. And be it enacted, that the Postmaster General may allow the masters of vessels, other than packet boats, a sum not exceeding one penny on every printed newspaper, foreign or colonial, brought into the United Kingdom from a port or place out of the United Kingdom, and delivered by them at the post office of the post town at which they shall touch or arrive, and a sum not exceeding one penny on every printed newspaper conveyed by them for or on behalf of the post office from the United Kingdom to any port or place out of the same, in respect of which no gratuity is herein-before authorized to be allowed.

53. And be it enacted, that the following classes of persons may both send and receive letters, not exceeding half an ounce in weight, by the post, on their own private concerns, at a postage of one penny for each letter; (namely,)

Every seaman employed in her Majesty's Navy, whether at home or abroad, whilst such seaman shall be actually employed in her Majesty's service.

Every serjeant, corporal, drummer, trumpeter, fifer, and private soldier in her Majesty's regular forces, militia, fencible regiments, artillery, or royal marines, whether at home or abroad, whilst actually employed in her Majesty's service.

Every serjeant, corporal, drummer, trumpeter, fifer, and private soldier in the service of the East India Company whilst actually employed in the service of the Company.

But the letters of commissioned officers or warrant officers, whether in the army or navy, or midshipmen, or master's mates of the navy, are not included in this provision.

And with respect to letters sent by any such privileged persons, the following conditions shall be observed; (that is to say,) the postage of each letter (unless sent from parts beyond the seas, as herein-after mentioned,) shall be paid (or the letter, if posted within the United Kingdom, shall be duly and properly stamped,) on being put into a post office established under the authority of the Postmaster General; and upon such letter shall be superscribed the name of the writer, and his class or description in the vessel, regiment, corps, or detachment to which he shall belong; and upon every such letter there shall be written in the handwriting of and signed by the officer having at the time the command of the vessel, or of the regiment, corps, or detachment to which the privileged person belongs, the name of such officer and the name of such vessel, or such regiment, corps, or detachment.

And with respect to letters received by the said privileged persons, the following conditions shall be observed; the postage of each letter (unless sent from parts beyond the seas as herein-after mentioned) shall be paid (or the letter, if posted within the United Kingdom, shall be duly and properly stamped) upon putting it into a post office established under the authority of the Postmaster General, and it shall be directed to the privileged person, qualifying on the superscription thereof the vessel, or the regiment, corps, or detachment to which he shall belong; and the deputy postmaster of the place to which such letter shall be sent to be delivered shall not deliver such letter to any person except the person hereby privileged, or to whom it shall be directed, or to some person appointed to receive the same, or to some person under the hand of the commanding officer.

And whenever the letter shall be sent by any such privileged person, it shall be so from parts beyond the seas without the said postage of one penny being pre-paid, every such letter shall be charged to the party receiving the same with a rate of two-pence; and any letters received by the post under this enactment by any such privileged persons which may have been re-directed, shall not be charged any postage on or in respect of such re-direction.

54. And be it enacted, that any such privileged persons may both send and receive letters, not exceeding half an ounce in weight, by private ships, between the United Kingdom and places beyond the seas, on their own private concerns, at the like postage for each letter, and subject to the like conditions and regulations, in all respects, as are herein-before mentioned in respect of letters sent and received by any such privileged persons by the post; but whenever the letters sent or received by any such privileged persons shall be conveyed, or be intended to be conveyed, by private ships, the gratuities payable by law to the masters of such vessels in respect of such letters shall in all cases be paid at the Post Office in addition to such postage.

55. And be it enacted, that the said privilege shall not extend to any letters liable to any foreign rates of postage.

56. And be it enacted, that, except in the cases herein specified, all privileges whatsoever of sending letters by the post free of postage, or at a reduced rate of postage, shall wholly cease and determine.

57. And be it enacted, that the Postmaster General may at any time hereafter charge, for the use of her Majesty, on all letters, newspapers, and other printed papers sent by the post, on which the postage shall not be pre-paid, and which shall not be duly and properly stamped, and also on all letters sent by the post without being duly and properly stamped, although the postage thereon shall be wholly or in part prepaid, such higher rates of postage than would otherwise by law be payable on such letters, newspapers, or other printed papers as the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury by warrant under their hands shall from time to time deem expedient, and may also remit any of the rates of British postage or inland postage for the time being payable by law on the transmission of post letters, newspapers, or other printed papers, to such extent as the Lords of the Treasury shall from time to time direct.

58. And whereas communications may from time to time be opened with foreign post offices, which may render an alteration in the rates of postage expedient; be it enacted, that it shall be lawful for the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury from time to time, and at any time after the passing of this Act, by warrant under their hands, to alter and fix any of the rates of British postage or inland postage payable by law on the transmission by the post of foreign or colonial letters or newspapers, or of any other printed papers, and to subject the same to rates of postage according to the weight thereof, and a scale of weight to be contained in such warrant, and from time to time, by warrant as aforesaid, to alter or repeal any such altered rates, and make and establish any new or other rates in lieu thereof, and from time to time, by warrant as aforesaid, to appoint at what time the rates which may be payable are to be paid, and the power hereby given to alter and fix rates of postage shall extend to any increase or reduction, or remission of postage.

59. And be it enacted, that the rates of postage from time to time to become payable under or by virtue of any warrant of the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, under this Act, shall be charged by and be paid to her Majesty's Postmaster General, for the use of her Majesty, on all post letters, newspapers, or other printed papers to which such warrant shall extend; and that in all cases in which any rates of postage shall be made payable under any such warrant, every such warrant shall be published in the London Gazette, and shall, within fourteen days after making the same, be laid before both Houses of Parliament (if then sitting), or otherwise within fourteen days after Parliament shall re-assemble; provided that any rates made payable by any such warrant may be demanded and taken immediately after they shall have been so published in the London Gazette, although the same shall not then have been laid before Parliament.

60. And be it enacted, that in all cases in which the postage of any unstamped letter shall not have been paid by the sender, it shall be paid by the person to whom the letter is addressed, on the delivery thereof to him; but if the letter be refused, or the party to whom it is addressed shall be dead, or cannot be found, the writer or sender shall pay the postage; and this enactment shall apply to every packet, newspaper, and thing whatsoever chargeable with postage, which shall be transmitted by the post.

61. And be it enacted, that it shall be lawful for the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury to make any reduction, or increase, or alteration they may consider expedient, in the gratuities allowed by this Act to masters of vessels for letters and newspapers conveyed by them for or on behalf of the post office, or delivered by them to the post office; and to allow and authorize such gratuities for the conveyance of letters and newspapers to masters of vessels passing to or from or between any of Her Majesty's colonies or possessions beyond the seas, as they shall think fit.

and also to allow and authorise any gratuities to be paid to pilots, seamen, or others, on the letters and newspapers they may bring to any post office from any vessels.

62. And be it enacted, that no person shall post or cause to be posted, or send or cause to be sent, or tender or deliver in order to be sent by the post, any letter containing any explosive or other dangerous material or substance, and no such letter shall be forwarded by the post.

63. And be it enacted, that all post letters shall be posted, forwarded, conveyed, and delivered, under and subject to all such orders, directions, and regulations, and under and subject to all such conditions, limitations, and restrictions as to the form, size, dimensions, enclosures, or otherwise, as the Postmaster General, with the consent of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, shall from time to time direct.

64. And to prevent disputes as to the limits of post towns within which letters are to be delivered by the post; be it enacted, that it shall be lawful for the Postmaster General, from time to time, in all cases in which he shall deem the same expedient, by writing under his hand, to fix and declare the limits of any post town within the United Kingdom or other Her Majesty's dominions, which shall be binding and conclusive on all persons whomsoever.

65. And be it enacted, that it shall be lawful for the Postmaster General, or any of his officers, to detain any post letter suspected to contain any contraband goods, and forward the same to the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Customs, who, in the presence of the person to whom the same may be addressed, or in his absence, in case of non-attendance, after notice in writing from the said Commissioners requiring his attendance, left at or forwarded by the post according to the address on the letter, may open and examine the same; and in case, on any such examination, any contraband goods shall be discovered, the said Commissioners may detain the letter and its contents for the purpose of prosecution; and if no contraband goods shall be discovered in such letter, the same shall, if the party to whom the same is addressed be present, be handed over to him on his paying the postage (if any) charged thereon; or, if he shall not be present, the same shall be returned to the post office, and be forwarded to the place of its address.

66. And for the more effectual prosecution of offences committed against the post office, be it enacted, that in any indictment or criminal letters of an felon and Gete the name or addition of any such Postmaster General; and that whenever, in any indictment or criminal letters for any offence committed against the post office Acts, it shall be necessary to mention for any purpose whatever Her Majesty's Postmaster General, it shall be sufficient to describe such Postmaster General as "Her Majesty's Postmaster General," without any further or other name, addition, or description whatsoever.

67. And to enable the Postmaster General for the time being to hold and take conveyances and leases of messuages, tenements, lands, and hereditaments for the service of the post office, and to transmit the same to his successors, be it enacted, that for such purpose her Majesty's Postmaster General and his successors shall be and is and are hereby made a body corporate, and shall have a seal; and that all messuages, tenements, lands, and hereditaments, of whatsoever nature and tenure, now vested in her Majesty's present Postmaster General, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, in trust for her Majesty and her successors, shall immediately on the passing of this act become vested in him in his corporate capacity, and his successors for ever, in trust as aforesaid.

68. And be it enacted, that so much of an Act passed in the fifty-ninth year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Third, intituled "an Act to amend an Act passed in the fifty-fifth year of the reign of his present Majesty, for granting to his Majesty the sum of twenty thousand pounds towards repairing roads between London and Holyhead by Chester, and between London and Bangor by Shrewsbury, and for giving additional powers to the Commissioners therein named to build a bridge over the Menai Straits, and to make a new road from Bangor Ferry to Holyhead in the county of Anglesea," as authorizes and imposes additional rates of postage to be charged and levied on letters and packets conveyed by post by way of Dublin and Holyhead; and so much of an Act passed in the first and second years of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Fourth, intituled "an Act for applying a certain sum of money out of the consolidated fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland for the purpose of building a bridge over the river Conway in the county of Carnarvon, and for imposing additional rates of postage on letters and packets conveyed by post by way of bridge," as authorizes and imposes additional let for vesting in commissioners the bridges now building over the Menai Straits and the River Conway, the harbours of Howth and Holyhead, and the road from Dublin to Howth, and for the further improvement of the road from London to Holyhead," as enacts that the additional rates of postage granted by the said Act of the fifty-ninth year of the reign of King George the Third shall be continued to be charged and received; and so much of an Act passed in the sixth year of the reign of his late Majesty King William the Fourth, intituled "an Act for granting an additional rate of postage on letters between Great Britain and Ireland by way of Milford and Waterford," as authorizes and requires additional rates of postage to be charged and levied on letters conveyed by post by way of Milford and Waterford; and so much of any other Act or Acts as authorize or require any additional rates to be charged and levied on letters to and from Ireland by way of Holyhead in respect of Menai Bridge, by way of Conway in respect of Chester in respect of Conway Bridge, and by way of Milford and Waterford; and so much of an Act passed in the first year of the reign of her present Majesty, intituled "an Act for the management of the post office," as directs the respective post office Receivers-general of England and Ireland to distinguish in their accounts the respective additional rates of postage granted in respect of the Menai and Conway bridges, on letters conveyed by way of Milford and Waterford, and to the payment of the amount thereof into the Exchequer; and so much of an Act passed in the first year of the reign of her present Majesty, intituled "an Act to repeal the several laws relating to the post office," as repeals any part of an Act passed in the third year of the reign of King George the Fourth, intituled "an Act to amend the general laws now in being relating to turnpike roads in that part of Great Britain called England," and as repeals any part of an Act passed in the fourth year of the reign of King George the Fourth, intituled "an Act to explain and amend an Act passed in the third year of the reign of his present Majesty, to amend the general laws now in being for regulating turnpike roads in that part of Great Britain called England;" and also an Act passed in the first year of the reign of her present Majesty, intituled "an Act for the regulation of the duties of postage;" and an Act passed in the last session of Parliament, intituled "an Act for regulating the sending and receiving of letters and packets by the post free from the duty of postage;" and so much of any other Act or Acts in force as authorize the sending or receiving of letters and packets by the post free from the duty of postage; and also an Act passed in the first year of the reign of her present Majesty, intituled "an Act to impose rates of packet postage on East India letters, and to amend certain Acts relating to the post office," excepting so much thereof as authorizes the payment out of the revenue of the post office of any deficiency in the superannuation fund for old and infirm letter carriers; and also an Act passed in the first and second years of the reign of her present Majesty, intituled "an Act for imposing rates of postage on the conveyance of letters by packet boats between places in the Mediterranean and other ports;" and also the hereinbefore recited Act passed in the last session of Parliament, intituled "an Act for the further regulation of the duties on postage until the fifth day of October one thousand eight hundred and forty," and the several treasury warrants issued in pursuance of the said last-mentioned Act, shall be and the same are hereby repealed and rescinded, except as to any act done or performed, or any appointment made, or any power, authority, or consent given or granted under or by virtue of the said recited Acts, or any of them respectively, or by or in pursuance of the said treasury warrants, and except in respect of any postage duties which may have become payable under or by virtue of any of the said Acts or treasury warrants hereby repealed and rescinded, or any proceedings for recovery of such duties, and except also as to any offence committed against the provisions of the said Acts hereby repealed, or any other Acts, and any fine or penalty incurred by reason of any such offence, or any proceeding for recovery of any such fine or penalty, or for the punishment of any offender.

69. Provided always, and be it enacted, that it shall be lawful for the commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, in their discretion to authorize and empower the Receiver-general of the Post-office in England from time to time to pay to the receipt of her Majesty's Exchequer, out of the revenue of the Post-office, by quarterly, half-yearly, or annual payments, as the commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury may think fit, such an annual sum or sums of money as they may deem equivalent to the annual amount of the additional rates of postage which were payable under the said recited Act passed in the sixth year of the reign of King William the Fourth, up to the time of the suspension of the said rates, which annual sum or sums shall be calculated and fixed on an average of the produce of the said additional rates for three years up to the time at which the same were suspended; and the said sum or sums shall be paid accordingly for and on account of the National Road fund, and shall be carried to the consolidated fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and be applied to the said fund; and so much of any Act or Acts in force as authorize the sending or receiving of letters and packets by the post free from the duty of postage, shall be and the same are hereby repealed and rescinded, except as to any act done or performed, or any appointment made, or any power, authority, or consent given or granted under or by virtue of the said recited Acts, or any of them respectively, or by or in pursuance of the said treasury warrants hereby repealed and rescinded, or any proceedings for recovery of such duties, and except also as to any offence committed against the provisions of the said Acts hereby repealed, or any other Acts, and any fine or penalty incurred by reason of any such offence, or any proceeding for recovery of any such fine or penalty, or for the punishment of any offender.

by law if the same had not been suspended or repealed.

70. And be it enacted, that wherever the warrant of the commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury is required by this Act, such warrant may be under the hands of the commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, or any three of them; and that whenever the order, consent, authority, or direction of the commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury is prescribed by this Act, such order, consent, authority, or direction (not being by warrant) may be signified either under the hands of the commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, or any three of them, or under the hand of one of their secretaries or assistant-secretaries.

SPOILED STAMPS.

Directions of the COMMISSIONERS of STAMPS and TAXES for the FUTURE ALLOWANCE of SPOILED STAMPS in the COUNTRY.

These directions were given in consequence of a letter addressed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, complaining of the expense to which persons residing in the country are subjected in obtaining an allowance of spoiled stamps by being required to make the affidavit before a Master extraordinary in Chancery, when a stamp duty of 2s 6d is payable in respect thereof, besides the Master's fees.

"Office for Stamps and Taxes, London, Aug 1, 1840.

"I am directed to acquaint you that the Board have determined that in future their Officers in the Country who allow spoiled stamps shall be authorised to administer the affidavit, by which means all expense in regard thereto will be avoided, as such affidavits when made before an officer of this department duly authorized to receive the same (a) are exempted from stamp duty.

C. PRESSLY."

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

E. A.—It is a general rule, that all witnesses interested in the event of a cause, are to be excluded from giving evidence in favour of that party, to which their interest inclines them. They are excluded from a supposed want of integrity; and not as some have supposed that they may be saved from the temptation to commit perjury. If that were the true principle, there would be some inconsistency in excluding witnesses, who have an interest even to the smallest amount. Phillipps on Evidence, 36. Persons liable to the costs of an action, have an immediate interest in the event, and therefore are not competent witnesses, id. 49. The objection to a witness on account of his being interested, is an objection on the voire dire, and excludes him from giving any kind of evidence for the party who calls him. If the objection prevails, he cannot be examined at all. The meaning of the rule which declares that an interested person shall not be witness in courts of justice, must be, that he cannot be heard at all as a witness on the side to which his interest inclines him. CHIEF BARON GILBERT lays it down, that he is totally excluded from all attestation, from his supposed want of integrity.

(a) It will be necessary that all stamp distributors in the country obtain a deputation from the Stamp Office for this special purpose.—Ed.

Though in general informers, entitled to part of the penalty, are not competent witnesses, where a statute can receive no execution unless a party interested be a witness, he must then be admitted. See Gilb. Ev. 128, Heward v. Shipley, 4 East. 180.

J. J.—The articles must be stamped before they are engrossed (34 Geo. III. c. 14, s. 11). Occasional indemnity Acts however allow the stamp to be afterwards affixed. See 2 & 3 Vict. cap. 33—also ante, Vol. 3, p. 12.

ESSAY.

ON THE ENGLISH LAW OF BAILMENTS.

VADIUM OR PAWN.

HAVING shewn the various definitions of this contract, we will proceed to consider the ENGLISH LAW upon the subject. It appears to have been settled that the pawnee is bound to use ordinary diligence in the care and safeguard of the pawn, but he is not bound to use more; and therefore, if he be lost notwithstanding such diligence, he will still resort to the pawnor for his debt. (a) We will now consider the rights and duties of the parties. Blackstone says, in case of goods pledged or pawned upon condition, whether to repay the money or otherwise, both the pledgor and pledgee have a qualified, but neither of them an absolute, property in them: the pledgor's property is conditional, and depends upon the performance of the condition of repayment; and so, too, is that of the pledgee, which depends upon its non-performance. (b) In all cases between these parties the contract between them governs their rights, "Modus et conventio vicunt legem,"—the pledge is therefore liable only to the specific charge, and not to any other debt; but it is liable to all the incidental charges and expenses. (c)

The principal right which the pawnee acquires, after default made in payment by the pawnor at the time stipulated, is the right of sale. The contract of pledge carrying with it an implication that the security shall be made effectual to discharge the obligation: (d)—this distinguishes pawns from liens; the latter, in the absence of any special contract, gives only the right of possession and retainer

This leads us to the PAWNBROKER'S Act, 39 and 40 Geo. 3. c. 99, which limits the interest that Pawnbrokers are to take, and contains provisions guarding against the facility of putting away stolen goods through Pawnbrokers. At the expiration of a year and a day the pledges may be sold by public auction only, unless the pawnor give a notice to the contrary, in which case the sale must be postponed for three months; but if the Pawnbroker neglect to sell, the pawnor has a common law right to redeem at any time. A judicial decision was made by the Court of Queen's Bench upon this Act of Parliament, in Walter v. Smith, (c) which was an action of Trover by the pawnor against the pawnee, for a gold watch: the pawnor did not require the pawnee to restore it, until after the expiration of a year and a day from the time it was pledged; subsequently, and while the pledge remained in the possession of the pawnee, the pawnor tendered the pawnee the amount of the principal and interest due in respect of the loan, and demanded the pledge; the pawnee refused to accept the tender and restore the pledge, asserting that it had become forfeited. The pawnee afterwards put up the pledge for sale by public auction, and purchased it himself. LORD TENTERDEN was of opinion, that the pawnee was entitled to recover,—the act not vesting the property absolutely in the pawnbroker after the expiration of a year and a day, but only giving him a power to sell, in order to reimburse himself his principal and interest, and so the jury found. Upon motion being made for a new trial—

LORD TENTERDEN said, I think that we cannot give to the word forfeited, as used in this Act of Parliament, the effect contended for by the defendant. It is argued that its import is, that the party whose property is said to be forfeited, has absolutely lost all right to it. Now it is manifest, from the other provisions of this Act of Parliament, that after the time for redeeming the property pledged is expired, the whole interest is ~~not~~ divested out of the original owner. If it were, the sale would be entirely for the benefit of the pawnbroker: but by the 20th section of the Act, it is provided, "that with respect to goods pawned for more than 10s., if they shall be sold for more than the principal money and profit due thereon at the time of such sale, the overplus shall, by the pawnbroker, be paid on demand to the pawnor, in case the demand shall be made within three years after such sale, the necessary costs and charges of such sale being first deducted." The pawnbroker, therefore, is only to derive from the sale so much as will reimburse him for his principal and interest, and the expenses of the sale; and the overplus, if any, is to be returned to the owner. We cannot, therefore, consistently with this provision, give to the word forfeited, as used in the 17th section, the sense contended for on the part of the defendant. I am of opinion, that if the pledge be not redeemed at the expiration of a year and a day, the pawnbroker has a right to expose it to sale as soon as he can, consistently with the provisions of the Act; but if, at any time before the sale has actually taken place, the owner of the goods tender the principal and interest, and expenses incurred, he has a right to his goods, and the pawnbroker is not injured; for the power of sale is allowed him merely to secure to him the money which he has advanced, together with the high rate of interest which the law allows to him in his character of pawnbroker. BAILEY, J., concurred, and observed—The object of the sale is to enable the pawnbroker to reimburse himself for the amount of the principal money advanced, and the interest due thereon. And if, before the sale takes place, the party pledging pays the pawnbroker his principal and interest, and expenses incurred, all the purposes of a sale are answered, and, consequently, the pawnbroker, in such a case, can have no right to sell. The words "deemed forfeited and may be sold," mean not that the things pledged shall become the absolute property of the pawnbroker, but only that they shall be so far forfeited as that the pawnbroker may take steps towards a sale. HOLROYD, J. thought that, by the 17th section, the property is not to be considered forfeited to all intents and purposes, but only for the purpose of enabling a sale to be had, by which the pawnbroker may pay himself as principal, and the profit which the law allows him to make in lieu of interest. Now the sale is for the benefit of the owner as well as of the pawnbroker; for if the property pledged sells for more than the principal and profit allowed to the pawnbroker in lieu of interest, he is accountable to the owner. The latter, therefore, continues to have an interest in the property, and must have a right to redeem it, by paying to the pawnbroker all that he would be entitled to derive out of it by a sale. It is true, that by the 17th section, the goods are forfeited for the purpose of sale; but that purpose is fully answered by the pawnbroker's being paid the amount of what is due to him upon the pledge. In this case a tender to that amount has been made to him, and therefore he had no right to put the owner to the burdensome and unnecessary expenses of a sale. BEST, J. concurred in opinion with the rest of the Court, and the lease was refused. (f)

This decision, although placing a construction upon the Pawnbroker's Act, was in perfect accordance with the Anonymous case in Salkeld (g), and with Lord Holt's judgment in Coggs v. Bernard.

PROBLEM XXIV. VOL. IV.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER.

Shew the Cases in which the right to RESCIND a CONTRACT arises. (1)

(1) LORD ELDON observed that few cases turn on greater niceties than those which involved the question whether a contract ought to be delivered up to be cancelled, or whether the parties should be left to their legal remedy. Jac. 172. EDITOR.

ANSWER TO PROBLEM XIV.

VOL. 4.

Lessor and Lessee—Covenants—Waiver. What amounts to a Waiver of a Breach of Covenant?

Sir,—A covenant in a lease is a contract entered into between the lessor and lessee, by which the covenantee lays himself under an obligation to do something beneficial to, or to abstain from an act, which, if done, would be prejudicial to the covenantor: If the covenantee does not perform what he has agreed to do, or does an act covenanted not to be done, it is a breach of his covenant: but, if the covenantor, being aware of such breach, and shewing an intention not to take advantage of it, he is waiving his right of forfeiture.

The best plan that I can adopt in answering this problem, will be to give a short account of some of the cases that have been decided between a lessor and lessee, to be an acknowledgment of the tenancy after forfeiture of the lease, and so operate as a waiver of the breach of covenant: after first premising that, where in a lease a power of re-entry for a breach of covenant is reserved to the lessor, a forfeiture may be waived, as the lease thereby is rendered only voidable; but it is otherwise where the lease is declared absolutely void. (Doe d. Bryan v. Bancks, 4 Barn. and Ald. 401.)—In ejectment by a landlord against his tenant, on a proviso for re-entry for a forfeiture, the whole court held that the lessor bringing covenant for half a year's rent subsequent to the time of the demise laid in the declaration in ejectment, was a waiver of the right of entry for the forfeiture, and an acknowledgment that the covenant then subsisted. (Bull. N. P. p. 96.) In a lease containing a proviso that the lessee, and his executors or administrators, shall not "set, let, or assign over" the whole or part of the premises, without leave in writing, on pain of forfeiting the lease. The administratrix of the lessee committed a forfeiture by underletting part of the estate unknown to the lessor. It was held that though the lessor received rent after the forfeiture it was no waiver, because the forfeiture was not known to him at the time: but Ashhurst, J. in his judgment said, "there is no doubt but that such a forfeiture as the present may be waived by a subsequent acceptance of rent; but that only holds in cases where the party, at the time of receiving the rent, is cognizant of the fact of the forfeiture." (Doe d. Gregson v. Harrison, 2 Term Rep. 425.) On an action for the breach of condition that the lessee should not underlet, in an agreement amounting to a lease, it appeared in evidence that the lessor of the plaintiff asked the defendant what he would take for his land; and on the defendant naming a price, said, "Then let it, and I shall know what it will produce next year." It was held that this was a waiver of the forfeiture on a breach of such condition. (Doe d. Henniker v. Watt, 1 Man. and Ryl. 694.) Where a lease contained covenants to keep the premises in repair, and to repair within three months after notice, and a clause for re-entry for the breach of any covenant, and the premises being out of repair, the landlord gave a notice to repair within three months: it was held that this was a waiver of the forfeiture incurred by the breach of the general covenant to keep the premises in repair, and that the landlord could not bring ejectment until the expiration of the three months. (Doe d. Morecroft v. Meux, 4 Barn. and Cress. 806.) Lessee covenanted that his executors or assigns would insure the demised premises, and keep them insured during the term, and deposit the policy with the lessor. Held, that the construction of this covenant was not that the lessee should effect one policy, and keep that policy on foot, but that he, his executors, administrators, or assigns, should always keep the premises insured by some policy or another; and that it was a breach if they were uninsured at any one time, and a continuing breach for any portion of the time they were uninsured. The lease contained a proviso for re-entry on breach of any of the covenants. The lessee assigned and the re-

SUPPLEMENTARY ANSWER TO SAME PROBLEM.

If in a lease for years the lessor have power to enter in the event of non-payment of the rent by a specified time, or on non-performance of any of the covenants contained in the lease, and after any such breach, he do any act which may be construed to be a subsequent acknowledgment of an existing tenancy, he shall be deemed to have waived the forfeiture incurred by such breach of covenant, provided he have notice thereof, or it can be shewn that he was acquainted with the fact at the time of his doing such act as a waiver.

We will now see what those acts are which have been decided to amount to a waiver; and first of all, let it be understood that the question with which the particular act, on which it is intended to rely for evidence of the waiver, is done, is a matter to be left to the jury under the circumstances of each particular case (Doe v. Cheney v. Batten, Cowp. 243.)

In Green's case, Croke, Eliz. 3. it was held that calling the party tenant in a receipt for some bygone rent was sufficient evidence of waiver, and that though the receipt of the rent would not be a waiver, yet the calling him to account in the receipt was.

An absolute unqualified demand of rent after a forfeiture amounts to a waiver, (Doe d. Ash v. Birch, 1 M. & W. 402.) but merely receiving the rent without a demand is an equivocal act (Doe d. Tarrant v. Helier, 3 T. R. 170.) if received without any observation being made at the time, it may be considered as a confirmation of a continuing tenancy.

The receipt of rent accrued after the breach is conclusive of a waiver, (Arasby v. Woods, 6 B. & C. 519.) but there can be no question of waiver unless the forfeiture be complete at the time.

A distress for rent that accrued due after the forfeiture waives it (Dumville's Case, 2 C.

the user in such prohibited manner continued after such receipt of rent; the subsequent user being deemed a continuing breach (Doe d. Ambler v. Woodbridge, 9 B. & C. 376.)

A forfeiture incurred by breach of a covenant to repair generally is not waived by notice given under a covenant to repair within three months. (Roe d. Gratty v. Paine, 2 Camp. 20); though in a subsequent case where the notice was to repair within three months, it was held that the giving it suspended the right to take advantage of the breach of the general covenant until the expiration of that time, ante.

Where by the terms of a lease, the lessee covenanted to repair generally, and then a stipulation followed, that the lessor and his assigns should be at liberty to enter at seasonable times, and view the demised premises, and upon such view to give or leave notice in writing for the tenant of all defects, &c; and in case he should neglect or refuse to repair the said defects within two calendar months, afterwards it should be lawful for the lessor with workmen, &c. to enter and do such repairs, and that the lessee should repay the money expended therein, with his next half-year's rent, or in default the lessor should have power to distrain for the same as rent, and then also followed a proviso, that if the rent or any such increased rent should be behind for 15 days, or if the lessee should not in all things well and truly perform all the covenants, the lessor should be at liberty to re-enter—the premises being out of repair, the lessor gave a notice requiring certain things to be done, and stating that in case of neglect, the premises would be put in order, and the lessor be charged with the costs. The repairs were not done by either party, and at the expiration of the notice the action was brought, it was holden that by giving such notice, the lessor had waived his right of re-entry, and that his only remedy was to do the repairs himself, and distrain according to the warning, in case the charges were not paid. (Doe v. Lewis, 5 Ad. & Ell. 277.)

An agreement to enlarge the time for repairing does not operate as a waiver, but at the expiration of the time the lessor may maintain ejectment, without a fresh notice. (Doe v. Brindley, 4 B. & Ad. 84.)

A landlord, by merely lying by and witnessing the exercise of some prohibited trade on the demised premises, even for several years, does not thereby waive the forfeiture unless he receive the rent: some positive act of waiver is necessary; but if the tenant lay out money in improving the premises, with a view to their being so occupied, and the landlord do not object, it would seem that this is evidence to go to the jury, of his consent to the alteration. (Doe v. Allen, 3 Taunt. 79.)

The lessor, by advising a person to purchase the term of his lessee after a forfeiture, of which he is cognizant, waives his right to maintain ejectment against such purchaser, but not if the party have a previous interest in the premises, and the lessor's advice be merely "to take to them." (Doe d. Sore v. Eykins, 1 C. & P. 154.)

The receipt of rent after forfeiture by alienation, is a waiver, provided the lessor have notice of such alienation at the time. (Roe d. Gregson v. Harrison, 2 T. R. 425.) But a lessor who waives his right to re-enter on one under-letting, does not thereby lose his right on a subsequent under-letting. (Doe d. Boscawen v. Bliss, 4 Taunt. 735.) And the same rule seems to hold in the case of covenants to repair, where the waiver on one breach is no bar to the lessor's right of entry on a subsequent breach; because, as it is justly observed, a party by waiving his right to enforce a forfeiture, shall not be considered as having given a license to the lessee to do those acts which amount to a forfeiture. But a licence to assign amounts to a perpetual dispensation of a covenant not to assign without licence. (Dumpor's case, 4 Co. 120.)

In all cases, although the lease declare in express terms that it shall be void on such a forfeiture, it is now well established that this means voidable only. (Doe d. Brian v. Bancks, 4 B. & A. 401. Arnsby v. Woodward, 6 B. & C. 519. Dakin v. Cope, 2 Russ. 170.) The Court holding, in a case where this point was raised, as an answer to an action for subsequent rent, that it only gave the lessor the option of vacating the lease, but not the lessee; the principle of law being, that a party shall not take advantage of his own wrong. (Rode v. Parr, 6 M. & S. 121.)

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LEGAL GUIDE.

A DISCUSSION UPON CONDITIONS ANNEXED TO GIFTS OR LEGACIES AS RESTRAINTS OF MARRIAGE.

SIR,—I endeavoured to state in my last the general principles which govern cases of conditions annexed to gifts or legacies in restraint of marriage. The whole reason of equity jurisprudence proceeds upon the ground that a party having a legal right shall not be permitted to avail himself of it for the purpose of inflicting, or fraud, or oppression, or harsh and vindictive injury. Referred to Contracts, c. 17, and as we have seen, so long as the conditions upon which do not violate any of these principles, are valid and binding, and equity so far from interfering, will on the contrary uphold and enforce them.

But at the same time the courts have fluenced much by the civil and canon law, have ever testified an anxious desire to guard against any abuse which the investing one party with so important a control over another might occasion, and in furtherance of such intentions, for the private as well as the public welfare, have on many occasions resorted to subtleties and artificial distinctions, in order to escape from the positive directions of the party imposing these conditions. These distinctions will be the subject of the present letter; they are

(1.) Between cases, where in default of compliance with the condition, there is a bequest over, and cases, where there is not a bequest over, upon a like default of the party to comply with the condition.

(2.) Between conditions annexed to a bequest of personal estate, and the like conditions annexed to a devise of real estate, or, things savouring of the realty.

(3.) Between conditions precedent and conditions subsequent.

Though this distinction, between conditions precedent and subsequent, is not, strictly speaking, either raised, or created by the courts of equity, being an acknowledged division of the common law, yet, it has been adopted, recognised, and applied by them, both strictly, and with various modifications; and interwoven as it is with the two first mentioned distinctions, and forming as it does (if I may be excused the expression), the hinge upon which they turn, or, the telescope through which they must be viewed, in order to ascertain their true bearings, I do not think I could do better than classing it as I have done. Though last in rotation, I shall proceed at once to the consideration of the distinction between conditions precedent and subsequent; for as I have just intimated, an examination of the one will necessarily include that of the others also. The general rule of the common law in regard to conditions is, that if they were impossible at the time of their creation, (a) or afterwards became impossible by the act of God, or of the law, or of the party who is entitled to the benefit of them, or, if they are contrary to law, or repugnant to the nature of the estate or grant, they are void. But if they are possible at the time, and become subsequently impossible, by the act of the party who is to perform them, then he is treated as in delicto, and the condition is valid and obligatory upon him. Story Eq. J. vol. 1.; Butler's note to Co. Litt., 206 a. Com. Dig. Condons. Conditions

(a) The common law considers a condition impossible, only when it cannot by any human means take effect, as that the obligee should go from London to Rome within three hours, but if it be only highly improbable, though beyond the power of the obligee to effect, it is not deemed impossible. Co. Litt. 206 a. Com. Dig. Coudon, D. 2.

precedent are those which must be performed before the estate can vest. Conditions subsequent are those by the non-performance of which an estate already vested, may be defeated; if the former, and the condition is void for any of the causes just enumerated, the estate which depends thereon is also void, as no estate vests till the condition is performed; if the latter, the condition being void, then the estate becomes absolute; and though this distinction is strictly adhered to and followed by courts of equity, with respect to conditions annexed to bequests of real estate in restraint of marriage, yet they do not in every case, as we shall see, hold themselves bound by such rigid rules, being accustomed to administer as well as to refuse relief, with regard to many of the rules of the common law concerning conditions and conditional contracts, upon principles peculiar to themselves, sometimes refusing relief and following out the strict doctrines of the common law, and sometimes granting relief upon doctrines wholly at variance with them; as an instance of this diversity in conditions precedent and subsequent, it was said in Popham v. Bamfield, 1 Vern. 82. "Precedent conditions must be literally performed, and a court of equity will never vest an estate, where by reason of a condition precedent it will not vest at law; but of conditions subsequent, which are to divest an estate, it is different." And Lord Holt said in Cary v. Berry 2 Vern. R. 339. "In cases of conditions subsequent that are to defeat an estate, these are not favoured in law, and if the condition becomes impossible by the act of God, the estate shall not be defeated or forfeited; and a court of equity may relieve to prevent the divesting of an estate, but cannot relieve to give an estate that never vested." See also Livingston v. Tomlin 4 John, Ch. R. 431.; 1 Fonbl. Eq. B. c. b. 3. Horsburg v. Baker, 1 Peters. R. 232, &c. We will now proceed to consider conditions precedent and subsequent in connexion with the other distinctions (numbered 1 & 2) resorted to by the courts of equity. As I have before stated, where the subject of the bequest is real estate, or things savouring of the realty, the doctrine of the common law as to conditions is strictly applied by courts of equity; where personal estate, a different rule mostly prevails, founded upon the canon law; but I can better illustrate this, as well as the other distinctions by the following examples. A. bequeaths an estate to B. upon his marrying C.; here is a bequest of real estate, upon a limited condition precedent, and though there is no bequest over, B. must marry C. before he can receive the estate. But to put a stronger case, if the bequest to B. had been in general restraint of marriage, though the condition be void as contr-

law, yet as it is precedent, and annexed to a bequest of real estate, it must, as in the former case be strictly complied with, or the estate will never vest in the devisee. But on the other hand, supposing that A. had devised a sum of money in the funds to B. upon his marrying C. there is still a limited and lawful condition precedent, but as it is annexed to a bequest of personal estate, B. would take the money, even though he were not to comply with the condition, and why? because there is no bequest over in default of a compliance with it; and this by reason that the condition is treated as ineffectual, upon the ground that the testator is to be deemed to use it in terrorem only, and not to impose a forfeiture, having failed to make any other disposition of the bequest upon default in the condition; now there are authorities which consider that conditions precedent as to legacies of this sort, must be complied with, in order to entitle the party to the benefit of the devise, whether there be a bequest over or not; yet there is the authority of Lord Hardwicke expressed in Reynish v. Martin, 3 Atk. 330. Also of Lord Clare in Keiley v. Monck, 3 Rigw. R. 263. and of Sir Thos. Plumer in Malcolm v. O'Callaghan, 2 Madd. R. 349, 353, &c. to support the view I have taken, added to which, the civil and ecclesiastical law recognise no distinction between precedent and subsequent conditions, as to this particular subject, see Harvey v. Aston, 1 Atk. 375. S. C. Com. Rep. 738. and Reynish v. Martin, before cited. Again, if as in the second illustration, the bequest had been in general restraint of marriage, but consisted of personal instead of real estate, the legacy, instead of being void, would be held good and absolute, as if no condition whatsoever had been annexed to it.

Thus we see that in conditions precedent, in the cases before us, the law deals differently, between real and personal estate: now if in the former of these illustrations, (where the restraint was limited and lawful,) there had been a bequest over to D. upon non-performance of the condition, that is, if B. had married any one but C. In both, as well where the bequest was of personal, as where it was of real estate, if B. failed in performing the condition, he would never possess, either in the former case the estate, or in the latter the funds, which in both cases would go to D.; and we have seen the effect of conditions precedent where there is no bequest over. But we have also considered cases where the condition acts in general and unlawful restraint upon marriage, which is void. Suppose in such cases there were bequests over in default of compliance with the unlawful condition. This appears to me a point of some difficulty; we know that with regard to real estate, if there is not a strict compliance with the condition precedent, although it may be unlawful and void, the estate will never vest in the devisee; but otherwise on this head the law is obscure and perplexing. But upon an attentive consideration, I think I may safely lay it down as a general rule, that this distinction in equity, between cases, where in default of a compliance with the condition, there is a bequest over, and cases where, under the same circumstances, there is no bequest over, can only be applied, and is only of effect where the condition in restraint of marriage is limited and qualified, and such as the law deems good and not opposed to public policy. If the condition is reasonable, and the devisee fails to comply with it, it is but just that the will of the testator should be carried out, if he has bequeathed the property to another party in case of such default; but if the condition on the contrary be unreasonable and unlawful, it is certainly right and proper that such obnoxious conditions should be annulled, that the estate of the devisee should be made absolute, and that no further bequest, in default of compliance with the unlawful condition, should be carried out: and it appears to me with a few exceptions, that this principle is carried out, whether the bequest be of real or personal estate, and whether the condition be precedent or subsequent. To the last mentioned we will now turn our attention: With regard to real estate, if the condition be subsequent instead of being strictly complied with its validity will depend upon its being such as the law will allow to divest an estate, for if the law deems the condition void as against its own policy, then the estate will be absolute and free from it, if on the other hand the condition is good, than a non-compliance with it will defeat the estate, in the same manner, as any other condition subsequent will defeat it. Story on Eq. J. vol. 1. Co. Litt. 206, a. & b. id. 237. id. 217 a. Hay and Butler's note 152. Bartie v. Faulkland, 3 Cha. C. 130. And the same rule is observed by the courts of equity as to personal estate. For if the condition in restraint of marriage be subsequent and general in its character, then as at law with regard to real estate, the condition is void and a mere nullity, (and this stake is whether there is a bequest over, or not,) and the legacy becomes free and absolute; to instance this, if A. bequeathed an estate and a sum of money to B. with a condition that if he married, it was to be void; the condition being subsequent and from its nature void, B. has an absolute property, in both real and personal property. But if the condition annexed to the above mentioned bequests were only in limited and partial restraint of marriage, if they were to a daughter to be void if she married before 21, with a bequest over upon default, it would of course take effect if she married before 21, and she would lose both real and personal property. But supposing there was no bequest over in case of non-compliance, the law is not so clear; as to the personal property the same rule applies here as in like cases of condition precedent, the condition being treated as in terrorem only. But as to the real estate a difficulty arises, whether the same rule applies or not, and in the absence of any express rule to the contrary, I should be inclined to think it does, perhaps some of your numerous readers may be able to throw some light upon this head, viz. whether a condition subsequent in limited and lawful restraint of marriage, annexed to a devise of real estate, where there is no bequest over in default, is to be strictly complied with, or whether as in the case of personal estate it is to be treated as in terrorem only? It only remains for me now to mention that with regard to conditions precedent concerning personal legacies, the courts of equity (according to the doctrine of the civil law) modify the strictness of the common law, where a literal compliance with the conditions becomes impossible from unavoidable circumstances and without any default of the party, when it is sufficient that it is complied with as nearly as it practically can be, or (as it is technically called) cy. press. Thus if a legacy upon a condition precedent, should require the consent of three persons to a marriage, and one or more of them should die, the consent of the survivors or survivor, would be deemed a sufficient compliance with the condition, and a portion of this doctrine would be applied to conditions subsequent. Story on Eq. J. vol. 1. and see 1 Roper on Legs. c. 13 & 691. Peyton v. Bury, 2 P. W. 626. Graydon v. Hicks, 2 Atk. 16. 18.—And now a word to those who may deign to read this and my former letter, that they may discover various oversights and inaccuracies, I do not pretend to doubt or deny. I do not ask that they should anything extenuate, but I trust they will not “set down aught in malice.” I may truly say with Cowel, “no man, no book,” (I might add no human thing) “is void of imperfection, and therefore reprehend who will with meekness and without reproach; so shall he reap hearty thanks at my hands.” I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LEGAL GUIDE.

REFORM ACT.

OBJECTIONS TO VOTERS' CLAUSE.

SIR,—I take the liberty of addressing you a few lines on the 39th section of the Reform Act

2 W. 4. c 45, which as your readers are aware, gives to any person who is on the register a right to object, at will, to any other person whose name is also on the register, without being required to show the slightest ground for so doing.

That some right of objection should exist, I grant, but I submit that the present state of things might be remedied to the advantage of all parties; and that it ought to be remedied, for it is a well known fact, that the majority of objections are merely factious, and given without the least pretence for so doing, except that the party lives at too great a distance to come to the town where the revising Barristers sit, to prove his claims; and consequently, that the vote will be lost to the party in whose interest the voter is known to be.

The decision of the Courts too, that the objector shall not be visited with the expenses incurred by the attendee to prove a qualification, after a factious objection, (Soames v. Rawlins, 2 C. M. and R. 744, S.C.) enables the objecting gentry to practise their profession with impunity.

Trusting you will give insertion in your valuable Journal to this communication, that some of your enlightened correspondents, may by the time the Parliamentary recess is over, be prepared with some enactment to remedy a glaring evil as that of compelling a voter for the county of Cornwall, residing in London, to appear at Bodmin, or an elector for Cumberland to appear at Carlisle, to defend his vote, merely because he is considered to be of a party, (for I regret to say all parties are alike in this respect); and in the earnest hope that before the next session of Parliament shall have closed its labours some such an enactment may be carried.

I remain, Sir,

Your humble servant,

AN ELECTOR.

COURT OF CHANCERY.—July 7.

APPEAL FROM THE VICE-CHANCELLOR.

WALWORTH v. HOLT.

JOINT STOCK BANKING COMPANIES.

FACTICE.—PARTIES.—Whether all the Shareholders of a Joint Stock Company, however numerous, are necessary parties in a suit for winding up the affairs of the Company.

This was an Appeal against an Order of the Vice-Chancellor, allowing a demurrer to a Bill for want of equity.

The Bill stated that in July, 1836, a number of persons, exceeding six in number, agreed to enter into partnership for the purpose of carrying on the business of Bankers at Manchester and elsewhere, pursuant to the provisions of the 7 Geo. 4. c. 46. and 3 and 4 Will 4. c. 83. A deed of settlement was executed, and the Bank opened for business. That previous to April, 1839, the directors had duly called on the several registered shareholders in the company, to pay five several sums of £2. per share on their original shares,—they having previously paid £8. per share in part of £20. That before that time the plaintiffs had paid all the calls upon the shares held by them. That previous to the 30th April, 1839, the partnership had sustained considerable losses in the course of their trade as bankers, and were unable to meet their payments, and on the 30th April, 1839, it was resolved by the directors of the partnership, at a general meeting, duly convened, that the partnership should suspend its payments; and since that time the whole business and dealings of the bank have been entirely discontinued. That on the 27th May and 30th June, 1839, meetings of the directors and shareholders were held, at which it was resolved that a further call of £5. per share, making, with the calls already made, the sum of £15. on each original share of £20. should be forthwith made: which call was made, and paid by the plaintiffs and the great majority of shareholders. That the said banking company had, down to the time when it suspended its payments, acted as a bank of issue, and at the time of its suspension a large number of the notes of the bank was in circulation; in respect of which the partnership was liable to a great number of individuals, and to a large amount; and the partnership was at the same time indebted to various individuals in other sums to a large amount. That several meetings had been held since the suspension of payments, but no arrangement or agreement whatever had been come to; nor any settlement, or plan for the settlement of the debts or claims of the several creditors and claimants; nor for the dissolution or winding up of the affairs of the partnership; nor since the month of February last had any proceedings been taken for the above purposes. That under the last appointment of directors of the said partnership, made previous to the time when it stopped payment, the defendants, John Holt, Samuel Fox, William Marston, William Nicholson, William Nutall, Samuel Waller, and Nicholas Price Wood, were the directors duly appointed of the partnership at the time the partnership stopped payment; and since that time no new appointment of directors had been made by such directors, or by the shareholders of the partnership; and that since the time when the company stopped payment, fiats in bankruptcy had issued against all the said directors, except Wm. Nicholson, who was the only remaining director who had not been declared bankrupt; that under the provisions in the partnership deed the directors who have so become bankrupt, are disqualified from continuing to act as directors. That, notwithstanding the bankruptcy of the said directors, they, together with Wm. Nicholson, have continued in possession of the assets of the partnership. That three of the directors are necessary to transact the business of the partnership; and that the trustees will not deal in any manner with the property and securities vested in them upon the authority of Nicholson or the other directors. That under the present constitution of the board of directors, sales of the partnership property could not be effected, and nothing effectual could be done for securing the property and effects of the partnership, or for applying the same in satisfaction of its debts. That no duly qualified shareholder could be found to act as director, and the property was in the course of being wasted and depreciated. That the entire property of every description belonging to the partnership, including the amounts due from several of the shareholders for unpaid calls of £15. purchase, would be wholly insufficient to pay and satisfy the full amount of the debts and liabilities of the partnership, though of considerable amount, and could be got in without the assistance of the Court. That the number of shareholders was too large to make them all parties, and all were interested in having the assets got in and applied under the direction of the court, and that the defendants were necessary parties. And the Bill charged prayed that an account might be taken, under the direction of the Court, of all the property, estate, effects, and assets, of every description, of, or belonging to the partnership or company, including such several amounts as might be due and owing from the shareholders of the partnership or company, or any of them, in respect of unpaid calls upon the several shares held by them respectively, and that some proper person might be appointed by the Court to collect, get in, and receive the said property, estate, and effects, and other assets of the said partnership, including the amount of such unpaid calls; and that the receiver might be at liberty to use the name of the registered public officer of the partnership, as might be necessary in any proceedings, whether at law or otherwise, for recovering or enforcing payment of the said property, estate and effects, and other assets, including such unpaid calls, or any part thereof; and that the defendants, the directing trustees and public officer, might be decreed to deliver up and duly assign, or otherwise secure to the said receiver, all monies, and securities for money, and property, and effects whatever, of, or belonging to the said partnership, now in their respective possession, or under their respective control, and all deeds, evidences of title, books, accounts, papers, documents, and writings, in their respective possession or power in any wise relating thereto; and that such part of the property, estate, and effects of the said partnership, as requires to be sold, might be sold under the direction of the Court, and that all proper parties might be ordered to join in the sale, and all proper directions given for effectuating the same; and that the last mentioned defendants, and other the officers and servants of the partnership, might be restrained by the order and injunction of the Court from collecting, getting in, or receiving, or in any manner possessing themselves of, or intermeddling, or dealing with, the outstanding assets of the partnership, and from assigning or parting with any part thereof; and that an account might be taken, under the direction of the Court, of the several debts and liabilities, due and owing from the said partnership, or to which the said partnership is subject, and that the said property, estate, and effects, and other assets of the said partnership, including the amount of the said unpaid calls, might be duly and properly applied towards payment and satisfaction of the several debts and liabilities, as far as the same would extend for that purpose. To this Bill the defendants, Aspinall and Bateson, demurred,—first, for want of equity; secondly, for want of parties, because “all the partners as shareholders in the partnership are appointed, they were necessary parties, but are made parties to the bill; and thirdly, because the bill is exhibited against them, and the several other defendants, for several, and distinct, independent matters and causes, which bear no relation to each other, and in which, or the part of which, those defendants are in no way interested or concerned, and ought not to be implicated.

These demurrers came on to be argued.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said, that a statute bar affecting the number of persons who might enter into a banking partnership had only been removed by the 7th of George IV., but no particular favour had been given to partnerships of that nature above any others. Then what was the general law? Some reproach had been cast upon the Court for the narrowness of its principles with respect to banking companies; but it should be considered, if the reproach was just, it ought equally to apply to the legislature, inasmuch as the legislature had not yet made up its mind whether the 1st and 2nd of her present Majesty, which permitted a partner to sue the company, and vice versa, should be made perpetual or not; and if the present act, which continued that power only to the 31st of August, 1840, should be permitted to expire without a new enactment, the present state of the law would perish. Under those circumstances the Court might be forgiven if it showed a reluctance to depart from its old-fashioned rules. The general frame of the bill, in his opinion, only sought an auxiliary relief to what was specially sought, namely, the payment of instalments by instalments, and the application of the assets among the creditors. It did not pray the Court to administer what was in sense and substance the law of every partnership, namely, the funds of each individual partner. The question was, would a bill be maintained? The cases which had been cited in the course of an ingenuously lengthened argument did not support the proposition that the Court would interfere for the partial management of a partnership, by applying certain portions of the funds for the general creditors, and there leaving the matter. The Court could not, indeed, grant the limited relief sought by the bill without declaring a dissolution of partnership, and directing the accounts to be taken, to ascertain if it was just and equitable an action should be brought for the balance for anything short of that would be to deprive the plaintiff of the demerit of the bill.

Mr. Richards supported the appeal, and submitted that the Vice-Chancellor's reasons for allowing the demurrer could not be supported. His Honour thought the plaintiffs ought to have prayed a contribution as a part of their relief; and he also thought that all the shareholders ought to be before the Court. If a contribution ought to have formed part of the prayer of the bill, the plaintiffs ought to have had leave to amend instead of being refused all relief; and the decision of his Lordship in the recent cases of Taylor v. Salmon, (a) and the very recent case of Small and Attwood, (b) clearly proved that the Court of Chancery had relaxed its practice, and would give relief where it became impossible to have all the parties in a company brought before the Court. Long v. Yunge, (c) Lockburn v. Thompson. (d)

Mr. Jacob, for the defendants, in support of the order of the Vice-Chancellor, contended that the plaintiffs were out of court at once, because they had not regularly averred themselves to be shareholders in the company. With respect to the equity claimed, it would be great injustice to allow a receiver to sue the defendants, when, in point of fact, if the accounts were taken, it might turn out that ten thousand pounds were due from the bank to the man whom they sued for fifteen pounds, and who had no security that he would not be called on still further to make good the deficiency in the assets of the bank. With respect to the want of parties, the case of Long v. Yunge was clearly against the plaintiffs, and so also was the case of Stokes v. Evans, (e) where the Master of the Rolls refused to interfere with the Brandy Distillery Company unless all the shareholders were before the court.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said the case was one of some importance to the parties from the amount of property involved in it, and also to the public as a matter of principle for the regulation of the practice of the Court hereafter. Several conflicting authorities had been cited, and it became the duty of the Court to ascertain how far they could be reconciled, and some relief afforded to the plaintiff without a violation of principle. To ascertain how that could be done, he was required to look into the authorities, and it was a satisfaction to the Court to know that the property could not suffer by delay, as it was already in the hands of a receiver. Indeed, that fact had come out at the time leave was given to hear the argument, the Court would not have allowed the case to occupy so much of the two last days of the sittings.

VICE-CHANCELLOR'S COURT,

July 14.

MILNER v. SINGLETON.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER.—PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.

The plaintiff filed this bill against the Steward and Land Agent of the Dean of York: the defendant claiming the right and interest in a lease, granted in 1836 by the Dean of York to the defendant, of a farm in the plaintiff's occupation, in consideration of £7,200, which lease the plaintiff insisted was granted the defendant as his agent, and on his behalf. That the plaintiff had agreed with the defendant, that he, the defendant, should negotiate with the dean for the lease upon the best terms that could be made, so as the purchase money should not exceed £9000, and that the defendant should advance half the purchase money, the plaintiff paying him for such advance £200 a-year; but that the defendant required £8,500 for it, and refused to part with it on any other terms. The Bill prayed a declaration of the Court, that the defendant, in contracting with the Dean of York for the lease at £7,200, was contracting as the agent for, and on behalf of, the plaintiff: as evidence of this fact, and upon which the plaintiff relied, was the following letter, written by the defendant to the plaintiff:—

"25th April, 1835."

"I have this morning settled the agreement for your farm, and wish you to bring me the names of three or four healthy boys, of from six to ten years old, for the purpose of selecting those to be put in the lease."

And that this fact being ascertained, the defendant might be declared a trustee of the lease and farm thereby claimed for the plaintiff, subject only to a lien thereon for the £7,200 so paid by him to the Dean of York, and on payment by the plaintiff of that sum, with interest, and all reasonable expenses, to the defendant, the lease should be assigned to the plaintiff.

The defendant, by his answer, denied the agency altogether, and stated that he was in communication with the dean upon the subject of the lease so far back as 1833, but no contract was entered into because the dean was not then in a situation to grant the lease. That the plaintiff was a perfect stranger to the defendant up to 1835, and no good reason could be assigned for his taking upon himself so much trouble to advance the plaintiff's interest.

Mr. Jacob, for the plaintiff, said, the case upon the evidence, although it had occupied the greater part of three days, seemed to him to be one material question—viz. whether it was an action in which the defendant obtained from the Dean of York a lease of a farm of which the plaintiff was the tenant in possession. The was acting on behalf of himself or as the agent of the plaintiff. The price contracted with the Dean for the lease was £7,200., and the defendant alleged he bought it for himself at that sum, and afterwards sold it to the plaintiff for £8,500 — The plaintiff contended he had employed the defendant to obtain the lease for him, and that he had done everything in his power to conceal from the plaintiff the real amount he had paid the Dean. Although the defendant denied that anything resembling what was charged in the bill had passed between himself and the plaintiff, evidence was produced, from the defendant's own letters, that much more had taken place that was reconcileable with the plaintiff's story, than defendant admitted. — There was a material distinction between agency and trusteeship. If the lease had been granted to the defendant as the trustee of the plaintiff, then some writing might have been necessary to establish such a relationship; but the plaintiff never intended the defendant to be his trustee, and therefore no memorandum was necessary prior to the lease to the defendant, as the plaintiff's agent, for up to that time omnia rite acta, and no objection could be made to his proceedings. The agency has been clearly established.

Mr. Knight Bruce, for the defendant, contended that as the defendant had positively denied the agency, the plaintiff must make out an agreement, he is driven therefore to rely upon the letter of the 25th of April 1835, which is deficient in every thing required by the rules of evidence and the statute of frauds. It defines neither estate, interest, price, nor person. Cooth v. Jackson, 6 Ves. 12.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said, that the Statute of Frauds, had nothing to do with the case, and that the only question was simply one of fact, whether it was made out that Singleton undertook to act as the agent of the plaintiff in the manner stated in the bill. The agreement between the parties mentioned by the plaintiff was distinctly met by the defendant's answer; but there was, nevertheless, such strange circumstances connected with the case, that he durst not trust himself (as it was not his duty) to consider how the fact really was. In a case involved in so much obscurity, and where things stated on one side were denied on the other, he could only strike a balance between the statements that were made; and it certainly did appear to his Honour to be a most extraordinary thing that the defendant should have suffered his mind to float about in such a loose state with regard to matters of fact, as with his own hand to make an endorsement of the contents of a letter he had written totally distinct from what they really were. When he found a person of such an extremely flexible mind with regard to matters of fact, it made him feel disposed to give much less weight to the assertions contained in his answer, than the Court would be otherwise disposed to do. It appeared to him, the terms of the letter were such as to justify him in assuming that something else took place beyond what the defendant stated. He thought, coming to the whole circumstances of the case, it was his duty, as the only fair method of arriving at truth and justice, and to clear the character of the parties, to send both plaintiff and defendant before a jury.

His Honour, therefore, directed two issues: 1st. whether on the 21st of April, 1835, it was agreed and determined that the defendant should negotiate, as stated in the bill, with liberty to indorse special matter on the postea; and 2nd. whether it was agreed between the plaintiff and the defendant, that the defendant should purchase of the Dean the lease in question as the agent of the plaintiff. All further directions to be reserved.

JENKIN v. PENCE.

PLEADING PROFERT of CONVEYANCE by LEASE and RELEASE.

This was a action of trespass, quare clausum fregit, for digging mines.

The defendant pleaded a conveyance by lease and release of the lands, except all mines of cannel coal, which mines ultimately became vested in Lord Balcarres, under whose title the defendant claimed the right to dig. The plaintiff demurred by reason that the deeds of release had been pleaded without profert.

Mr. Cowling appeared in support of the demurrer, he said it was true that the lease in question had been pleaded to have effect by operation of the statute of uses, in which case no profert need be made, but that allegation was so inapplicable to those deeds, and not to the deeds of release, which were set up by the pleas, it would be taken to have operation at common law in the absence of such an allegation, and consequently therefore to be brought within the cognizance of the Court by profert. This doctrine was laid down by Mr. Serjeant Stephens, (a) though a learned author had in a former edition of his work laid down the contrary rule, and had there stated that profert was necessary under such cases.

LORD ABINGER.—That shows the propriety of the rule which excludes the works of living authors from being cited as authorities on points of law.

(a) Stephens on Pleading.

Mr. Cowling.—The plaintiff would also rely on earlier books for this position; as 1 Lilly's Entries, 136; 2 Sand. on Uses and Trusts, 61; Jeffreson v. Morton.(b)

Mr. Addison, for the defendant, argued that must follow necessarily that these deeds did operate under the statute, for the deeds of lease and release were all to be taken to be one conveyance, and the former having been alleged to take effect by the statute, the latter would be included therein. Banfill v. Leigh;(c) Rea-Brookman;(d) Bolton v. the Bishop of Carlisle;(e) Onslow v. Smith;(f) Stockman v. Hampton.(g)

June 16.

Mr. BARON ALDERSON pronounced the judgment of the Court in this case, and observed that the general principles on the subject of profert are laid down in Dr. Leyfield's case, 10 Co. 92 a.)—"It is a maxim in the law that he who is party or privy in estate or interest, or who justifies in the right of him who is party or privy, pleads a deed, although he who is privy claims but parcel of the original estate, yet he ought to shew the original deed to the Court; and the reason that deeds being so pleaded shall be shewn to the Court is, that to every deed two things are requisite and necessary, the one that be sufficient in law, and that is called the legal part, because the judgment of that belongs to the judges of the law; the other concerns matter of fact, scil. if it be sealed and delivered as a deed, and the trial thereof belongs to the country. And, therefore, every deed ought to approve itself, and to be proved by others: approve itself upon its shewing forth to the Court in two manners; first, as to the composition of the words to be sufficient in law, and the Court shall judge that; secondly, that it be not razed or interlined in material points or places; and upon that also, in antient times the judges did judge upon their view the deed to be void; but of late years, the judges have left that to be tried by the jury, scil. if the razing or interlining was before the delivery; thirdly, that it may appear to the Court and to the party, if it was upon condition, limitation, or with a power of revocation, &c. to the intent that if there be a condition, limitation, or power of revocation in the deed, if the deed be null, or if there wants a counterpart of the indenture, the other party may take advantage of the condition, limitation, or power of revocation, and these are the reasons of the law, that deeds pleaded in Court shall be shewed forth to the Court." LORD KENYON, in Banfill v. Leigh,(h) maintained, that the law has recognised certain exceptions to the above rule. His Lordship there said—"Profert is not necessary where a conveyance to uses, or a feoffment is pleaded; and I only mention these two instances to shew that it is not an universal rule: others might be produced." So Mr. JUSTICE HEATH, in Bolton v. the Bishop of Carlisle,(i) expressly stated:—"That a profert is not necessary of a conveyance deriving its effect from the Statute of Uses." It is contended that the present case falls within one of Lord Kenyon's exceptions. The reasons for dispensing with profert in those cases are given in Stockman v. Hampton,(k) there the defendant relied on a deed of covenant to stand seised to uses, of which he neglected to make profert; but the Court held that the plea was good without making profert of the deed. A bargain and sale for a year, or a covenant to stand seised to uses, will operate by the Statute of Uses without profert, but a release on the contrary operates at the common law, and the defendant (if he claims under such an instrument) must make profert of it.

Leave to the defendant to amend his pleas by making profert of the release.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS.

We have taken the sense of our Subscribers as to issuing a double number once a month, to get rid of our arrears; the answers we received, though many, would not cover the expenditure. We continue to be importuned for this double number, and for a Digest of our Reports and we have, during the vacation, put our wit to the stretch to find out some other mode of obliging our Subscribers, that will not entail loss upon the proprietor.

We have thought upon one course, which if it meet the approbation of the Subscribers, they are requested to signify their assent by addressing "THE EDITOR."

The course is this: to publish a Quarterly Supplement, to contain sixty-four pages, at the price of 2s; this would not only secure a quarterly digest of the current reports of the day, but would open a wide field to many of our talented correspondents for exercising their abilities, and giving the benefit of them to their numerous brother "labourers in the vineyard"—to which purposes only we propose devoting the Supplement.

AN ORIGINAL ESSAY ON LIFE ASSURANCE, AND LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANIES; embracing a REVIEW of ALL the ENGLISH COMPANIES.

SIMPLY PROPRIETARY COMPANIES.
PROPRIETARY AND MUTUAL COMPANIES.
SIMPLY MUTUAL COMPANIES.
INCORPORATED COMPANIES.

By a GENTLEMAN under the BAR.

At this day, when policies of Life Assurance are so very generally effected for family purposes, and in so many cases form a substantial part of the security offered by borrowers to lenders, it becomes, we think, incumbent on every student of the law, whose duty it may hereafter be to advise with his clients, as to the method or necessity of assuring, and the selection of offices for that purpose, to acquire some general notions as to what Life Assurance is, and of the principles upon which Life Assurance Companies are formed and act; as also, a competent knowledge of the legislative enactments and legal principles which govern courts of law and equity in their decisions relative to the subject of Life Assurance.

In the following pages we purpose to consider this subject under two heads, or divisions. In the first of these we shall attempt to explain the principles of Life Assurance, and Life Assurance Companies, in a popular and general manner, avoiding alike legal and mathematical details, the latter of which we shall, of course, carefully exclude throughout, as not falling within the province of lawyers to consider, and being therefore unfitted for attention in a publication, which, like the present, is exclusively confined to the legal profession; and secondly, we shall endeavour to state, simply and concisely, the law of Life Assurance.

The great end which every individual, who assures his life in the ordinary manner, has or should have in view, is to provide that his family shall not be unprovided for in the event of his unexpected death—his object is to equalize the duration of his individual life, so far as the savings he can afford to make out of his income are concerned, with the duration of life of the bulk of mankind of the same age as himself, that is, to ensure that those savings, with their accumulated interest, shall, at his death, whether it happen immediately, or at a remote period, amount to the sum, which, were he to attain to the average age of mankind, and always obtain compound interest for his money, be the amount of his accumulated savings at his death.—A Life Assurance Company is a body of men, who form themselves into a society, in order to accomplish this end.

We may at once see, that the benefit of Life Assurance—that is, the making certain that the savings of an individual shall be of the same amount, whether he die sooner or later—cannot be obtained, except by the co-operation of a large body of men: for granting, that with care and labour, an individual may, so long as he lives, and continues to lay by a portion of his property, contrive to make his money yield interest upon interest; yet, as he cannot provide against the abrupt termination of his life, it is impossible for him to ensure for his family a certain amount of provision at his death—the result alone can shew whether they will be competently provided for, or left in a state of destitution.

Should he perchance live to be an old man, the requisite amount might be secured, but how foolish, nay, how wicked must that man be, who, when there lies open to him a certain and secure, and less troublesome way of warding off the evils of poverty, would rather, by relying on his own health and strength, and by assuming the impossibility of his own early death, risk the chance of leaving his wife and children impoverished and unprovided for.

The benefits of Life Assurance can be attained to by combined numbers in this manner. In a society or body of individuals of the same age, some will be found to live for longer, and others for shorter periods; by observing these periods with attention, the average duration of the lives of all the members of the body may be ascertained; and this being discovered, it follows, that if each member subscribes equally to the general funds of the Society, the exact value at his death (on the assumption that he will live the average period.) of the payments made by him may likewise be ascertained, and the Society may with safety, and without fear of insolvency, undertake to return to his representatives at his death, whenever it may really occur, the amount or value so ascertained.

In addition to this power of ascertaining the average duration of life, which is the foundation-stone of the system of Life Assurance, and can only be relied and acted upon in cases where a large number of persons is concerned, a Society or Company, part of whose professed business it always is to make the most of its funds, has many greater opportunities, both by reason of the amount of property concerned, the absence of delay in making investments, and the entire regularity of its proceedings, of procuring both a high rate of interest and interest upon interest than has a single person, whose savings are usually small, and whose business or pleasure must often be an obstacle to his attending to his private affairs with the requisite care and punctuality.

A Life Assurance Company, then, in its most primitive form may be considered simply as a species of Savings and Investment Society. Each of the members of which places under the controul of certain officers appointed by the body a portion of his property or income, the Society agreeing that his representatives shall at his death, whenever it may occur, receive a sum, which, were he to arrive at the average age of mankind, would be equivalent of the payments made by him, and their accumulations at compound interest. This primitive view of a Life Assurance Company very nearly resembles the plan of some of the Societies of the present day; but, partly in order to avoid the practical difficulties which might occur in a Company of this nature, in the event of the deaths of any of the members before the funds of the Society should be of sufficient amount to satisfy claims upon them, and partly also owing to the speculative motives of projectors of Companies of this kind, we find that a large majority of existing Societies are Joint Stock Companies, possessed of large subscribed capitals, which, although they operate as guarantees for the liquidation of the claims of deceased members, yet, as they at the same time exhaust a large portion of the funds subscribed by the latter, they considerably diminish the amount which the Society could otherwise afford to return to the representatives of those members.

Before considering in a more practical manner the plans upon which Life Assurance Companies are at the present day conducted, it may be as well to mention that members who subscribe to the funds of a Society of this nature for the sake of securing numerous advantages, are usually termed assured; the subscriptions paid by them have acquired the technical name of premiums; the instrument by which the Society undertakes to restore to the representatives of a deceased member the sum previously paid upon, is the policy of assurance; and the sum agreed to be restored is the assurance money, or sum assured. In the subsequent parts of this article we shall make use of these technical words, in lieu of the terms in which we have hitherto spoken. Life Assurance Companies, with reference to the different schemes or methods of their formation and constitution, are threefold. There are three distinct kinds of Companies, which are technically known as Simply Proprietary Companies, Proprietary and Mutual Companies, and Simply Mutual Companies; perhaps a fourth kind might be added to the list, as the three oldest Companies in existence obtained charters of incorporation, and in lieu of having a proprietary body are Corporations. To the consideration of each of these kinds of Societies we shall now proceed in its order.

1st. A Simply Proprietary Company is a Joint Stock Company, created in the ordinary manner by the issue of a large number of shares, the nominal value of which varies in the different Companies from £10. to £100.; it seldom, however, happens that the full value of each share is paid up by the holder of it. In the first instance a deposit only of £2. £5. or £10. is required of him, but in cases of emergency he is liable to be called upon for the full nominal value. The capital or joint stock which is provided in this manner is invested by the managers of the affairs of the Company on some good security, generally in the purchase of stock, which is thenceforth to be the guarantee for the payment to the representatives of deceased policy holders of their claims upon the Society. After a sufficient guarantee fund has thus been provided, the Company proceeds to the actual transaction of assurance business by issuing policies, by which it undertakes in consideration of premiums to be paid by persons assuring their lives, to pay to their representatives stated sums ascertained from the assumed average duration of human life, according to the data of mortality in use by the Company. The leading feature that distinguishes the Simply Proprietary Companies from the kind we shall next consider, is, that the former in no case restore to the representatives of the assured a larger sum than that agreed upon in the policy, not even should the amount of premiums received from all the assured prove by experience to be doubly or trebly too much to answer all claims on the Society. And although it can seldom happen that the exact premiums to be charged can be computed with sufficient precision to avoid the accumulation of a large surplus fund, yet the whole of this surplus is retained by the Company for its own use, and is, together with the interest arising from its capital, divided among the shareholders under the several names of bonus and dividend. In this kind of Company there are two classes, viz.—the proprietors and the assured to be benefited, and it is not unreasonable to expect, as the fact really is, that the proprietors who were the first originators and projectors of the undertaking, and who actually disbursed their money, and ran the risk of losing it entirely in the event of several deaths happening in the class of assured, before the amount of premium paid by them should be sufficient to answer the claims of their representatives, should have contrived to have retained for their exclusive benefit all the surplus remaining after satisfying the exact legal demands of their creditors. Had it not been for competition and the gradual acquisition of knowledge, relative to the subject of Life Assurance, induced by its increasing importance, and aided by past experience, most probably in every case of Proprietary Companies the proprietors would, up to the present time, have continued to retain for their own use the whole of the profits arising from the overcharge which for the sake of security is usually made in the original calculation of premiums. The following Companies, with the exception of the British Commercial, and London Life Association, which by having two rates of premium, are at once Simply Proprietary, and Proprietary and Mutual, and of the Royal Exchange, and London Assurance, which in lieu of a proprietary body are incorporated, are, we believe, the only Simply Proprietary Companies, viz.—the Pelican, Sun, Globe, Albion, British Commercial, Asylum, London Life Association, London Assurance, Royal Exchange, Westminster, Promoter, and West of England.

As to the Proprietary and Mutual Companies, the scheme of which we are now to consider, they, like the Simply Proprietary Companies, are Joint Stock Companies, having the guarantee of large subscribed capitals, but they differ from the latter inasmuch as the Proprietors do not retain for their exclusive benefit the whole of the profits arising from the premiums paid by the assured—their plan is to divide a certain proportion of their profits among the class of assured at stated intervals, the amount to be so divided, and the period of making the divisions, vary in different offices, generally speaking, the Proprietary retains two-thirds for itself, and sets apart the other one-third for the assured, by adding to the sum assured by each existing policy a further sum which shall be equal at the death of the assured to the present value of his share in the one-third part of the profits, though some Societies have recently adopted a method of applying the share of profits, or as it is more generally termed the bonus, to each policy holder at his option in the reduction of the amount of premiums to be paid by him in future. The periods at which these divisions of profits are made among the assured are usually at the end of every five, seven, or ten years; so that if a policy holder dies at any time in the interval between two divisions of profits, he is only entitled to share in them up to the day of the last division, and not up to the decease. We could wish that it were practicable to divide profits annually, as thereby justice would be dealt out with a more even hand to all the assured; and save that more trouble would be incurred by the actuary and other officers of the Company, we cannot admit that the plan of dividing profits or bonuses annually, or at other short intervals, could not be more extensively adopted both with safety and advantage. In the scheme of Proprietary and Mutual Companies, the assured gain many more advantages than they do in the Simply Proprietary Companies, but they are still great losers, for a large portion of their deposits or premiums, or in other words, of their property, is swallowed up in paying the hire of a guarantee, which in no case, that has occurred up to the present day, has been actually required, and which, as past experience goes to prove, must in every case except perhaps at the first formation of the Company, or in the improbable contingency of the occurrence of a devastating plague or pestilence, be a most useless and at the same time most expensive incumbrance. Before proceeding to mention the Simply Mutual Companies which contrive to grant assurances without incurring the expense of a paid Proprietary, we may in furtherance of our object mention that the more important Proprietary and Mutual Companies in existence are the Rock, Union, Economic, Provident, Eagle, Imperial, Atlas, British Commercial, Guardian, Brown, National, University, Clerical, Medical and General, Law Life, Legal and General, York and North of England, Palladium, Australasian, Colonial and General, Alliance, &c. Several more might be added to the list, as most of the recently formed Societies have adopted the Proprietary and Mutual scheme.

A Simply Mutual Company is constructed, and conducts business on principles most assuredly more in accordance with those which a person, having only general notions of the objects to be attained by Life Assurance would lay down as data for the formation of a Life Company than either of the kinds we have hitherto noticed. In a Society of this species there is no Proprietary and no subscribed capital, the funds of the Company are formed simply and entirely of the premiums received from the assured, and these funds in some manner or other in every case find their way back again into the pockets of deceased policy holders or their representatives, for although in the first instance the Society assures to an individual member an amount which is fixed and specified by the policy, yet all the profits which may arise from the originally too high rate of premium charged, or from other causes, are, after deducting the necessary expences of management, that is the salaries and fees of officers, house rent, &c., returned as bonus to the assured. It has, however, been considered advisable in Companies of this nature to set apart a considerable portion of the gross amount of their receipts as a reserve or guarantee fund to be applied to in cases of emergency only. When this fund has been provided, a Company of this nature, if the divisions of its profits are conducted in a fair and equitable manner, has all the advantages with none of the disadvantages of either of the kinds of Societies to which we have hitherto alluded. The great question which arises in all Mutual Companies is the manner and the times at which its profits shall be divided—the nearer the times of division approach to one another the more fair and equitable will it be for the whole body of the members—and the longer are the intervals that elapse between each period the more will some few of the body be benefited at the expense of the majority, for in the latter case the benefits will not be nearly so equally distributed among the Members; some who have the good luck to live may be only one day longer than others, may, and many cases actually do, for precisely the same amount of premiums paid, secure to their representatives a return doubly or trebly as large. The Equitable Society which stands out prominently from the herd of Life Companies, and is certainly the leading Company of the purely Mutual kind, has devised a method of dividing its profits, which, however beneficial it may be to a select few, is, we do not hesitate to assert, most inequitable to the entire body; at the same time that this Company, like every Life Society, has the professed object of providing against the uncertainty of human life: the ground-work of its method of dividing profits is the uncertainty of life.

An individual member must, to entitle his representatives to share in any bonuses declared by the Society, overlive a vast number of the other members. He must become one of the 5000 oldest policy holders before he can secure a return of any part of that extra premium which he may for years have been induced to pay, in the hope that his family would ultimately be benefited in a degree proportional to the overcharge made upon himself.

We have already pointed out the practical difficulties which occur in the establishment of a Simply Mutual Company, but at the same time we hope we have made evident how great are the advantages attendant upon a Society of this kind when actually formed, and when a just method of dividing its profits has been incorporated into its scheme. In the case of the Mutual Assurance Company which was established a few years back, the Directors met the want of a subscribed capital by each subscribing a part of his private property to a general fund, which was to constitute a guarantee for the payment of policies falling in before the amount of premiums received should of themselves be sufficient for the purpose. We believe that there has not yet been occasion to apply to this fund, and it is hardly likely that now when the Society has acquired considerable stability, and transacts a fair amount of business, that resort to it will be found necessary. The chief, and, we think, all the Companies of the Mutual kind are the Equitable, Mutual, Norwich Union, and London Life Association. The Amicable is generally classed among Companies of this kind, and insomuch as all the profits are divided among the assured, it may fairly be considered a Mutual Company, but the constitution of the Amicable, which is the oldest Life Company in existence, is somewhat peculiar; it is a Corporation in which each of the assured becomes, on effecting an assurance, a member of the corporate body, and in that capacity entitled to certain shares in the corporate property, which is formed from the premiums received.

An objection, though of a comparatively trivial nature, is frequently made to Companies of the Mutual kind. It is said, and with truth, we admit, that a Mutual Company is a Partnership, and that an individual, by assuring his life, becomes a partner in the undertaking, and as such incurs partnership liability to the whole amount of his private property. Now, this liability extends only to contracts entered into by the Company with third persons; for putting aside other considerations, it is expressly provided in every well prepared policy, that the insurance-money shall be payable only out of the funds of the Society, that is, in the case of Mutual Companies, out of the premiums and their accumulations, and that in no case the private property of the member shall be liable to satisfy the demands of policyholders. Now, while a Company of this nature is in its mere infancy, and is completing its arrangements for the purchase or renting of a house of business, and entering into engagements of a similar kind, some slight weight might be possibly attached to the objection to which we have alluded, but certainly when a Company is fairly established, and its business is increasing daily, the bugbear of partnership liability may be treated as a phantom and dismissed with contempt.

We lately happened to take up the preliminary prospectus of a Company which, we understand, is now in the course of formation. The Proprietors of this Company state as one of their objects the uniting together the Proprietary, Proprietary and Mutual, and Mutual schemes of assurance, and anticipate that the amount of business which they expect to transact, by adopting these three methods, will have the effect of diminishing the costs of management on each of these classes of assured. Not knowing the prospects of this Society as to business, we cannot pretend to foretel the result of these anticipations of the founders; but for many reasons we think that the plan of embracing in one Company all the known schemes of Life Assurance is far from bad, and we only feel astonished that it has not before been thought of and adopted. There was another point which we noticed in this prospectus, which we do not recollect to have observed elsewhere. The Company expresses its intention of paying bonuses (which, by the way, are to be declared triennially) in ready money, in cases where the assured are desirous of receiving the amount instead of reserving it for the benefit of their representatives.<sup>(1)</sup> Both these plans, namely, the making triennial divisions and paying bonuses in ready money, instead of calculating their future value and adding reversionary sums to the policies, are we think equitable and advisable, and worthy of the attention of Companies in existence.

The rivalry and emulation which, owing to their increased numbers, have sprung up among Life Assurance Companies, fully account for the various methods of effecting policies, which are at present held out as inducements to assure. We find, by looking cursorily over the prospectuses of the established Companies, that an individual may effect an assurance, either in the usual manner, by paying stated sums annually, or by one large payment in cash, or by payments which are, at his option, to increase or decrease as he advances in life, besides these, other methods of payment of premium have been devised which, although they may be of avail under particular circumstances, are not ordinarily made use of, and, therefore, need not be mentioned in this place.

We have thus attempted an explanation of the schemes adopted by the various Companies to give effect to the benefits of Life Assurance; but, before quitting this branch of our subject, it may be as well to mention that the greater part of Companies of this nature do not confine their operations simply to the business of Life Assurance. Many of them deserve rather the name of Life Contingency Societies, as, in addition to granting assurances for lives and for terms of years, (i. e. assuring a sum to the representatives of an individual in case of his death occurring within a specified number of years), they also grant Life Annuities, both present and deferred, and endow children. Some few also are Reversionary Interest Companies, purchasing almost every species of property depending upon the duration of human life, and the survivorship of one individual over another. The greater number of Companies of the better class, however, object to granting present Life Annuities, as it has been found that they cannot with safety compete with the Government Tables of Annuities; that is, Government for the same consideration will grant an annuity of larger amount than a private Company can afford to do. In many other respects too present annuity business is considered to be of a hazardous and unprofitable nature. While alluding to Life Annuities in connection with Assurance Companies, we cannot avoid pointing out to those persons, who, to obtain a large return for their money will risk the loss of their capital, the fact, that there is a Company* in the Metropolis which for every £100. paid by a person aged 30, will grant him a life annuity of £8. while the same individual by assuring his life at the rate of 17 15s per cent, may secure to his representatives the return of the consideration money paid for his annuity, that is, he may invest his money at £6. 5s per cent, interest, the only condition being that his capital is not returnable till his death. We leave our readers to draw their own conclusions as to the stability of an office which can hold out such an inducement as this. It would be an insult to their understandings to comment on the facts we have stated.

We cannot conclude this division of our subject without alluding to the custom of allowing commission to solicitors or other agents paying premiums on policies, (a practice with the existence of which doubtless most of our readers are well acquainted), it is customary with almost all the established Companies, (the Amicable, Rock, and Equitable being we believe the only exceptions) to allow to a solicitor a per centage of £5. per cent on the amount of premium he pays to effect or keep up his client's policy, that is, the Company in those cases where an agent is employed, makes a discount of £5. per cent from its published premium, and gives or rather pays this discount to the agent for his loss of time and trouble. This practice has been most universally and energetically decried by writers on the subject of Life Assurance, most of whom by the way are theoretical and not practical men, and have in our opinion considered their subject with hardly sufficient attention to facts. They object that commission being sometimes demanded, and in other cases not: Those of the assured who employ agents pay a lower, and those who act for themselves pay a higher rate of premium for exactly the same benefits, and that persons transacting their own business are virtually made to pay the wages of the servants of other persons, because an overcharge is made on the entire body in order to provide funds for the payment of fees to the agents of a few individuals only. It is said that were commission to be allowed in no case, but the entire premium charged in its published tables always received by the Company, it would be able to make a large division of profits among the whole body of the assured, and so restore the original overcharge, among all of them in a just and equitable manner.

We admit that there is considerable truth in these objections in principle, and we should be the first to oppose the present system, did we consider it to work injustice to any extent in practice; but we submit, 1st, That agents must be paid for their labour in some way or other, and that this having been the recognized method of payment for many years past, clients would grumble, and not without reason, were solicitors to commence the practice of sending in a bill of costs every time they paid a premium: and 2ndly, We say that past experience has proved that the deduction made by any one Company from the entire premiums received by it to pay commission, in cases where it is demanded, does not amount in the whole to more than £1. or at the utmost £2. per cent.; an amount so very trivial, that we think the public would rather put up with the supposed grievance than allow that their advisers and themselves should suffer from the annoyance and trouble of making out and paying petty bills of costs. However, as it is always our wish to remedy anything which has ever the colouring of an abuse, or injustice, we submit to the consideration of the managers of Assurance Companies, whether it might not be advisable to allow commission to every person, whether principal or agent paying in premiums, even if, to do this, it be necessary to increase nominally the amount of premiums in their published tables. It being of course understood, that all agents making payments, are to retain the commission allowed for their own use, and as a recompence for their own labour. It will readily be seen, that the actual injustice (if such it be) of the present plan would thus be completely avoided, while at the same time, solicitors would receive their due payment, and clients would not be harassed with the continual recurrence of bills of costs.

Our next paper on the subject of Life Insurance will be confined exclusively to legal considerations, more particularly with reference to the statute 14 G. III. c. 48. and the cases decided upon it, and the doctrines of Courts of Law and Equity respecting the transfer of Life Policies.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LEGAL GUIDE.

Sir,—I beg to forward you a Supplement to A.'s Answer to Problem IX. Vol. 4, hoping it will meet with your approbation.

I have been much pleased with the discussions which have lately appeared in the columns of your very valuable work; and as I sometime since, for my own amusement, wrote one on the husband's liability on his wife's contracts," it was my intention, as soon as convenient, to transcribe it and send to you, in order that you may, if you think proper, insert it in the Legal Guide.

I am, Sir, yours, most obediently,

SUPPLEMENTARY ANSWER TO PROBLEM IX.—VOL. 4.(a)

What acts amount to a private nuisance?

A private nuisance may be defined to be any thing done to the hurt or annoyance of the lands, tenements, or hereditaments of another, (3 Bl. Com. 216).

Private nuisances are of two sorts; namely, 1. Such as affect corporeal hereditaments; 2. Such as affect incorporeal hereditaments, (F. N. B. 184).

1. As to such private nuisances as affect corporeal hereditaments, these are of two sorts, the one operating in such a way as to do actual damage to the hereditaments, as in the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, 4th, 5th, 6th, and 8th instances put by E. A. (ante, p. 356): So if a smelting house for lead be erected so near another's land that the vapour and smoke kills his corn and grass, and damages his cattle, it will be a nuisance, (Hale, on F. N. B. 427). (b)

So it is a nuisance to stop or divert water that used to run to another's meadow or mill; to corrupt or poison a water-course, by erecting a dye-house or a lime-pit for the use of trade, in the upper part of the stream; or in short the doing any act therein that in its consequences must necessarily tend to the prejudice of one's neighbour, (3 Bl. Com. 218).

Nor is it necessary that an injury, in order to amount to a nuisance, should be the effect produced by the commission of some act; for a nuisance may result from the omission as well as from the commission of an act. Thus if one man ought to scour his ditch, but he neglects to do so, and in consequence thereof his neighbour's land becomes overflowed, it is a nuisance, (9 Rep. 69; 2 Roll. Ab. 141).

The other sort of private nuisances to corporeal hereditaments are those which operate merely as an annoyance to the occupier, but do not actually damage the property. As in Adre's case, (cited by E. A.) where it was held to be a nuisance to contaminate the air in and around another person's premises. Nor does it seem necessary that the smell which contaminates the air should be unwholesome; it is enough if it renders the enjoyment of life and property uncomfortable, (Per Lord Mansfield, 1 Burr. 337). So the carrying on an offensive trade, as that of a tanner, tallow-chandler, or the like, will be a nuisance, (Cro. Car. 510), notwithstanding they are lawful and necessary trades; but they must be carried on in such places that they will not annoy those who may happen to reside in the neighbourhood.

2. Nuisances may affect incorporeal hereditaments, such as rights of way, franchises, and the like. Thus it is a nuisance for one man to stop the way which another man hath to his land or house, (F. N. B. 183, 184).

So it is a nuisance for one man to set up a fair or market in opposition to another, (ibid. 184); but in order to make this a nuisance, it is necessary, 1. That the fair or market belonging to the person complaining of the nuisance, should have been established before the other, otherwise the nuisance lies at his own door. 2. The new market must be erected within the third part of twenty miles of the old one. For Sir Matthew Hale (Hale on F. N. B. 184), construes the dieta, or reasonable day's journey mentioned by Bracton, (l. 3, ch. 16) to be twenty miles. For it is held reasonable that every man should have a market within one-third of a day's journey from his own home, that the day being divided into three parts he may spend one part in going, another part in his necessary business there, and the third part in returning home. If the new market or fair be on the same day as the old one, it is prima facie a nuisance to the old one, and there needs no proof of it, but the law will intend it to be so; but if it be on any other day, it may be a nuisance, though whether it is so or not cannot be intended or presumed, but it must be proved to the satisfaction of the jury, (3 Bl. Com. 218).

(1) See 1 Vic. c. 26, s. 24.—ED.

(a) See ante, p. 356.

(b) See Williams v. Earl of Jersey, ante p. 246.—ED.

So if a ferry is erected on a river so near to an ancient ferry as to draw away its custom, it is a nuisance to the owner of the old one; because the owner of the ancient ferry is bound to keep it always in repair and readiness for the ease of the king's subjects, (2 Roll. Ab. 140), but the owner of a new ferry is not; and Mr. J. Blackstone, in his admirable Commentaries on the Laws of England, (vol. iii. p. 219,) observes, that therefore it would be extremely hard if a new ferry were suffered to share its profits, which does not also share its burthens. But, continues he, where the reason ceases, the law also ceases with it: therefore it is no nuisance to erect a new mill so near an old one as to draw away the custom, unless the miller also intercepts the water.

Again, it is a nuisance illegally to stop the free passage of light and air, as in the 7th, 9th, and 10th instances given by E. A. (ante, p. 356).

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LEGAL GUIDE.
ANSWER TO PROBLEM XXIII.
VOL. 4.

In what cases will proceedings be stayed until a plaintiff give security for costs?

Sir,—In attempting to answer this problem, I shall consider first, Those cases in which proceedings will be stayed; and secondly, Those in which they will not be stayed.

The nine following cases may serve to denote sufficiently the rules as applicable to the first class, commencing with which I may observe, that:—

1. In an action brought upon a bond, in the name of an obligee resident abroad, for the benefit of an assignee in this country, the defendant may claim security for costs from the nominal plaintiff, the assignees written undertaking is not sufficient. (Youde v. Youde, 3 Adol. and El. 311.)

2. Where the plaintiff, after issue joined, has been convicted of felony, and received sentence of transportation, the Court will compel him or his attorney, to give security for costs retrospective and prospective. (Harvey v. Jacob, 1 Barn. & Ald. 159.)

3. If the plaintiff reside abroad, the Court will stay proceedings till he give security for the costs. (Pray & others, v. Edie, 1 T. Rep. 267.)

4. If the plaintiff reside in Ireland, the Court will also stay proceedings till security is given. (Fitzgerald v. Whitmore, 1 T. Rep. 362.)

5. If after the time for pleading is out, but before judgment is signed by the defendant, the Court, on his application, stay proceedings till the plaintiff give security for costs, to be approved by the prothonotary, the plaintiff though he give security instanter, which is accepted by the defendant, is not at liberty to sign judgment before the opening of the office on the next morning. (Decker v. Thompson, 3 Bos. & Pul. Rep. 319.)

6. A plaintiff was compelled to give security for costs, on affidavit of his residing in Ireland, the cause not having been at issue, and the venue laid in Middlesex, and proceedings stayed in the mean time. (Maloney v. Smith, M'Cl. & Y. 213.)

7. Where the plaintiff was discharged under the Insolvent Act, after issue joined, and before notice of trial given, the Court stayed the proceedings until the assignee, or some creditor of the plaintiff should give security for costs. (Hesford v. Knight, 4 D. & R. 81, 2 Barn. & Cress. 579.)

8. Where, in trespass against parish officer for distraining for Poor Rates, it appeared that the plaintiff refused to pay the rates by the desire of his landlord, who was also the attorney in the cause, the Court stayed the proceedings until he gave security for costs. (Tenant v. Brown and Jones v. Brown, 5 Barn. & Cress. 208.)

9. It is not necessary to make a demand previously to moving for security for costs, unless it is intended to be part of the rule, that proceedings be stayed in the mean time. (Fountain v. Steele, 5 Dowl. Rep. 331.)

The six following cases may serve to denote sufficiently the rules as applicable to the second class, commencing with which I may observe that:—

1. The Court will compel security for costs where plaintiff resides abroad, without a previous application to his attorney, but they will not order a stay of proceedings unless such application has been made. (Baille v. De Bernailles, 1 Barn. and Ald. 331.)

2. The Court will not stay proceedings if security is given for the costs in an action by a foreign seaman serving on board an English ship. (Jacobs v. Stevenson, 1 Bos. & Pul. 96.)

3. The Court will not stay proceedings if the plaintiff, a foreigner, give security for the costs unless the defendant have put in bail. (Du Preuve v. the Duc de Biron, 4 T. Rep. 697.)

4. The Court will not stay proceedings in a quo warranto information, until the prosecutor give security for costs, on the ground that tor is in insolvent circumstances, where it appears he is a corporator and no fraud is suggested. (The King, on the relation of Thomas Wynne v. Sir Watkins William Wynne, Bart. Mau. & Selw. Rep. 346.)

5. Where an insolvent debtor having assigned property under the Insolvent Acts brings an action to recover a debt incurred before the assignment, the assignees having refused to sue; the Court will neither set aside the proceedings in such action, nor require the insolvent to give security for the costs. (Townsend v. Snow, Marsh, Rep. 477.)

6. A commission of bankrupt having issued against the plaintiff who was going with his family to New York, upon the petition of the defendant, who was the only creditor, and had taken himself sole assignee, and the plaintiff having brought an action against the defendant by the Commission, the Court refused to stay proceedings till he should give security for costs. (M'Culloch v. Robinson, 2 Bos. and All. New Rep. 352.)

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LEGAL GUIDE.

SUPPLEMENTARY ANSWER TO THE ABOVE PROBLEM.

SIR,—An application to stay proceedings in an action until security for costs has been given by the plaintiff, can only successfully be made, in the following cases:—1. Where the plaintiff is resident abroad or beyond the jurisdiction of the court in which the action is brought. Care must be taken however to shew in the affidavit upon which the application is grounded, that the plaintiff has gone abroad for the purpose of permanently residing there, and is not temporarily absent on a tour or excursion. (Frodsham v. Myers, 4 Dowl. 536.) And in a recent case it has been held that security of costs would not be required at the instance of a British officer, engaged abroad in the service of his country, (Evelyn v. Chippenhall, 1 Dowl. 536).

2. In actions of ejectment where the lessor or the plaintiff is an infant, although residing within the jurisdiction of the court, (Doe dem Roberts v. Roberts, 6 Dowl. 556) or, where the action is brought for mesne profits in the name of the plaintiff in ejectment, who being only a nominal party cannot be responsible for costs.

3. In actions where a bankrupt or insolvent brings an action for the benefit of his assignees. (Webb v. Webb, 7 T. R. 296), and

4. Where a plaintiff convicted of felony is brought up on sentence of transportation, (Harvey v. Harvey, 1 B. and Al. 159).

It may not perhaps be exceeding the limits of this problem to add that the application supported by affidavit should be made after appearance and before issue joined, unless under peculiarily special circumstances. A written demand should be previously made on the plaintiff's attorney, as otherwise security will be allowed only on the defendant's paying the costs of the application, (Bolers v. Sessions, 2 Dowl. 710.)

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LEGAL GUIDE.

"Immensum gloria calcar habet."

SIR,—Permit me, at a time when the subject is engaging the attention of contemporary legal periodicals, to request your advocacy of the interests of the rising members of our profession, in relation to one of the most important eras of their professional career—their examination for admission, consequent on the expiration of their clerkship. As the examinations are at present conducted, no reward of merit, no honour, no zeal-exciting mark of approbation, greets the studious aspirant for professional distinction. The cold announcement of his admission is all that the most studious and indefatigable legal tyro can, under the present state of affairs, possibly anticipate. But surely it were wise and well, to establish some honourable distinction between one who just escapes rejection, and another whose answers have displayed a depth of knowledge, an elegance of composition, and an accurate acquaintance with the principles and practice of his profession, gratifying and astonishing to those whose duty it is to award the certificate so justly merited.

The effect of an alteration of this kind would, I feel assured, be in every respect beneficial, increased stimuli would be given to exertion, because honourable rewards would be meted to the studious.

The object, then, would not be as it is (among many at any rate) at present, merely to "get through." The desire of ranking equally with, if not of honourably distancing those with whom, during the period of their clerkship, they had been in constant friendly communion, would cheer the despairing, arouse the indifferent, awaken the slumbering, stimulate the industrious, and restrain the presumptuous, increasing the legal attainments of the student, aiding the interests of the master, and elevating the general tone, because adding to the general amount of the knowledge and intelligence of their common profession. In your hands I humbly leave the matter; advocate on this occasion the cause of those whose ready champion you have ever been, and secure the grateful thanks of many, of none more truly, than of, Sir,

Your very obedient humble servant,

ALIVIS.

NEW MARRIAGE ACT.

3 & 4 VICT. CAP. 72.

An Act to provide for the Solemnization of Marriages in the Districts in or near which the Parties reside. [7th August 1841.]

Whereas by an Act passed in the Fourth year of the reign of King George the Fourth, intituled "An Act for amending the Laws respecting the Solemnization of Marriage in England," it is provided, that in all cases where banns shall have been published, the marriage shall be solemnized in one of the parish churches or chapels where such banns shall have been published, and in no other place whatsoever: and whereas by an Act passed in the Seventh year of the reign of His late Majesty, intituled "An Act for Marriages in England," provision is made for marriages intended to be solemnized in England, after notice given, according to the forms authorized by the last-recited Act, which Act has been explained and amended by an Act passed in the First year of Her present Majesty: And whereas it is expedient to restrain marriages under the said Act of His late Majesty from being solemnized out of the district in which one of the parties dwells, unless either of the parties dwells in a district within which there is not any registered building, wherein, under the provisions of the said Act of His late Majesty, as explained and amended by the said Act of Her present Majesty, marriage is solemnized according to the form, rite, or ceremony the parties see fit to adopt: Be it therefore declared and enacted by the Queen's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that it is not and shall not be lawful for any Superintendent Registrar to give any certificate of notice of marriage where the building in which the marriage is to be solemnized, as stated in the notice, shall not be within the district wherein one of the parties shall have dwelt for the time required, by the said Act of His late Majesty, except as herein-after is enacted.

II. And be it enacted, That it shall be lawful for any party intending marriage, under the provisions of the said Act of His late Majesty, in addition to the notice required to be given by the Act, to declare at the time of giving such notice, by indorsement thereon, the religious denomination of the body of Christians to which the party professeth to belong, and the form, rite, or ceremony which the parties desire to adopt in solemnizing their marriage, and that, to the best of his knowledge and belief, there is not within the district in which one of the parties dwells any regis-ed building in which marriage is solemnized according to such form, rite, or ceremony, and the district nearest to the residence of that party in which a building is registered wherein marriage is so solemnized, and the registered building within such district in which it is intended to solemnize their marriage: and after the expiration of seven days or twenty-one days, as the case may require, under the said Act of His late Majesty, it shall be lawful for the Superintendent Registrar, to whom any such notice shall have been given, to issue his certificate, according to the provisions of that Act; and after the issuing of such certificate the parties shall be at liberty to solemnize their marriage in the registered building stated in such notice: Provided always, that after any marriage shall have been solemnized it shall not be necessary in support of such marriage to give any proof of the truth of the facts herein authorized to be stated in the notice, nor shall any evidence be given to prove the contrary in any suit touching the validity of such marriage.

III. And be it enacted, That the additional notice herein-before authorized to be given may be according to the form in the Schedule to this Act annexed, or to a like effect.

And be it enacted, That every person who shall knowingly and wilfully make any false declaration, under the provisions of this Act, for the purpose of procuring any marriage out of the district in which the parties or one of them dwell, shall suffer the penalties of perjury: Provided always, that no such prosecution shall take place after the expiration of eighteen calendar months from the solemnization of such marriage.

V. Provided always, and be it enacted, That, notwithstanding any thing herein or in the said recited Acts or either of them contained, the Society of Friends commonly called Quakers, and also persons professing the Jewish Religion, may lawfully continue to contract and solemnize marriage according to the usages of the said Society and of the said persons respectively, after notice for that purpose duly given, and certificate or certificates duly issued, pursuant to the provisions of the said recited Act of his late Majesty, notwithstanding the building or place wherein such marriage may be contracted or solemnized do not situate within the district or either of the districts (as the case may be) in which the parties shall respectively dwell.

VI. And be it further enacted, That this Act may be amended or repealed by any Act to be passed in this present session of Parliament.

HINDS v PUGH.

WILL—DEVISE of "all the residue of the said PROPERTY to A. B. his Executors, Administrators, or Assigns," the bill having reference to real and personal estate.—CONSTRUCTION of the interest A. B. took.

This bill was filed by a residuary devisee apparently to carry into effect the trusts of the will of Wm. Machen, who died in 1798, but in fact to obtain the opinion of the Court as to what interest in the real and personal property the legatee took.

This bill stated that William Machen, by his will, (after giving certain pecuniary legacies), gave and devised his freehold and leasehold houses, and all other his real estate, whatsoever and wheresoever, and all monies that were or might be in any of the public funds, or bonds or notes, unto the defendants, their heirs and assigns, upon trust, for the purposes therein mentioned; and he declared that none of his said landed property should be sold or mortgaged, but remain in trust to pay the legacies and annuities, also given by his said will, and subject to the payment of such legacies and annuities, the testator directed his trustees; to pay the residue of the rents and the dividends and interest of monies arising or accruing from any part of his estate, both real and personal, to his niece, Rebecca Peacock, for life, for her separate use, unless she should at any time thereafter intermarry with any kinsman of her late husband, in which case he revoked this bequest, and directed the same should be from thenceforth absolutely void; it being his will, that in that case, she should not take or enjoy any profits, benefits, and advantages whatsoever, under or by virtue of his will; and he gave her 20*l.* in lieu thereof, and declared that the issue of such marriage should not be entitled. And upon the decease of the said Rebecca Peacock, leaving issue of her body lawfully begotten, by any husband not a kinsman of her said late husband, then his trustees should stand possessed of the said residue of his estate for all and every such issue of the body of the said Rebecca Peacock equally, to be equally divided between and among them, share and share alike, but if any should die under the age of twenty-one years without leaving any issue, then the parts or shares of him or her so dying should go and be paid to the survivors, their executors, administrators, and assigns; but in default of such issue of the said Rebecca Peacock, the testator bequeathed certain specific legacies, and subject to their payment, he directed his said trustees to pay and transfer all the remainder of the said property to William Hinds, his executors or administrators, to whom, in default of such issue of the said Rebecca Peacock, he gave and bequeathed the same. Rebecca Peacock survived the testator, having previously married Wm. Anderson; and she was also the heiress at law of the testator. Her marriage did not fall within the restriction imposed upon her by the testator. She died in 1835, without ever having had any issue, leaving her husband surviving.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, after reading the will, said, the whole question turns upon the residuary devise, after default of issue by the testator; and in default of such issue, after payment of some legacies, he gave the remainder to his trustees, "upon trust, to pay and transfer all the remainder of the said property to William Hinds, his executors or administrators, to whom, in default of such issue of the said Rebecca Peacock, he gave and bequeathed the same." I can come to no other conclusion than that the remainder of the property is the whole of the estate; and the testator having given it to trustees before, afterwards gives it to Wm. Hinds, his executors, or administrators; or, in the terms of the gift, it is to William Hinds, his executors, or administrators, to whom I give and bequeath the same, that is, the said property so devised as aforesaid. The only question arises, on account of the testator having used words applicable to personal estate, such as "bequest" and "dividends," and the direction to the trustees to transfer the remainder to Wm. Hinds, his executors, or administrators. In the will he has used terms in respect to realty, not applicable to real estate; and so in the latter part of the will, where he directs the trustees to stand possessed of the residue of the estate for all and every the issue of the body of Rebecca Peacock; the gift being one both of real and personal estate; or in the event of any of them dying before he acquires a vested interest, the share of the deceased child is to be transferred to the survivors, their executors, administrators, and assigns. It is plain the testator had a profound ignorance of the subject-matter, though he had got a knowledge of certain technical words, without knowing their meaning. Looking at the will in all its parts, I think it was the intention of the testator, that Wm. Hinds should take the residue of the realty in the event which has happened; and if that were his intention, and I cannot think otherwise, then the terms of the gift, although strictly applying to personal property, are sufficient to carry the realty. Decree for the residuary legatee.

VICE-CHANCELLOR'S COURT—March 10.

BANKS v. LORD LE DESPENCER.

SETTLEMENT.—LIMITATIONS.—Power of the Court to carry Limitations into effect, where the intention of the parties is only to do that which the Law prescribes in Cases of STRICT SETTLEMENT.

This suit, which was instituted some time since by the trustees of a settlement made by the late Thomas Lord Le Despencer and the Hon. Thomas Stapleton, his eldest son and heir at law, dated the 8th August, 1826, whereby the manor or lordship of Mereworth, and the castle, messuages, farms, lands, and hereditaments thereto belonging, situate in the County of Kent, were conveyed and assured to trustees to the use of Thomas Lord Le Despencer for life, with remainder to the use of the said Thomas Stapleton for life, and after his decease came the following extraordinary limitation, upon which the opinion of the Court was now required, "in trust to convey, settle, and assure all and singular the said manors and other hereditaments, to the use of such persons, for such estates, and with, under, and subject to such powers, provisions, declarations, and agreements, and in such manner in all respects, consistently with, and in order to effect, the said intent of the said Thomas Lord Le Despencer and Thomas Stapleton, that the same estates shall, so far as the law will permit, be strictly settled so as to go along with the dignity of Le Despencer, as long as the person possessed of the same dignity should be a lineal descendant of the said Thomas Lord Le Despencer, and be held and enjoyed by the person for the time being possessed of the said dignity, being such lineal descendant as aforesaid; and that during every suspension or abeyance of the same dignity, within the limits prescribed by law for strict settlements, the rents and profits of the same premises shall or may be equally divided amongst the co-heirs per stripes of the person or persons respectively, by reason of whose death or deaths without issue male such suspension or abeyance shall for the time being be occasioned, by three counsel in the law, whereof the Attorney or Solicitor-General for the time being, whichever will undertake the reference, shall be one, and whereof the others shall be named by him, or as by the majority of such three counsel shall be advised and directed; and in case both the Attorney and Solicitor-General for the time being shall decline the reference, or if, upon such reference as aforesaid, no two of the referees shall agree as to the mode of settlement, then in such manner as shall be directed by the high court of Chancery, upon a bill to be filed by the said trustees, or the survivors or survivor of them, or the heirs or assigns of such survivor, and which they may think proper for the purpose of obtaining such direction of the said court, and to and for no other use, trust, intent, or purpose whatsoever."

Mr. Knight Bruce for Sir F. J. Stapleton contended that the intention was to create an inheritance unknown to the rules of law; the donors had grasped at too much, and in trying to obtain more than the law permitted, the intention must entirely fail. (a.) Suppose the abeyance happened for 200 years, which was very possible, it might, on the happening of certain circumstances, have been impossible to give effect to this limitation in any manner; and the soundness of a subsequent limitation cannot be made to depend upon a limitation, which may in itself fail.

Mr. Richards for the trustees, cited Duke of Newcastle v. The Countess of Lincoln, (b.) and Woolmore v. Burrows. (c.)

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that since the case was opened, he had had time to look into the matter, and that his opinion remained the same, that it was from the first—namely, that it was a case in which it was the duty of the Court to give effect to the intention of the testator by making a settlement. The words of the limitation were, that the trustees should, after the decease of the survivor of Lord Le Despencer and Thomas Stapleton, convey, settle, and assure all the manors, and other hereditaments therein-before appointed, granted, and re-leased to the use of such persons, for such estates, and with, under, and subject to such powers, provisions, declarations and agreements; and in such manner in all respects as to effect the intention of the settlors; and that the estates, so far as the law would permit, should be strictly settled, so as to go along with the dignity of Le Despencer, as long as the person possessed of the same dignity should be a lineal descendant of the said Thomas Lord Le Despencer, and be held and enjoyed by the person for the time being possessed of the dignity and being such lineal descendant. If it had stopped here, there would have been no difficulty in directing a settlement to be framed, though there might have been some difficulty in effectuating that general intention of the parties, the meaning of which no human being could doubt. Many instances might be found in which the court had given effect to such limitations. In Lady Lincoln's case, (d) for example, no question was raised that the court could not execute a covenant in a marriage settlement to settle leasehold estates, so far as the law would allow, but the question was how it should be executed? Lord Eldon did not in that case object to the House of Lords reforming the decree, but he objected to the proposed reformation by Lords Erskine and Ellenborough. There was another instance of the court carrying into effect the general intention in the case of Woolmore and Burrows. (e) There the direction was, that the residue of the testator's fortune should be laid out in land as contiguous as practicable to other estates in Ireland, to be added, and closely entailed to the family estate then in the possession of Thomas Burrows; and by a codicil he added, that if Thomas Burrows should die without male issue, or dispose of the estate out of the family line, the residue of his property should go over to some other person. In that case a bill was filed and a decree made, and on further directions it was referred to the Master to make a proper settlement of the estates already and thereafter to be purchased with the testator's residuary estate. The Master did so, and to his report exceptions were taken. Sir A. Hart's observations in that case were extremely good, and applicable to the present, and indeed, every other case of this nature. He said—"It often happens that the court is called on to expound a meaning and execute a purpose which the testator himself could not have explained in their detail, and the court is then driven to the necessity of giving such directions as it conceives to be nearest to a probable and rational purpose in the testator's mind." Then he proceeded to remark on the particular words of that will, and said, "If his will had rested there, I think his purpose might have been executed without assuming great latitude of construction ;" and then, after arguing the question, observed, "such a limitation would effectuate the clear intention of the testator of preventing an alienation of the Stradone estate." The case of Lord Dorchester v. Lord Effingham, (f) was another case applicable to the present, and the books were full of instances where the court had interfered to carry into effect the general intention of the parties where only general words were used, and it appeared beyond all doubt, the court could in the present case, direct a settlement. The only question was, whether there was anything in the second part of the limitation which was so illegal as to tie up the first words, and prevent the court making a legal settlement. The limitation went on—"And that during every suspension and abeyance of the dignity within the limits prescribed by law for strict settlements, the rents and profits of the estates should be equally divided among the co-heirs per stirpes of the person or persons respectively, by reason of whose death without male issue such suspension or abeyance should be for the time being occasioned, as by three counsel in the law, whereof the Attorney and Solicitor-General for the time being should be one, and whereof the others should be named by him, or as by the majority of such three counsel should be advised and directed, and in case the Attorney and Solicitor-General should decline the reference, or no two of the referees should agree as to the mode of settlement, then in such manner as should be directed by the Court of Chancery upon a bill to be filed by the trustees of the settlement." Suppose that by this settlement a term of 1000 years had been limited to the trustees for the benefit of all the persons then in esse capable of taking the dignity at the death of Lord Le. Despencer, and the term of 21 years after the death of the survivor should so long exist, and that the uses had been to the persons in esse successively for life, with remainder to heirs male generally, and then remainder to heirs female generally, in tail. Can there be any doubt that this would not have been good? Suppose also that a declaration of the trust of the term had also been inserted that in the event of their being any abeyance such as here contemplated, the rents and profits should during that time (which could only be the time the law prescribes) go in the manner directed by the settlement, could there be any objection to that? Where the court saw it was the intention to do that which within the law might be done, he thought it was the duty of the court to give effect to that intention, and that it was a case in which a proper settlement ought to be directed. He should, therefore, make a decree referring it to the Master for that purpose.

EXECUTORY DEVISES.

ANSWER to PROBLEM XIX.—Vol. 4.

What is an Executory Devise?

By J. A. M.

An executory devise is commonly defined to be a devise of a future interest in lands or chattels, not to take effect at the testator's death, but only on some future contingency.

Mr. Fearne defines it thus, "An executory devise is strictly such a limitation of a future estate or interest in lands or chattels (though in the case of chattels personal, it is more properly called an executory bequest,) as the law admits, in the case of a will, though contrary to the rules of limitation in conveyances at common law."

The latter definition is the most precise and accurate; inasmuch, as the former not only includes executory devises, but every kind of contingent executory interest in lands or chattels given by devise: ex. gr. contingent remainders. Such definition is, therefore, too general.

An executory devise was never made good but for the sake of supporting the intention of a testator. Standring v. Standring, 2 Wills. 88.; and, therefore, it is a leading rule on this branch of the law, that a limitation in a will is never construed as an executory devise, when by possibility, it can be made good as a contingent remainder; and the intention of the testator thus effectuated. 2 Bos.

& Pull. 298. Agar v. Agar, 12 East, 253. 2 Marsh, 161. 6 Taunt. 263. The following case is an example, "where a testator, in case his eldest son should die without leaving issue of his body, then after his decease, gave the lands to his youngest son and his heirs; this was held an estate tail by implication in the eldest son, with a contingent remainder to the younger son." Waller v. Drew, Com. Rep. 372.

At the common law no remainder could be limited over after a limitation in fee; a freehold could not be made to commence in futuro. Nor could a term of years be given to a person for life with a remainder over. But the courts have dispensed with these rigid rules in order to support the intention of testators in the cases of wills, limitations of uses and declarations of trusts of terms.

There are three kinds of executory devises, two of which relate to freeholds, and the third to chattels real and personal. It shall be my endeavour to lay before your readers a brief account of each.

And First. It has been already stated that a fee could not at common law be limited so as to take effect after a fee. But by the first kind of executory devise this may be done; as where a man devises his whole estate in fee simple, but upon some future contingency qualifies the disposition, and limits an estate on that contingency.

A testator devised certain lands to B his son and his heirs for ever, and if he died without issue living A, then A to have those lands to him and his heirs for ever, it was adjudged that B took a vested estate in fee simple, and that the limitation over to A was good as an executory devise to take effect on B's dying without issue in the lifetime of A. Pells v. Brown, Cro. Jac. 590. Phipps v. Williams, 5 Sim. 44.

Devise of freehold and leasehold estate to A & B, as tenants in common, and if either of them should die without leaving issue, then as to the share of each of them as should so die without issue as aforesaid, to the use of the survivor of them the said A & B and the heirs of his body. And in case both of them should die without issue of their body or bodies, then to the use of C for life, with remainder to trustees to preserve, &c. and divers remainders over; held that the limitation to the survivor was a good limitation by way of executory devise; that by the word "issue" in the succeeding clause, the testator intended such issue as were to take under the prior limitation; and that subsequently the limitation over to C was not too remote. Radford v. Radford, 1 Keen. 486.

Real and personal estate was devised to trustees in trust for his daughter A, absolutely, provided that if she should marry and have no children, the lands and money should go to his son B, or if he were dead in the lifetime of A to his children. B died in the lifetime of A without children; and it was held that as the executory limitation was to have taken effect only for the benefit of B and his children, A's interest on his death became indefeasible. Jackson v. Noble, Keen. 597.

And even where there is a limitation over after a devise in fee, though such antecedent devise in fee be not vested but contingent, yet, if the ulterior devise is limited so as to take effect in defeasance of the estate first devised, on an event subsequent to its becoming vested, it has been held to operate as an executory devise. (Gulliver v. Wright, 1 Wils. 105.)

A right to curtesy attaches on the first estate in fee under this kind of executory devise, and is not defeated by its determination. (3 Bos. & Pull. Cruise Dig. Tit. 38; Devise. c. 17.)

Secondly. The second kind of executory devise is that of a limitation of a future interest in an estate of inheritance to arise on a contingency, or at a certain period, without any particular estate to support it, (as was necessary at common law.)

As if one devises land to a joint and her heirs upon her day of marriage. This limitation, though it would have been void at common law, is good in a will by way of executory devise, and until the contingency happens the fee descends to the heir at law of the testator; 1 Sid. 153; Bullock v. Stones, 2 Ves. Sen. 521. It may be well to mention here, that the Court will not allow timber to be cut down where there is an executory devise in futuro. Stanfield v. Hargham, 10 Ves. 278. So where a man devises an estate to the first son or the heir of J. S. when he shall have one. Raym'd. 83.

And it is not necessary that the event on which the future estate is to arise should be contingent. For where, though a testator departs with an immediate estate of freehold, yet the ulterior limitation of it is not so connected with it as to be capable of taking effect as a remainder, the ulterior limitation will be an executory devise arising in futuro on the happening of a certain event, ex. gr. devise to one for life, and from and after the expiration of one day, (or any other proposed period, not exceeding twenty-one years) next ensuing his decease, then over to another. See Clarke v. Smyth, 1 Lutw. 18; 1 Salk. 226.

When an estate is devised to a person on an event which is too remote; a devise over, depending on the same event, is void also. Procter v. Bishop of Bath, 2 H. Bl. 355; Earl of Chatham v. Tothill, 6 Bro. P. C. 1; 1 Ves. 134.

Thirdly. A term of years or other chattels may be limited by will to one man for life, and afterwards to another in remainder, which could not be done by deed, being void at common law, and the whole term would have vested in the first devisee for life; a life estate being esteemed a larger interest in lands than any term of years, however long; 8 Rep. 95; Cro. Car. 346. And a person to whom the first interest is bequeathed has no power to alienate or bar the remainder of the term. Dyer, 358.

Where one possessed of land for years devises it to another for life, and, after his decease, the residue of such term to a third person, this is an executory devise and good.

And the assent of the executor to the first devise is an assent also to the second. Lampet's Case, 10 Co. 47, b.; Manning's Case, 8 Co. 94, b.; Plowd. 520, 522.

It is not necessary that the ulterior devisee should be in esse, or ascertained. For where a termor for years devised the term to his wife for 18 years, then to the eldest son for life, and after to the eldest issue male of that son for life; though the son had not any issue male at the time of the devise and death of the testator, yet it was held that if he had had any issue male at his death, such issue should have had it as an executory devise, being merely limited to the son for life. Cotton v. Heath, 1 Roll. Abr. 612; 1 Eq. Ca. Abr. 191.

A disposition of a term of years, or personality to a person and the heirs of his body, is a disposal of the absolute interest in the term; for a term cannot be entailed. In a modern case, where there was an attempted perpetuity as to personal estate in a will, the Court decreed it a quasi entail, and therefore an absolute interest. The case alluded to is Mackworth v. Hinxman, Keen, 658. A testator bequeathed personality to trustees to pay the interest to Sir G. A. Bart. for life, and after his decease to his eldest son, for the time being; but if he should die leaving no son, then in trust for the person on whom the baronetcy, which was limited in tail male should devolve, so that each baronet should take the interest for life, and after the extinction of the baronetcy to fall into the residue of the estate. At the death of the testator, Sir G. A. had two brothers, on whom the baronetcy successively devolved: Held, on a suit between the representatives of the second brother and the third brother, and to which the representatives of Sir G. A. were not parties, that in consideration of the general intention of the testator to keep the personal property, with the title, the second brother took a quasi estate tail, and therefore an absolute interest in it.

That in equity chattels personal may be bequeathed, so as to take effect as executory bequests, the following cases are authorities:

Where there was a devise of £500 to testator's daughter, and in case she died before 30 years of age unmarried, then over. This was decreed in Equity to be valid as an executory bequest; and the daughter having died, after the receipt of the money, but before the 30 years had expired, her executors were decreed to be liable in trust for the legatees over. 2 Freem. 137. Car. 172.

A testatrix bequeathed her whole estate, consisting of personal things, to her sister C. (whom she made executrix) during the term of her natural life; and after her decease, the will was, that £400 should be given to the daughters of D.: it was determined that the said daughters ought to have relief as to the several legacies given them by the will, and for which the said C. was in nature only of a trustee, the money being to be paid after her death. Catchmay v. Nichols, 1 P. Wms. 6 in notis.

One-fourth of the personal estate of a testator was bequeathed to his son absolutely, but by a codicil it was directed that the son's share should be only for the life of himself and his wife, provided that they had no issue, and that at their death it should fall into the residue. Held, that the son did not take absolutely, but subject to an executory bequest over, in case no issue of him and his wife was living at the death of the survivor. Rackstraw v. Vile, 1 Sim. & Stu. 604.

And now, having considered the several kinds of executory devises, let us see how they are prevented from becoming perpetuities, which would be the consequence of the first devisee's not having the power to destroy the subsequent contingent interests. For the great distinction between an executory devise (whether of real or personal property) and a contingent remainder is, that the former cannot be barred or destroyed by any alteration of the estate out of which it is limited.

The principles on which the limits have been fixed by our courts for the prevention of perpetuities with regard to executory devises are thus lucidly laid down and commented on by Mr. Hargrave, in his celebrated argument in the Thelusson Cases, p. 57.

"Executory devise was not regularly admitted till about two centuries ago. The rules for circumscribing it are consequently not of earlier date; and there are not any statutes for the purpose. It is impossible, therefore, that the rules should be derived from any other source than the discretion of the judges. For general utility and public convenience they admitted executory devises. But it was seen, that if executory devise, or use or trust of a similar nature, was permitted without some restrictions, great abuses might be generated. It was soon settled by the courts of law that executory devise could not be barred by a common recovery, that is, as early as the case of Pells v. Brown, supra. Afterwards, though not without much contest, it was further settled, that executory devises might be shaped as to make the devisee uncertain (see the case of Snow v. Cutler, 1 Eq. Ca. Abr. 188.) till the very instant appointed for rising of the executory estate. But executory devise, thus unbarrable by recovery or otherwise, and thus uncertain as to the person of the devisee till the moment of taking effect, if some limit had not been prescribed, would have been a shelter for perpetuity. To prevent such an abuse, the judges limited the time for the contingency on which an executory devise was to operate; holding, that unless the contingency as such, that if it ever happened, it would necessarily happen within a limited space of time, the executory devise should be deemed illegal, and considered as a nullity."

VENDOR AND PURCHASER.

In what cases will a Court of Equity decree a specific performance of an agreement.

First, with respect to the Vendor.

Secondly, with respect to the Agreement itself.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LEGAL GUIDE.
ANSWER TO PROBLEM XV. VOL. 4.
By E. A.

EJECTMENT.

For what will this action lie?

SIR,—Notwithstanding the doctrine of damnum absque injuria prevails in a few instances, yet it is a broad principle, an indisputable and a general rule of the English Law, that "where a right exists there is also a remedy either by action or by suit, whenever that right is lessened in value or enjoyment, or is invaded, destroyed, or interrupted."

The action of ejectment at the present day, forms, in practice, no inconsiderable proportion of the means, whereby wrongs are redressed; and rights demonstrated, and established; inasmuch as, after the legislature had by Stat. 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 27, eased and lightened our juridical system of a burdensome mass of fiction; by the destruction or abolition of real actions, and by abolishing writs of right patent, and an almost infinite variety of antiquated, expensive, and, owing to the improvements and other changes in the laws and numerous other causes, then almost as unused as useless remedies by which in ancient, and occasionally in modern times, claims of right to real property were prosecuted; it left remaining, with the exception of a writ of right of dower, a writ of dower unde nihil habet and a quare impedit, no real, or mixed action whatsoever, save and except that action which is my present subject, for consideration.

This action of "Ejectment," therefore, is thus become the only remaining general remedy for recovering the possession of premises where and when a right to that possession has accrued to the claimant, or some person through whom he claims within the period of 20 years anterior to the bringing of the action, or within such further period as the law relating to the limitations of actions and suits allows, where the parties have been under some legal disability by reason of infancy, coverture, or some other of the causes set forth in the statute referred to during any portion of that period.

This action is in form a "mixed" action, and the reason for the application of this denomination to it is, because the plaintiff is in law supposed not only to be seeking the recovery of his possession, but also damages, for the wrong he has sustained by its detraction from him; although, in practice, this is never attended to: as the damages recovered in this action are invariably nominal, and the profits of the premises during such period as they have been illegally withheld from the rightful owner (not exceeding the time limited by law), are recovered in a separate and subsequent action, the form of which is trespass for mesne profits; in this latter action, I may state that as a general rule, the judgment obtained by the plaintiff in ejectment is conclusive evidence against the defendant.

Amongst the other advantages of this action (by which, as I shall presently more particularly observe, the title to the premises only collaterally calls for a decision,) is, that by it a speedy and efficacious mode exists of enforcing a rightful claim of title to premises, without augmenting its delay and expence in special pleading and other formalities, too frequently producing both of those evils.

Fiction and fiction alone is the whole and sole origin and foundation of the proceedings in this action. The first notification of its having been brought comes in the shape of a declaration delivered to the tenant in possession of the premises; who, to prevent frauds and to ensure its coming into the hands of the landlord, is required under a heavy penalty to inform his landlord that he is the recipient of such declaration, and which in terms alleges a demise of a term of years by the person claiming title to recover possession of the premises to some nominal party, usually John Doe, of which term in pursuance of such demise, Doe becomes possessed, and of which it further alleges Doe was ousted by some other nominal party, generally Richard Roe, before his term expired. To satisfy the rule of the Common Law requiring entry by a lessee before his title can be considered as perfect, the declaration distinctly alleges an entry, on, the premises by Doe. So far are the proceedings carried on in the names of these actores fabulæ, but by a "friendly" notice purporting to come from Roe appended to this declaration, the tenant in possession is made acquainted with the fact that Roe (who now styles himself as a "casual ejector" only, and in which character alone he states he is sued,) has no title to the premises, and Roe, in the plenitude of his friendship, advises the party to whom his friendly epistle is addressed, to appear in some court of law (which he names,) in the following term, and so to cause himself to be made defendant in Roe's stead; otherwise he, (Roe) doubtless, to avoid meddling with his neighbour's business,) will suffer judgment to pass by default; whereupon, the then unfortunate possessor, will be turned out of possession.

If it is intended to defend the action which is brought in the way I have attempted to describe, the party in possession appears to the declaration, pleads the general issue, and enters into the consent rule, whereby he agrees at the trial of the cause to admit the following as facts. (viz.)

1. That such lease as I have mentioned was made to Doe.

2. That Doe entered in pursuance thereof.

3. That he was ousted or amoved from the possession vested in him pursuant to that lease, the consent rule then provides for the payment and recovery of the costs of the action.

When the cause comes on for trial, as it must have been previously observed, the only question calling for a verdict of the jury is, whether the party claiming title to the possession of the premises, had at that time when it was alleged that he demised them to Doe a sufficient legal estate in him, to warrant and authorize the granting of such a lease and Doe's entry thereupon. If he had not the action ex necessitate must fall to the ground. If, on the other hand, the verdict of the jury is in effect that he had, then judgment, unless restrained in due course, goes for him, and he recovers possession accordingly.

If no steps are taken by those who, either by themselves, their tenants, or their servants are in the possession of the premises to defend the action, the plaintiff becomes entitled to judgment by default against the "casual ejector," obtainable on motion and rule without further notice to the possessors, and as an inevitable consequence to a writ of possession as well.

I shall decline to enter more fully into the practice of this action referring to 2 Arch. P. by Ch. where I believe, those who are so minded to do, may procure all the information necessary in relation to this action lucidly and perspicuously arranged.

Before concluding these observations I wish most particularly to impress upon those who may not have had the opportunity of watching an action of ejectment through all its stages, that it must be borne in mind that if the substituted defendant refuses or neglects to appear at the trial and confess lease, entry, and ouster pursuant to the terms of the consent rule, the plaintiff will be nonsuited as a matter of course, but he will thereupon be entitled to judgment against the casual ejector, the same as if no one had originally appeared to the declaration.

Having made these preliminary remarks more with a view of introducing my subject with advantage, than with a view of engrossing the columns of your invaluable periodical, and because I flatter myself that those remarks will (if correct) be acceptable to many of your readers, I now proceed with the answer in detail, in doing which I intend, for the sake of convenience, to pursue the following plan of arrangement, viz.:—

First. For what premises, and in what cases an action of ejectment may be brought, where the lessor of the plaintiff claims, for his own benefit, distinct from and unconnected with other persons, whether as

1. Disseisee, &c.
2. Landlord.
3. Mortgagee.
4. Vendor of real property.
5. Lessor, as for forfeiture, &c.
6. Tenant by elegit, &c.
7. Lord of a manor, or as
8. Widow for free bench.

Secondly. Other cases in which the action will lie, as where the party claiming claims the premises:

1. Jure representatione, as—1, Heir at law; and, 2. Executor or administrator.
2. By devise.
3. As trustee.
4. As guardian.
5. Where there is a connection in title or tenancy with other persons.—1. Joint tenants.—
2. Coparceners; and, 3. Tenants in common.
6. As commoner.
7. As a public right of way.
8. As a parson, &c.
9. As husband jure uxoris, and
10. As parish officers.

3 & 4 VICT. Cap. 97.

An Act for regulating Railways.

[10th August, 1840].

Whereas it is expedient for the safety of the public to provide for the due supervision of Railways: Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That after two months from the passing of this Act, no Railway, or portion of any Railway, shall be opened for the public conveyance of passengers or goods until one calendar month after notice in writing of the intention of opening the same shall have been given, by the Company to whom such Railway shall belong, to the Lords of the Committee of her Majesty's Privy Council appointed for Trade and Foreign Plantations.

2. And be it enacted, That if any Railway, or portion of any Railway, shall be opened without due notice as aforesaid, the Company to whom such Railway shall belong shall forfeit to her Majesty the sum of Twenty Pounds for every day during which the same shall continue open, until the expiration of one calendar month after the company shall have given the like notice as is herein before required before the opening of the Railway; and any such Penalty may be recovered in any of her Majesty's Courts of Record.

3. And be it enacted, That the Lords of the said Committee may order and direct every Railway Company to make up and deliver to them Returns, according to a form to be provided by the Lords of the said Committee, of the aggregate traffic in passengers, according to the several classes, and of the aggregate traffic in cattle and goods respectively, on the said Railway, as well as of all accidents which shall have occurred thereon attended with personal injury, and also a table of all Tolls, Rates, and Charges from time to time levied on each class passengers, and on cattle and goods, conveyed on the said Railway; and if the returns herein specified shall not be delivered within thirty days after the same shall have been required, every such Company shall forfeit to her Majesty the sum of Twenty Pounds for every day during which the said Company shall wilfully neglect to deliver the same; and every such penalty may be recovered in her Majesty's Courts of Record: provided always, that such returns shall be required, in like manner and at the same time, from all the said Companies, unless the Lords of the said Committee shall specially exempt any of the said companies, and shall enter the grounds of such Exemption in the minutes of their Proceedings.

4. And be it enacted, That every Officer of any Company who shall wilfully make any false return to the Lords of the said Committee shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

5. And be it enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Lords of the said Committee, if and when they shall think fit, to authorize any proper person or persons to inspect any Railway; and it shall be lawful for every person so authorized, at all reasonable times, upon producing his authority, if required, to enter upon and examine the said Railway, and the Stations, Works, and Buildings, and the Engines and Carriages belonging thereto: provided always, that no person shall be eligible to the appointment as Inspector as aforesaid who shall within the year of his appointment have been a Director or have held any office of trust or profit under any Railway Company.

6. And be it enacted, That every person wilfully obstructing any person, duly authorized as aforesaid, in the execution of his duty, shall, on conviction before a Justice of the Peace having jurisdiction in the place where the offence shall have been committed, forfeit and pay for every such offence any sum not exceeding ten pounds; and in default of payment of any penalty so adjudged, immediately or within such time as the said Justice of the Peace shall appoint, the same Justice, or any other Justice having jurisdiction in the place where the offender shall be or reside, may commit the offender to prison for any period not exceeding three calendar months; such commitment to be determined on payment of the amount of the penalty; and every such penalty shall be returned to the next ensuing Court of Quarter Sessions in the usual manner.

7. And whereas many Railway Companies are, or may hereafter be empowered by Act of Parliament to make Bye Laws, Orders, Rules, or Regulations, and to impose penalties for the enforcement thereof, upon persons other than the servants of the said Companies, and it is expedient that such powers should be under proper controul; be it enacted, That true copies of all such Bye Laws, Orders, Rules, and Regulations, made under any such powers by every such Company before the passing of this Act, certified in such manner as the Lords of the said Committee shall from time to time direct, shall, within two calendar months after the passing of this Act, be laid before the Lords of the said Committee; and that every such Bye Law, Order, Rule, or Regulation, not so laid before the Lords of the said Committee within the aforesaid period, shall, from and after that period, cease to have any force or effect, saving in so far as any penalty may have been then already incurred under the same.

8. And be it enacted, That no such Bye Law, Order, Rule, or Regulation made under any such power, and which shall not be in force at the time of the passing of this Act, and no order, Rule or Regulation annulling any such existing Bye Law, Rule, Order, or Regulation which shall be made after the passing of this Act, shall have any force or effect until two calendar months after a copy of such Bye Law, Order, Rule, or Regulation, certified as aforesaid, shall have been laid before the Lords of the said Committee, unless the Lords of the said Committee shall, before such period, signify their approbation thereof.

9. And be it enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Lords of the said Committee, at any time either before or after any Bye Law, Order, Rule or Regulation shall have been laid before them as aforesaid shall have come into operation, to notify to the Company who shall have made the same their disallowance thereof, and, in case the same shall be in force at the time of such disallowance, the time at which the same shall cease to be in force; and no Bye Law, Order, Rule, or Regulation which shall be so disallowed shall have any force or effect whatsoever, or, if it shall be in force at the time of such disallowance, it shall cease to have any force or effect at the time limited in the notice of such disallowance, saving in so far as any penalty may have been then already incurred under the same.

10. And be it enacted, That so much of every clause, provision, and enactment in any Act of Parliament heretofore passed as may require the approval or concurrence of any Justice of the Peace, Court of Quarter Sessions, or other person or persons, other than the members of the said Companies, to give validity to any Bye Laws, Orders, Rules, or Regulations made by any such Company, shall be repealed.

11. And be it enacted, That whenever it shall appear to the Lords of the said Committee that any of the provisions of the several Acts of Parliament regulating any of the said Companies, or the provisions of this Act, have not been complied with on the part of any of the said Companies, or any of their officers, and that it would be for the public advantage that the due performance of the same should be enforced, the Lords of the said Committee shall certify the same to her Majesty's Attorney General for England or Ireland, or to the Lord Advocate for Scotland, as the case may require; and thereupon the said Attorney General or Lord Advocate shall, by information, or by action, bill, plaint, suit at law or in equity, or other legal proceedings, as the case may require, proceed to recover such penalties and forfeitures, or otherwise to enforce the performance of the said provisions, by such means as any person aggrieved by such non-compliance, or otherwise authorized to sue for such penalties, might employ under the provisions of the said Acts: provided always, that no such certificate as aforesaid shall be given by the Lords of the said Committee until twenty-one days after they shall have given notice of their intention to give the same to the Company against or in relation to whom they shall intend to give the same.

12. And be it enacted, That no legal proceedings shall commenced under the authority of the Lords of the said Committee against any Railway Company for any offence against this Act, or any of the several Acts of Parliament relating to Railways, except upon such certificate of the Lords of the said Committee as aforesaid, and within one year after such offence shall have been committed.

13. And be it enacted, That it shall be lawful for any officer or agent of the Railway Company, or for any special constable duly appointed, and all such persons as they may call to their assistance, to seize and detain any engine driver, guard, porter, or other servant in the employ of such company who shall be found drunk while employed upon the Railway, or commit any offence against any of the bye laws, rules or regulations of such company, or shall wilfully, maliciously, or negligently do or omit to do any act whereby the life or limb of any person passing along or being upon the Railway belonging to such company, or the works thereof respectively, shall be or might be injured or endangered, or whereby the passage of any of the engines, carriages, or trains shall be or might be obstructed or impeded, and to convey such engine driver, guard, porter, or other servant so offending, or any person counselling, aiding, or assisting in such offence, with all convenient despatch, before some justice of the peace for the place within which such offence shall be committed, without any other warrant or authority than this Act; and every such person so offending, and every person counselling, aiding, or assisting therein as aforesaid, shall, when convicted before such justice as aforesaid, (who is hereby authorized and required, upon complaint to him made, upon oath, without information in writing, to take cognizance thereof, and to act summarily in the premises,) in the discretion of such justice, be imprisoned, with or without hard labour, for any term not exceeding two calendar months, or, in the like discretion of such justice, shall for every such offence forfeit to her Majesty any sum not exceeding ten pounds, and in default of payment thereof shall be imprisoned, with or without hard labour as aforesaid, for such period, not exceeding two calendar months, as such justice shall appoint; such commitment to be determined on payment of the amount of the penalty; and every such penalty shall be returned to the next ensuing court of quarter sessions in the usual manner.

14. Provided always, and be it enacted, That (if upon the hearing of any such complaint he shall think fit) it shall be lawful for such Justice, instead of deciding upon the matter of complaint summarily, to commit the person or persons charged with such offence for trial for the same at the Quarter Sessions for the county or place wherein such offence shall have been committed, and to order that any such person so committed shall be imprisoned and detained in any of her Majesty's gaols or houses of correction in the said county or place in the meantime, or to take bail for his appearance, with or without sureties, in his discretion; and every such person so offending, and convicted before such Court of Quarter Sessions as aforesaid (which said Court is hereby quired to take cognizance of and hear and determine such complaint,) shall be liable in the discretion of such Court, to be imprisoned, with or without hard labour, for any term not exceeding two years.

15. And be it enacted, That from and after the passing of this Act every person who shall wilfully do or cause to be done any thing in such manner as to obstruct any engine or carriage running any Railway, or to endanger the safety of persons conveyed in or upon the same, or shall aid or assist therein, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court before which he shall have been convicted, to be imprisoned, with or without hard labour, for any term not exceeding two years.

16. And be it enacted, That if any person shall wilfully obstruct or impede any officer or agent of any Railway Company in the execution of his duty upon any Railway, or upon or in any of the stations or other works or premises connected therewith, or if any person shall wilfully trespass on any Railway, or any of the stations or other works or premises connected therewith, and shall refuse to quit the same upon request to him made by any officer or agent of the said Company, every such person so offending, and all others aiding or assisting therein, shall and may be seized and detained by any such officer or agent, or any person whom he may call to his assistance, until such offender or offenders can be conveniently taken before some Justice of the Peace for the county or place wherein such offence shall be committed, and when convicted before such Justice as aforesaid (who is hereby authorized and required, upon complaint to him upon oath, to take cognizance thereof, and to act summarily in the premises,) shall, in the discretion of such Justice, forfeit to her Majesty any sum not exceeding five pounds, and in default of payment thereof shall or may be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two calendar months, such imprisonment to be determined on payment of the amount of the penalty.

17. And be it enacted, That no proceeding to be had and taken in pursuance of this Act shall be quashed or vacated for want of form, or be removed by certiorari, or by any other writ or process whatsoever, into any of her Majesty's Courts of Record at Westminster or elsewhere, by any law or statute to the contrary notwithstanding.

18. And whereas many Railway Companies are bound, by the provisions of the Acts of Parliament by which they are incorporated or regulated, to make, at the expense of the owner or occupier of lands adjoining the Railway, openings in the ledges or flanches thereof (except at certain places on such Railway in the said Acts specified,) for effecting communications between such Railway and any collateral or branch Railway to be laid down over such lands, and any disagreement or difference which shall arise as to the proper places for making any such openings in the ledges or flanches is by such Acts directed to be referred to the decision of any two Justices within their respective jurisdictions: And whereas it is expedient that so much of every clause, provision, and enactment in any Act of Parliament heretofore passed, as gives to any Justice or Justices the power of hearing or deciding upon any such disagreement or difference as to the proper places for any such openings in the ledges or flanches of any Railway, should be repealed; be it therefore enacted, That so much of every such clause, provision, and enactment as aforesaid shall be repealed.

19. And be it enacted, That in case any disagreement or difference shall arise between any such owner or occupier, or other persons, and any Railway Company, as to the proper places for any such openings in the ledges or flanches of any Railway (except at such places as aforesaid,) for the purpose of such communication, then the same shall be left to the decision of the Lords of the said Committee, who are hereby empowered to hear and determine the same in such way as they shall think fit, and their determination shall be binding on all parties.

20. And be it enacted, That all notices, returns, and other documents required by this Act to be given to or laid before the Lords of the said Committee; and all notices, appointments, requisitions, certificates, or other documents in writing, signed by one of the Secretaries of the said Committee, or by some officer appointed for that purpose by the Lords of the said Committee, and purporting to be made by the Lords of the said Committee, shall, for the purposes of this Act, be deemed to have been made by the Lords of the said Committee; and service of the same upon any one or more of the Directors of any Railway Company, or on the Secretary or clerk of the said Company, or by leaving the same with the clerk or officer at one of the stations belonging to the said Company, shall be deemed good service upon the said Company.

21. And be it enacted, That wherever the word "Railway" is used in this Act it shall be construed to extend to all Railways constructed under the powers of any Act of Parliament, and intended for the conveyance of passengers in or upon any carriages drawn or impelled by the power of steam or by any other mechanical power; and wherever the word "Company" is used in this Act it shall be construed to extend to and include the proprietors for the time being of any such Railway, whether a body corporate or individuals, and their lessees, executors, administrators, and assigns, unless the subject or context be repugnant to such construction.

22. And be it enacted, That this Act may be amended or repealed by any Act passed in the present Session of Parliament.

EXTENSION OF THE METROPOLITAN POLICE DISTRICT.

LONDON GAZETTE.—Tuesday, October 13.

At the Court at Claremont, the 3rd October, 1840, present, the Queen's most excellent Majesty in Council. Good Friday, or any day appointed for a public fast or thanksgiving; and likewise except on Mondays and Saturdays, on which last-mentioned days a magistrate shall attend at each of the said courts; and that on all days of attendance the magistrates shall sit from ten of the clock in the morning until three of the clock in the afternoon, and longer, if necessary, for the despatch of business.

And the most noble the Marquis of Normandy, one her of Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, is to give the necessary directions herein accordingly.

Law Reports.

COURT OF CHANCERY.—July 25.

FIELD v. CHURCHILL, Widow.

STATUTE of LIMITATIONS.—Costs of a false defence.

This bill was filed by the widow and executrix of a Mr. Churchill Field, a solicitor, for the recovery of a bill of costs due to him for services rendered to Mr. Benjamin Churchill, from the year 1826 to 1830, when Mr. Churchill died, leaving the plaintiff, his widow and executrix, directing by his will that his debts to be paid out of his personal estate. The bill was not filed till 1837, and the defendant set up the statute of limitations in answer to the bill. That turned out now to be a good defence, but at the time the bill was filed the law on the subject was in great doubt in consequence of the decision of LORD BROUGHAM, C. in Jones v. Scott, reversing, in 1831, a decree of SIR JOHN LEACH, then Master of the Rolls, and holding that a will in such cases created a trust for the benefit of creditors, taking their debts out of the statute of limitations. That decree was appealed from to the House of Lords; and the House of Lords, in 1838, reversed Lord Brougham's decree, and affirmed the decree of the Master of the Rolls. (a) The bill being filed in a doubtful state of the law, and with the opinion of such an eminent legal authority in favour of the plaintiff, she hoped that the court, in the exercise of its discretion, would order the bill to be dismissed without costs.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said he thought it a hard case on the plaintiff, who believed when she filed her bill that she had the law in her favour, but it turned out not to be so. His lordship feared he had no discretion.

Mr. Smythe, for the plaintiff, then said he would put the matter in another point of view. The defendant, besides setting up the statute of limitations, had stated in her answer to the bill, that the plaintiff could not claim the costs, inasmuch as Mr. Field had not accounted for a sum of £1,000 trust money which he received in his professional character as part of the purchase money of an estate sold for the benefit of Mr. Churchill. The defendant had wholly failed in making out that defence, but she had put the plaintiff to the necessity of going into a great deal of expensive evidence in order to disprove the charge, and the same being a false and improper defence, she ought not to be allowed the costs of such a defence.

Mr. Richards, for the defendant, said, if the matter could be sent before the Master it would be made to appear that there was at all events good grounds for believing that Mr. Field had not accounted for the £1,000, but the inquiry could not take place, as the court had no alternative but to dismiss the bill, and that, as they submitted, with costs.

Mr. Smythe admitted that Mr. Field had received the money, as he had acknowledged by a letter referred to on behalf of the defendant:

but the evidence showed he had handed over the whole sum to the trustee of the defendant.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said the case was very clear on the point. The defendant had no proof in support of this charge, except the letter acknowledging the receipt of the money from Mr. Field; but it was abundantly proved by the plaintiff's evidence that her husband had paid over the money to the trustees, one of whom admitted his liability. He had no doubt that if the law had been, with respect to the effect of the statute of limitations, what it was decided to be in this court in the case referred to, the plaintiff would have been entitled to a decree if the cause had come to a hearing before the appeal from this decision to the House of Lords. But the reversal of the decision in Jones v. Scott by that house left this court no other course than to dismiss the bill; but in his lordship's opinion, it would not be doing justice between the parties if he were to dismiss the bill with costs generally. He would not allow the costs of the false defence. He regretted that he could not dismiss the bill without any costs.

Bill dismissed accordingly.

VICE CHANCELLOR'S COURT--June 11.

SEDDON v. CONNELL AND OTHERS.

JOINT STOCK COMPANIES. Whether the public Officer representing the Company, can be sued by a partner in respect of a dispute between the latter and the rest of the Company.

This bill was filed by the plaintiff, for the purpose of setting aside a purchase made by him in August, 1836, of 500 shares in the "Northern and Central Joint Stock Banking Company," which had been originally established at Manchester in the year 1834. The plaintiff sought in the first place to have his purchase money refunded by the company, and for that purpose had made the defendant Connell, the public officer of the company, a defendant to the suit; and the bill further prayed that, in case the court should be opinion that the company, as a body, was not, through their officer, liable, that then the defendants, Moult and Evans, should be held personally responsible to him to the full extent of the purchase-money, paid by him for the shares in question. The grounds upon which the plaintiff rested his claims to the relief he now asked for, were allegations of fraud and misrepresentations as to the prosperous, flourishing, and profitable condition of the company's affairs at the time that he had made the purchase. It appeared by the bill, that at the time the plaintiff made the purchase of those shares, the defendants, Moult and Evans, and a person of the name of Hardie, since deceased, were, with others, directors of the company, and that Evans was the chief manager of the bank. The capital of the bank to be raised was to be 500,000*l.* in 50,000 shares of 10*l.* each. The plaintiff having some spare capital, was desirous of investing it in some safe and beneficial speculation. The directors of the bank, it was alleged, had, previously to plaintiff's purchase, from time to time published reports, setting forth the prosperous and flourishing state of the company's affairs and they had just previously to the plaintiff purchasing the shares declared a half-yearly dividend of 8*l.* per cent. upon the capital then invested. The plaintiff alleged that upon his application to Moult, Evans, and Hardie, they represented to him that the company's affairs were in such a prosperous and profitable condition, that the investment of his capital in the company's shares would be most advantageous, and he was thereby induced, relying upon their representations to be bond fide, to purchase and pay for the 500 shares in question. Subsequently to his obtaining his certificate for the shares, and signing the deed of settlement as a proprietor of the company's shares, he discovered that the representations made to him by Moult, Hardie, and Evans were fraudulent and untrue, and that the affairs of the bank were in a most embarrassed state, so much so that the company had to apply to the Bank of England for an advance of money. Upon the application to the Bank of England, an investigation into the company's affairs took place, the result of which, the plaintiff alleged, was to show that the directors were not, looking at the unprosperous state of the company's affairs at the time, justified in making such statements of its flourishing condition, or in declaring a dividend upon the company's stock. The plaintiff alleged that he had not as yet received any dividend upon his shares. The bill prayed relief, by having the sale of the shares to him set aside, on the ground that he had been alone induced to purchase them by the false and fraudulent representations of the directors, who were the company's agents, and that therefore the company, as a body, were liable.

The defendant, Mr. Connell, demurred for want of equity, submitting that under the recent acts of Parliaments regulating joint-stock banks the public officer, as representing the bank, cannot be sued in a dispute between the partners, which this in effect was. Mr. Moult demurred on the ground that the prayer for relief against him was only in the alternative; and each of these demurring parties insisted that the representatives of Hardie ought to be before the Court. The other defendant, Evans, raised a further objection by his demurrer—viz., that he was no shareholder, but a mere agent for the bank.

Mr. Jacob appeared in support of Mr. Connell's demurrer, and contended that the bill raised case to make the company, through their officers, liable to the plaintiff in equity. That the 7th of Geo. IV. and the 1st and 2nd Vict. enabling persons to sue Joint Stock Companies, through their public officers, applied only to cases in which strangers had demands on the company, or where partners in a company had demands on the company in any other character than as partners. The plaintiff's remedy was against those persons to whom the fraudulent representations were imputed.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR was of opinion, it is not a case in which the Court could grant relief, and therefore allowed the demurrer of Mr. Onnell.

BAIL COURT.—June 20.

REGINA v. THE BERKS AND WILTSHIRE CANAL COMPANY.

INCORPORATED JOINT STOCK COMPANIES.—

A MANDAMUS will not be granted upon the application of a party claiming compensation, unless there had been a positive refusal on the part of the Company to make it.

Mr. Erle had obtained a rule in last Hilary term on behalf of one Mr. Vines, to show cause why a mandamus should not be issued commanding The Berks and Wiltshire Canal Company, through its managing committee to make an offer of compensation to Mr. Vines, for damage done to him by the withdrawal from his use of the waters by which his mills had been kept in operation. It appeared that the Berks and Wiltshire Canal Company had been incorporated by the 1st & 2d Geo. 4, and was empowered to avail itself of any waters along its line, and that it was made liable to give equitable compensation to all persons whose property should be injured by any such appropriations.

Mr. Serg. Ludlow, on the part of the company, now showed cause against the rule. He stated that the affidavit of Mr. Vines set forth that from the 7th of April, 1833, down to October, the water from his property, "The Vest Mills," had been at intervals withdrawn by the company, to his serious injury; that on the 9th of November last he had made an application to the representative officer of the committee of the company for compensation: that he was then told that a meeting of the committee was announced for the 26th of December, at which, however, it was not usual for any business to be transacted, and that there would be a subsequent meeting in the month of March, in this year, at which his demand might be taken into consideration. The act for incorporating the canal company had directed that, in cases where parties were dissatisfied with proffered compensation, the matter should be referred to a jury, provided the complainant entered into a bond to pay the costs incurred if the decision of the jury should be adverse. This bond had been executed by Mr. Vines, on the 16th of December. No proceeding had been taken on the part of the company towards settling this question of remuneration, and Mr. Vines, therefore, thought proper to move the court for this rule in the month of January last. He submitted that, without going further into the case, there was not sufficient ground made out to induce the court to proceed to the extreme proceeding of issuing the mandamus. The committee of the company had not, in fact, refused to make compensation; nor could it be said to have neglected the application of Mr. Vines. He had been made aware that a really operative meeting of the committee would not take place till the month of March, and had thought proper, instead of waiting for that occurrence, to make the motion for this rule in Hilary term. This was not a mode of proceeding in which he could expect the concurrence of the court.

Mr. Erle, in support of the rule, submitted that the committee of the company had acted with an indifference to the claims of that gentleman which proved that they had no intention to remunerate him, if they could avoid doing so. By the act incorporating the company they were bound to make an offer of compensation. Here they had done nothing of the kind. The committee had not acted with fair dealing when they advertised a meeting for the month of December, which they did not intend should at all take place. Again, they could have met at any time, and all the trouble which they would have incurred in regard to this demand would have been simply to make an offer. Had Mr. Vines been discontented with that, it would have been for him then to have had recourse to a jury. It did not appear that, at the meeting in the month of March, any notice had been taken of Mr. Vines' claim. This appeared from the rule having been drawn up for Easter term after the month of March. No intimation whatever was given to the court to indicate any such conclusion.

COLERIDGE, J. said that following the case of The King v. the Abergavenny Canal Comp. (a) he should be compelled to refuse this mandamus. There it had been distinctly declared in the judgment of the court that a mandamus would not be granted, unless there had been a positive refusal on the part of the company to attend to the application made to it. In this case there had not been a refusal previous to the application to this court, to entertain the application of Mr. Vines, either directly or by implication. That person had not called for any special meeting of the committee of the company. In regard to there not having been any notice taken of Mr. Vines' claim at the meeting in March, it might be said that the committee, finding that hostile proceedings had been resorted to, might consider itself justified in waiting to see the result of that step. The application for the mandamus was, in fact, premature, and it could not be acceded to.

Rule refused, but without costs.

COMMON PLEAS, June .

Sittings in Banco.

CURTIS v. RICHARDS.

EVIDENCE—An I O U for money—without an Address—Whether in the absence of evidence to the contrary the possession of the instrument is sufficient evidence of the holding party representing "U."

STAMP.—Whether such an instrument is a negotiable instrument and requires a Stamp.

Mr. Serjeant Bompas moved for a new trial in this cause, on the grounds of misdirection and for want of sufficient evidence of title in the plaintiff, to the instrument upon which the action was brought, which was to the following effect—

"Jan. 11, 1839.

"I O U £20.

"JAS. RICHARDS."

No payee appeared upon the instrument, the defendant refused to pay it when presented by the plaintiff, in whose possession it was, and the latter thereupon brought his action of assumpsit for money lent. The defendant pleaded non assumpsit, and the cause was tried at the London sittings after last Hilary Term, before MAULE, B. who directed the jury that, without evidence to the contrary, they must presume the I O U as having been given to the plaintiff by the defendant for money lent, of which it was sufficient evidence, and the jury accordingly found for the plaintiff.

Mr. Serjeant Bompas now contended that, if the position in which the learned Baron had put the evidence could be maintained, then the I O U became a negotiable instrument, and should have been stamped before admitted in evidence, and cited Green v. Davis. (a)

TINDAL, C. J. said—This is an instrument or contract in which only two persons can be made parties, viz. "U and I." The debtor or party making it represents "I," and the creditor or party presenting it for payment represents "U," and it is mostly given on the spur of the moment for a loan of money. I cannot think but that the case was very properly put to the jury, and that the Stamp Act has nothing to do with it. Fisher v. Leslie, (b) was a similar case, where there was no address upon the I O U, and no such objections were taken.—Rule refused.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT—Oct. 19.

CASE OF THE EARL OF CARDIGAN.

OFFENCE of DUELING.—First class of offences within the Statute 1 & 2 Vict. c. 85.

The RECORDER'S CHARGE to the GRAND JURY.

The RECORDER addressed the grand jury to the following effect:—His lordship observed that on looking over the calendar, he found amongst the parties committed for trial, there were several for cutting and wounding, forgery and uttering forged instruments, three for manslaughter, and one for murder on the high seas. Seven persons were also charged with insubordination on board a vessel on the high seas. Besides these, a number of prisoners were charged with larceny, but none of the cases appeared to be of a character to require any observations from him respecting them. Having so far disposed of the contents of the calendar, it now became his duty to refer to a case, or rather to two cases, in which the parties were not in custody, but had been bailed by the magistrate. The depositions in the case had, however, been returned to the court, and he could, therefore, make the observations that arose upon the facts detailed in them. The charge he alluded to was one where a hostile meeting or duel took place, and shots were exchanged, one of which took effect, and he was not aware that a similar case had ever before been laid before a grand jury, and it would, therefore, not be considered unnecessary that he should make a few observations upon it to them. The charge was framed under an act passed in the first year of the reign of her present Majesty, but up to the present time it had never occurred where fatal consequences did not ensue, that the parties were charged with felony, and such an offence had, consequently, never been made the subject of inquiry in a criminal court of justice. Still, however, it would be their duty, if they thought the facts clearly made out, and that the case came within the statute which he should presently more particularly refer to, to return a true bill against the parties, and thus put the case in train to undergo inquiry before the learned judge. The statute in question was the 1st Victoria, c. 85, and by various sections different enactments were made. By the second section it was enacted, that whoever should administer poison, stab, cut, or wound, or by any means whatever cause any bodily injury to any person, with intent to commit murder, shall be guilty of felony, and suffer death. This was the first class of offences, created by the statute. By the word "wound" there could be very little doubt that a shot or injury produced by a bullet was meant, as well as a cut or other description of injury. It was a comprehensive term, and the question here was, whether the case in question came within the letter, spirit, and intention of the legislature.

framing the statute. The next section to which he would call their attention comprehended the case where no wound had been received, but here there was still an attempt to commit murder by pulling the trigger of a pistol or endeavouring to strangle or suffocate any person, and where the party was guilty of felony, subject to transportation for life, or for a period of not less than fifteen years, or to imprisonment for any period not exceeding three years. The fourth section enacted, that any person who shall shoot or pull the trigger of any pistol with intent to maim and disable, or to do any person any grievous bodily harm, shall, on proof of the charge, be liable to transportation for life, or not less than seven years, or imprisonment for not more than three years; and it would be seen that in this section, although the intent was not to commit murder, still the punishment was the same as in the former section. He drew their attention to these sections to show that the offence alleged against these parties was of a most serious character; and subjected them to penalties of the most severe description; and they would therefore feel it to be their duty to watch the case very closely, and see whether the facts of the present case clearly came within the meaning and intention of the statute. The seventh section referred to principals of the second degree. Accessories before the fact were punishable in the same manner as the principals, and accessories after the fact were only liable to a term of imprisonment. Lord Hale seemed to entertain a doubt, whether the second of a party injured in a hostile meeting was liable to punishment in the same manner as the second of his opponent, and he had made some valuable remarks upon the subject. The matter would therefore require to be considered with the greatest and most extreme caution. Still, however, if the facts laid before them clearly brought the case within the spirit and meaning of the sections of the act he had referred to, it would be their duty, however painful, to give effect to the law, and leave the consideration of the consequences entirely out of the question. On looking at the act called the Statute of Stabbing, he found that although the words there made use of were comprehensive enough to include a particular case, the spirit of the act was to be taken into consideration. Sir Michael Forster, in his valuable work on the subject, said that, where a case came within the meaning of the act, the party was charged with murder under the common law, and also under the statute, and where justification was shown, a conviction rarely followed. The Statute of Stabbing was passed to meet the case of persons carrying short daggers, &c., for the purpose of avenging any trivial provocation, and where it was shown that the party had committed the offence in the heat of the moment, he was held to be only guilty of manslaughter, although the punishment was still of a most severe description. The Recorder then alluded to the work of Mr. Sergeant Russell, on crimes and indictable misdemeanors, and read various extracts applying to the case under discussion, and to cases of duels, where an ineffectual exchange of shots had taken place between the parties. The present case, however, differed very materially from the one he had alluded to, because, in the charge now under consideration, one of the parties had received his adversary's bullet. It was, moreover, a strange fact that, down to the present year, notwithstanding the many instances of parties meeting in the manner alluded to, no instance had occurred of the parties being prosecuted in a criminal court where no fatal consequences attended the duel. There was, therefore, no similar case to refer to as a precedent. It was, however, a general rule of law, that if one party should seek the death of another, in a private quarrel, he would be guilty of the crime of murder; if, however, two parties should meet, casually, and a quarrel ensued, and they fought upon the instant, or went into a field and fought at once, in the event of the death of either from the rencontre, the offence would only be manslaughter. In many cases of duel where death ensued, the jury had either only found the party guilty of manslaughter, or acquitted him altogether; but in all such cases it was very material to see whether the duel was a deliberate one, or whether it took place before the blood had time to cool. It appeared upon the depositions in the present case, that the ground was measured, and the parties took their places, and fired. One of the parties appeared to be a peer of the realm, but this did not at all affect them in the discharge of their duty, and if they thought it was clearly made out that it was a deliberate duel, and that there was an intention on the part of each to murder, or to maim and disable the other, then they would return a bill in the same way they would in an ordinary case. With regard to the seconds or accessories, it was his duty to tell them his opinion, that if they found the facts proved, the seconds were equally guilty. A difficulty had been felt in law in cases of this description, when an exchange of shots ineffectually had taken place, as to whether the offence came within the act of parliament, but here it was quite clear that one of the parties had been actually wounded. Having made these remarks he must request them to consider the case with great attention, and to remember that it was the duty of the prosecutor to prove the offence as charged against the parties, and if it did not clearly appear that there was an intention to kill and murder, they ought not to find the bill; and he might at the same time remind them that it did not of necessity follow that because parties went out to fight a duel, that they should intend to kill each other. While making these remarks, he wished not to be understood as desiring at all to interfere with their privileges, but to impress upon them, in so novel a case, the necessity of a searching inquiry. There could be no doubt that under a false feeling of honour, the practice of duelling had been frequently resorted to, but in many cases solely from such feeling, but it was clearly illegal, and if the grand jury thought the facts were proved in the present case, as applying to the statute, they ought not to let any feeling of sympathy for the motives of the parties operate to prevent them from doing their duty to their country. The Recorder then proceeded to inform the grand jury that if, upon inquiry, they should consider the felony not to be clearly made out, the parties would still be liable to punishment for a breach of the peace.

October 20.

The Grand Jury returned a true bill of indictment against The Right Hon. James Thomas Brudenell, Earl of Cardigan, for FELONY, charging him with firing a pistol loaded with gunpowder and a leaden bullet, at and against Capt. Harvey Garnett Phipps Tuckett, with intent to murder him, or do him some grievous bodily harm.

The Grand Jury also returned a true bill of indictment against Capt. John Douglas, (the second of Lord Cardigan.)

The Grand Jury threw out the bills presented against Capt. Tuckett, and Henry Maxwell Wainwright, (his second).

October 22.

Mr. Adolphus, applied to the Court in reference to the case standing upon the list of parties for trial of James Thomas Brudenell, Earl of Cardigan, and said, your lordships are aware that Lord Cardigan, being a peer of the realm, cannot be tried in this court, and I have, therefore, in the first place to move that that name be expunged from the list of this court, as the trial of his lordship must come on before another tribunal.

BOSANQUET, J., the proper course would be to remove the indictment by a writ of certiorari to the House of Lords, and I am not aware that any order of this court is necessary.

Mr. Adolphus, that would, no doubt, be the course to be adopted, but his lordship was under recognizances to attend this court, and those recognizances ought to be discharged.

BOSANQUET, J.—The writ should issue before the recognizances are discharged.

Mr. Adolphus—There is some difficulty in the case, in consequence of the circumstance of the House of Lords not being now sitting.

ERSKINE, J.—The Lord High Steward may at once issue a writ of certiorari to remove the case to his court.

Mr. Adolphus—Very well, my lord. I also find at No. 8 on the list, the name of John Douglas. That gentleman is charged with the same offence as the noble earl, but as he is only a principal in the second degree, I have to suggest to your lordships that it would not be advisable that his trial should come on before that of the principal, and that it would be more convenient that Mr. Douglas's trial should not take place until after that of Lord Cardigan.

BOSANQUET, J.—I agree that it would be inconvenient, but as Mr. Douglas is under recognizances, to appear to take his trial, it will be necessary that something should be done with respect to those recognizances, and it would, perhaps, be better that all the recognizances should be respited until next sessions.

Mr. Bodkin for the defendants. Are we to understand, that whether the certiorari is issued or not, the recognizances are respited?

BOSANQUET, J.—Yes, I think so.

It was then arranged that the recognizances of both the defendants should be respited until the next session of the court.

ACTION OF EJECTMENT.

ANSWER TO PROBLEM XV.—VOL. IV. By E. A.

EJECTMENT—For what will this Action lie?

1. 1. An Action of Ejectment is the common remedy to recover land, manors, messuages, wastes and all other corporeal hereditaments whatever: and, also, all parts shares and estates therein, whether the same be freehold, copyhold, leasehold, or held according to any other tenure or tenancy, provided the action (except in a few instances,) is brought within twenty years next after the time at which the right to bring it first accrued to the person bringing the same: (3 & 4. W. 4. c. 27.) and therefore if a man being in the possession of such land, &c. and, having the legal right therein, be deprived of the enjoyment thereof, by another person who dispossesses or turns him out, and gets into, and retains the possession, a remedy lies to regain the estate by the former, by means of the action of ejectment, which may be also maintained by a man in the possession of premises merely as tenant from year to year is forcibly expelled therefrom, because the law allows that priority of possession which was in him to be a sufficient title to support this action against a wrong-doer, disseiser, where the latter can shew no title. (Doe v. Dyeball, M. & M. 346.) and so where a person obtains possession of premises by the consent of the rightful owner for a limited purpose, or from his servant in a fraudulent manner, and then excludes the licensor, and claims a title to the premises himself, the person from whom the possession was so obtained may maintain this action on proof of the consent or license only. (Doe v. Baytop, 3 Ad. & Ell. 188.) And in a case where one person had been in possession of land for upwards of twenty years, and another person had subsequently been in possession of it for a less time than such number of years, the former was held to be entitled to recover the premises by this action. (Doe v. Cooke, 7 Bing, 346.) But though the act 3 & 4 W. 4 c. 27, is retrospective, and attributes to past possession of the species contemplated by its provisions, the character and consequences of adverse possession, yet it must be so far qualified in construction as to exclude from its operation cases, in which the state of circumstances within its perview had existed for the full period requisite to complete the bar, but had ceased to exist before the passing of the act, and in which, therefore, the title had re-assumed its rightful aspect: thus, in 1807, A. seised in fee, put his eldest son B. into possession, which possession B. held as tenant at will to A. without paying any rent till B.'s death in 1831, when, of course, the tenancy determined. A. died in 1833, having devised the estate to trustees. On the trial of an ejectment brought by the heir of B. who relied on the effect of B.'s possession in gaining a fee by force of the act, (ss. 2. 7.) to recover the possession from B.'s widow, who had held it since his death, a verdict was passed for the defendant, and the court refused to disturb it, observing that the monstrous consequences which would result from the construction insisted upon, shewed that it was not contemplated, for, according to that construction, whenever a party had held, as tenant at will, for a year, and had then continued in possession twenty years without paying any rent, he might at any subsequent time, after giving up the possession, claim title to the premises, and turn out his landlord: that the case would have been quite different if the tenant at will had continued in possession, but that here, after the possession had been long determined, it was contended that a fee simple arose by the passing of the act, which could not be. The result was, that no title whatever was acquired by means of the bygone possession of the tenant at will, (Doe v. Thompson 6 Ad. & El. 721. 1 Hayes Convey. 242.)

An ejectment may be maintained against a person who came into the possession lawfully, as under a negotiation for a lease, provided the tenancy at will, which generally in this and similar cases arises by construction of law, is determined by a demand of possession before the action is brought. (Right v. Beard, 12. E. 210.) But anything equivalent to a demand of possession will be sufficient to determine these estates at will, so as to entitle the owner of the premises to support an action for their recovery, thus, a threat "to take measures to recover possession," has been deemed sufficient for that purpose. (Doe v. Price, 9 Bing. 356.)

Where a man is entitled to the possession of land, &c. after the determination of some partial or prior estate created therein in favour of some other person, and such last mentioned person, or those claiming under him, neglect or refuse to deliver the possession of the premises to the party entitled thereto, after the determination of the prior estate, the latter can enforce his right by means of an action of ejectment. As an instance,—where A. being entitled to land for an estate in fee simple, or for such other estate as will enable him so to do, grants a lease to B. to hold for the term of twenty-one years, or for the term of his natural life. Now, if in the one case, B. himself, or, in the other, B.'s representatives, at the expiration of the term, or at his death, retains the possession from A. the latter will be entitled to recover it by this action. So if A. being entitled as above mentioned, conveys to B. to the use of C. for the term of twenty-one years, or for the term of his natural life, and after the determination of the estate so conveyed to the use of C. to the use of D. and his heirs, and C. in the first case, or his representatives in the second, refuses to quit the possession when the prior estate shall have been determined, then D. may enforce his right by an action of ejectment.

And, in general, where a man in possession of lands, &c. in his own legal right, is by any means removed therefrom, and kept thereout, by any other person, and no specific statutory or other remedy exists for recovering the possession, this action may be said to lie, as being the only specific general remedy for recovering the possession of land and other hereditaments corporeal.

2. As regards the recovery of possession by a landlord as a general rule, I may observe that in all cases where a tenant from year to year, or for any greater or less period, refuses after the usual or conventional notice to quit has been given, or the tenancy has expired by effluxion of time to deliver up the possession to his landlord, the latter may maintain an action of ejectment for the premises against the tenant, on proof of the tenancy and its determination, by notice to quit or effluxion of time, in which action the tenant cannot dispute his landlord's title to the premises.

If the tenant forfeit his term by the non-payment of rent, the landlord may proceed to recover possession of the premises by ejectment, but in these cases a distinction must be observed: first, where the tenant leaves a sufficient distress upon the premises to answer the amount of rent due; and, secondly, where there is not such a sufficient distress, because if there is a sufficient distress on the premises before the landlord can bring an action of ejectment, nay, before the forfeiture is incurred, unless there is a mutual understanding to the contrary, a demand of the rent must be made on the premises. For forfeitures are not favoured by the Common Law, and it therefore requires great strictness to be observed in cases of this description. The necessary formalities will be found particularly in 4 Western's Conveyancing, 25. n. (a.) and see also Archb. Pract. by Chitty, Ed. 7. 773. But if, upon search, there is no distress to be found upon the premises, then the landlord may proceed to recover the possession by an action of ejectment, under 4 G. 2. c. 28. which enacts that in all cases between landlord and tenant as often as it shall happen that one half year's rent shall be in arrear, and the landlord or lessor to whom the same is due, hath right by law to enter for the non-payment thereof, i. e. where, by the express terms of the lease, a right of entry has been reserved, such land lessor may, without any formal demand or retry, serve a declaration in ejectment for the recovery of the premises, and recover them therein, provided no sufficient distress was to be found on the premises, and unless the tenant pay the rent and costs within six calendar months, he is to be deprived of all relief at law, or equity, and the tenancy is absolutely determined; although the lease expressly requires lawful demand, no demand is necessary to proceed under this act, the service of the declaration being substituted for such demand. Arch.

774. See Doe d. Mayhew v. Ashly, 9. reported ante vol. 2. p. 40.

For enabling landlords more speedily to recover possession of lands and tenements unlawfully held over by tenants, an act was passed in the first year of the reign of Geo. 4. (c. 87.) which enacts that where the term or interest of any tenant holding under a lease or agreement in writing, any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, for any term or number of years, certain, or from year to year, shall have expired, or been terminated by the landlord or tenant by regular notice to quit, and such tenant, or any one claiming or claiming by or under him, shall refuse to deliver up possession accordingly, after lawful demand in writing made thereof, the landlord may thereupon proceed by Action of ejectment for recovering the possession, addressing a notice to the tenant at the foot of the declaration, requiring him to appear on the first day of the next term—to be made defendant—and find bail if ordered, as mentioned in the rule.

If the tenant appears at the day prescribed, neglecting to appear then, after affidavit of service of the declaration and notice: on producing the lease or agreement, or a counterpart or duplicate thereof, and proving its execution, and on proof of the enjoyment of the premises under the lease or agreement by affidavit—that the tenant's interest has expired or has been determined—and, that the possession has not been demanded, the landlord may move for judgment nisi why the tenant should not besides entering into the common consent rule, understand that in case judgment shall pass for the plaintiff, to allow judgment to be entered up against him, as of the term next preceding the day of trial, and also why he should not enter into cognizance with two sufficient sureties to pay costs and damages. If cause is not shewn against the rule, or on cause being shewn it is made absolute, then if the tenant conforms thereto the landlord will be entitled to judgment. On the trial of an action under this act, the consent rule is evidence of lease, and ouster, and in case of the tenant's default, the jury may give the plaintiff damages for mesne profits down to the time of verdict, or to some preceding day, but the judge may stay execution until the fifth day of the next term absolutely, if he considers the verdict contrary to evidence.

If the landlord, proceeding under the statute, gets non-suited, or a verdict passes against him,
he will be liable to double costs.

It would be beside my present purpose to notice the decisions of the Courts on this statute other than by referring to the last edition of Arch. Pract. where the most material of them will, I believe, be found. I therefore proceed to notice another Act passed by the Legislature in favour of landlords, (viz.) the 1st W. 4. c. 70.
before the passing of which, if the tenancy expired, and the right of entry accrued on or after the first day of Hilary term, or on or after the first day of Trinity term, the cause could not be tried at the following assizes, this was occasioned by the necessity of serving the declaration prior to the commencement of the term, and owing to this, landlords were frequently kept out of their property some time: but this statute, in substance, enacts that in Actions of Ejectment by landlord against tenant, or persons claiming under him, where the tenancy expired, or right of entry accrued in or after Hilary or Trinity term, the lessor of the plaintiff, within ten days after such expiration or accrual, may serve a declaration entitled of the day (whether in term or vacation,) next after the day of the demise in such declaration, and subscribe a notice thereto, requiring the tenant to appear and plead within ten days, and proceedings may be had as if the declaration had been served before the preceding term. The statute, however, contains a proviso that no judgment shall be signed against the casual ejector, until default of appearance and plea within such ten days, and that six clear days notice of trial shall be given to the defendant before the commission day of the assizes at which such ejectment is intended to be tried. And that at any time before the trial a Judge may, on summons and order, give further time to plead, stay, or set aside proceedings, or postpone the trial till the next assizes, (sec. 39, see Arch. Pr.)

A landlord may waive his peculiar privilege of proceeding to recover possession of premises under these acts, and may proceed as in common cases of ejectment.

As to the maintaining of this action against a tenant for forfeiture, vide infra subdivision 5.

3. A mortgagee having the legal estate, may, without prejudice to his other remedies, as soon as the mortgaged estate becomes absolute at law, maintain an action of ejectment against the mortgagor in possession, in which the only proof required will be the execution of the mortgage deed, a previous demand of possession being unnecessary: but, if the mortgagee treats the occupier under a demise made since the mortgage, as his tenant, it will be advisable to give him a notice. A stipulation under which the mortgagor would be entitled to hold until a day certain, as in the common case of a covenant by the mortgagee that the mortgagor shall hold until default in payment of the mortgage money, at the expiration of the six months, operates as an actual demise to the mortgagor by the mortgagee until that day. A mortgagee bringing an action of ejectment against a third person claiming under a pre-existing title to the mortgage, must shew a legal right to oust him, as in the case where a person held as tenant from year to year, at the time of the mortgage; here, before the mortgagee can recover the possession from the tenant, he must shew the tenancy to have determined by notice to quit, and if circumstances concur whereby the tenant becomes tenant to the mortgagee, as by a continual payment of rent to him, the mortgagee will ipso facto become the landlord of the premises, and be entitled to pursue the special remedies I have previously noticed. (See Rosc. Ev. N. P. 457.)

4. A vendor of real property, who permits the assumption of the possession thereof by the purchaser or vendee, prior to the completion of the contract whereby the purchaser becomes tenant at will to the seller, the latter may be ejected by the former, but it will only be on a demand of the possession, unless when the purchaser entered into possession he agreed to quit it if he should not pay the purchase money on a given day, or the like, in which cases an Action of Ejectment will lie without notice, or a demand of possession on non-performance of the agreement, which operates as a clause of re-entry on breach of a covenant in a lease. (See 1 Sug. V. & P. 378.) On this principle, if possession be given to a vendee upon payment of part of the purchase money, and interest is paid on the remainder, twenty years possession by the purchaser is no bar to the action, because the rule construing such a possession as a tenancy prevails, and where a purchaser whom the vendee lets into possession refuses to complete the purchase, and assigns his interest, the assignment determines the will without demand, (see Ib.)

Possessions under agreements for leases, &c being purchases, pro tanto, are reducible to the same rules, and so of cases of possession under a void or imperfect conveyance or lease, or during a negotiation for a new lease, by an original termor. In cases of this and the like description, where a party comes into the possession lawfully, he cannot be ejected until such possession is determined by demand thereof, by the breaking off the treaty, or in some other manner; and the letting into possession, not the agreement, constitutes, in these cases, the making a tenancy at will, in preference to considering the party as trespasser, which he would otherwise be. Where the vendor of a term before all the purchase money was paid, agreed with the vendee that he should have possession of the premises till a given day, paying the reserved rent in the mean time, and that in case he did not pay the residue of the purchase money on that day, he should forfeit the portion he had already paid, and not be entitled to an assignment of the lease. Lord Ellenborough held that the agreement operated like a clause of re-entry in a lease on a breach of covenant, and that the residue of the purchase money not being paid on the appointed day, the vendee's interest ceased, and he might be ejected without any notice. (Doe v. Sayer 3. Camp. 8.) And if a third person under such circumstances has come in as tenant to the vendee, ejectment may be maintained against him without notice. (Doe v. Boulton, 6 M. & S. 148.) So where a man gets into possession of a house without the privity of the landlord, and the parties afterwards entered into a negotiation for a lease, but disagreed about the value of the fixtures, the same learned Judge was of opinion that if there was a tenancy of any sort, it was a tenancy at sufferance, and a notice to quit was unnecessary. (Doe v. Quigly, 2. Camp. 505. Et vide Doe v. Lawder, 1 Stark. 308. 2. B. N. C. 749. Rosc. Ev. N. P. 436 et. Seq.) But the opinion does not seem at all to harmonize with the received definition of a tenancy by substance. In the principal case, the party evidently entered into possession adversely, and without any title whatsoever. He, therefore, it would seem, could not come within Blackstone's definition of a tenant at sufferance. "Where one comes into possession of land by lawful title, but keeps it afterwards without any title at all" (2. com. 150, and see also Watk. Conv. 2. 8 ed.) it would seem more proper if he had been treated as a trespasser under these circumstances ab initio.

5. The rights and privileges of a lessor in bringing an action of ejectment have been partially considered under some of the previous subdivisions which I have adopted in my answer. What, therefore, I am now more particularly to direct my attention to, is the maintenance of this action by a lessor for forfeiture, &c.

Disclaimer confers on the landlord an immediate right of ejecting the lessee or tenant from the premises, which he refuses to acknowledge as the property of the landlord, and so will break of covenants or conditions, but the forfeiture in these cases is waived in a variety of means, and clauses conferring a right of re-entry superadded.

forfeiture express or implied, are generally on account of the averseness of the law to forfeitures, construed strictly, and in these cases of ejectment the tenant or lessee may obtain particulars of the breaches which are to be laid to his charge.

6. A tenant, by elegit, or, in other words, an execution creditor, obtains from the sheriff, in the first instance, legal possession of his debtor's lands only, (or rather a right of entry,) and not actual possession. If, therefore, the execution creditor cannot obtain the actual and sought for possession of their lands without force, he should proceed with the ordinary remedy by ejectment, (Arch. P. 447,) which he will be entitled to maintain on proof of the judgment. The elegit taken out upon it, and the inquisition and return thereupon, (B. N. P. 104); and in case of his eviction before the debt be wholly levied, he may recover the premises again by ejectment.

7. A lord of a manor being disseised thereof, may have recourse to the common remedy by ejectment to recover it, and an action of ejectment lies as well for a moiety of a manor as for the whole, (Woolrych on Commons. 199.)

Waste is an injury to the Lord for which this remedy by ejectment will lie at his suit to recover the locus vastatus, (Doe v. Clement, 2 M. & S. 68.) And as a wrong without a remedy is abhorrent to the laws of England, a remedy by ejectment lies for the lord of a manor to enforce and uphold his customary right of reassuming the estate on its escheating or becoming forfeited by some of the long list of tenurial offences incident to this species of property, and which will be found detailed in 1 Wat. Co. 390, et seq., and are in the eye of the law wrongs to the Lord.

8. The widow of a copyhold tenant may maintain ejectment for her free bench, where the custom of the manor acknowledges and permits that estate, and then to such extent only as the special custom of the manor warrants, and she may maintain this action anterior to admittance unless her claim be made in the nature of dower, for in the latter case the ejectment will not lie before assignment in case of a refusal, to which end she must levy a plaint in the nature of a writ of dower in the Lord's Court, (2 Wat. Co. 59)

II.—1. Parties claiming lands, &c., jure representationis, as heirs at law, and executors or administrators may maintain this action for the premises, which, in default or account of the defective nature of a testamentary disposition by the last proprietor, devolves upon them as the persons marked out by the known rules of law as successors to the property. And first, of the heir at law. He may by this action recover the possession of such property as the law transmits to him, not only in cases of abatement, but in all other cases where the premises, of which his ancestor had been seised, or of which he had had what was equivalent thereto in those instances wherein seisin was unnecessary, were withheld from such ancestor. But the late Act for amending the law of inheritance has abolished the maxim non jus sed seisin facit stipitem from the 31st December, 1833, by enacting, that in future, descent shall be traced from the purchaser as defined in the interpretation clause of the Act. Secondly, of an executor or administrator. All terms for years being personal estate, vest in the executor or administrator of a deceased proprietor immediately on his death, and this class of representatives may maintain an action of ejectment for the recovery of the leasehold estates of their testator or intestate, when he is ejected in his lifetime, or where the possession has been wrongfully detained from them since his decease, on proof of the testator or intestate's title and death, and their admission to administration of his goods, chattels, and effects. It also seems that an executor may maintain an action of ejectment for an ouster of the testator, although he were seised in fee, because in such a case the executor may proceed in this form of action for damages only, in the same manner as a lessee, whose lease expires pendente lite. (See Comyn's Dig. Administrator, B. 10; Toller on Executors. 158, 434.)

2. A devisee of freehold property may maintain this action to gain possession of the premises devised to him in case the heir at law or any other person after the devisors death intrudes or remains in the premises adversely to the possession of the devisee, and in an action of ejectment, by such devisee, he will be required to prove in cases where the devisors died, previously to the first day of January, 1838, the title of the devisors, his seisin in fee both at the time of making the will, and at the time of his death, unless being disseised previous to the execution of the will, he re-entered between the date thereof and the time of his decease. He will also have to prove the regular and due execution of the will, and that by production of the will itself, unless it be lost: the death of the testator and the determination of prior estates (if any) were limited to take effect previous to the interest devised to him. In actions of ejectment, however, by devisees, where the devisors died subsequently to the first of January, 1838, instead of proving that he was seised in fee, it will be sufficient to prove that he was entitled to the estate devised, that is, to the property in dispute, either at law or in equity, at the time of his decease; 7 W. 4, & 1 V. c. 26, s. 3.

Where a devisee was also heir at law to the devisors, and elected to take the property in the latter character, it was held that this was not such a disclaimer as prevented him from afterwards maintaining this action as devisee. (Doe v. Smith, 6 Barn. & Cres. 112.)

A devisee of copyhold lands claiming under a will made antecedent to the first January, 1838, can maintain an action of ejectment to recover the possession on proof of seisin in the devisor, a surrender to the use of will when necessary, and the will itself, which it is said was not before the late statute necessarily reducible into writing. (1 Wat. Co. 130.)

3. Trustees, when the requirements of the trusts conferred upon them, renders it necessary for them to take the legal estate for certain definite purposes, may maintain an action of ejectment to recover the possession of that estate in case it is withheld from them, and they will be considered as the proprietors of the estate at law, according to the quantity of the estate conferred upon them in respect of such trusts, and as a plaintiff in this action must prove a legal title, it is always when the equitable owner of an estate seeks its recovery thereby, to use name of the trustee in whom the legal estate is vested.

Under this division it remains to be noticed, first, that the assignees of bankrupts and insolvents are invested with the same remedies, by action, for all civil injuries with respect to property or estates which has passed to them by virtue of their appointment, as the bankrupt or insolvent had in case they had not become such. See Arch. B. by Flather, 354; Arch. Ab. of Imp. for Debt Act, 76: it, therefore, I apprehend follows, that in such cases these assignees may as well bring an action of ejectment to recover possession of real estates to which the bankrupt or insolvent is entitled, as of such as are withheld from them; and, second, that a corporation may also sue in ejectment, the declaration necessarily alleging a devise by deed, proof of which is not however required. (Furley v. Wood, 1 Es. 198.)

4. A guardian in socage may maintain an action of ejectment to recover possession of premises to which his ward is entitled, and from the possession of which he is deforced by a person having no title thereto. (Osborn v. Carden, Plow. R. 293; Wade v. Baker, 1 Lord R. 131.) and so may a guardian appointed by deed or will under the Statute 12 Car. II. c. 24, ss. 8, 9, and to enable a guardian of an infant copyhold tenant to perform the duties relating to the customary estate, it seems reasonable that amongst the other powers with which he is by custom invested that of bringing an action of ejectment should now exist. (See 2 Wat. Co. 2. 76. et seq.)

5. An action of ejectment is sometimes necessary by or against a number of persons bearing a relation by unity of possession at the least to each other, and it is occasionally a means of litigation between persons themselves having a connection in title or tenancy in the very premises to obtain some interest in which their judicial contest is directed. These cases are divisible into three classes, and first, of joint tenants. In actions by joint tenants against strangers, they may allege the fictitious demise to have been joint or several, and will be entitled to recover on the same title as persons sui juris individually. One joint tenant may maintain this action against another when his partner keeps him out or deprives him of his share of the possession or profits; second.

Of coparceners, these may maintain ejectment under precisely the same circumstances as joint tenants may, whom they most resemble; but, thirdly, there is a distinction between these two and Tenants in common, inasmuch as the fictitious demise by this species of owners must be several. (Doe v. Errington, 1 Ad. & Ell. 750) in other respects except the instance which I am about to notice, the action is governed by similar principles. It is, however, to be borne in mind that in an action of ejectment by one joint tenant or coparcener against another, a judge will, on application, order that the defendant be only called upon to admit by the consent rule the fictitious demise and entry. Thus leaving the plaintiff to prove an actual ouster, but this privilege extends not to tenants in common, and is moreover subject to a proviso that the plaintiff's title as joint tenant or coparcener is not disputed. (Doe Ginger v. Roe, 7 Taunt. 397. See Doe v. Cuff, 1 Camp. 173; Anon. 7, Mod. 39; Doe v. Roe, 4 D. 628.)

6. A Commoner lawfully seised of an appendant or appurtenant common is in a situation to proceed against all parties who molest him in the enjoyment of his rights, and where he is dis-seised or ousted from such a common, his remedy (inter alia) is by an action of ejectment, which is now the usual proceeding where the mischief has accrued within twenty years; but if the common be a common in gross, an ejectment will not lie because the sheriff can give no possession of it. (See Woolrych on rights of Common, 224, et seq.)

Another possessory action, and the one most usually resorted to in questions relating to common rights, is an action on the case for disturbance of common. (See Ros. Ev. 357.)

7. An obstruction to a highway is generally a public nuisance, and as such remediable by indictment or information; but it is also a grievance, for which, upon some occasions an action will lie. For instance, the owner of the soil of a way has a right to all above and under ground save only the right of passage for the king and his people. If, therefore, a nuisance be erected upon the road, the owner may maintain a posses-

ry action to recover his rights, and accordingly where an encroachment had been made by building a wall, the plaintiff was allowed to maintain ejectment, and the difficulty presented to the court, that the sheriff could not give possession of the highway, was answered by their observation, that he would give it subject to the easement. Woolrych on Ways, citing Goodtitle v. Sher, 1 Burr. 133.

8. A parson may maintain an ejectment to recover possession of the parsonage house, glebe, and tithes on proof of presentation, institution, and induction; he may also maintain an action of ejectment against a tenant of the glebe land, in the same manner as other landlords, and possession of a church is recoverable in this action under the term messuage. See Ros. Ev. N. P. 59; Salk. 256.

9. The possession of property belonging to a  feme covert  is, of course, recoverable in the same manner, and subject to the same remedies as that of other persons; but as she cannot, except in certain instances, sue alone, it follows that her husband must be joined with her in nearly all actions brought in respect of his wife's property. But if the husband and wife are ejected for a term, and the husband bring an ejectment in his own name only, the term on his recovery of it will vest in the husband, and he may thenceforth treat it as his own. (See Toller on Executors, 215.)

10. Parish officers are entitled to hold lands as a corporation, by virtue of the 59 Geo. III. c. 12, s. 17, which enacts, "That all buildings, lands, and tenements purchased and hired by churchwardens and overseers for the purposes of the Act, shall vest in such officers for the time being as a corporation;" it, therefore, results that these officers maintain ejectment for such property as vests in them by virtue of the Act, in much the same manner as other individuals as respects title, &c.

That this act is not confined to lands held merely for the benefit of the poor, appears from a judgment of Lord Tenterden, in a case where the demises were in the names of the parish officers; and where the tenements were certainly held for parish purposes: and, as contended by the officers vested in them by this act. But the defendants contended that the statute was inapplicable, and urged two reasons in support of their objection; the first was because the persons in whom the legal estate was vested were trustees only: and second, that they were held for the benefit of the Church and not of the poor. Lord Tenterden observed, that as to the first of these objections, we are of opinion that there is nothing in the act of parliament to limit the right of persons who fill the situation of parish officers; and it would be highly inconvenient to give the act so limited a construction. It is often difficult for persons who claim under an ancient trust (where the trustees are numerous,) to show who was the survivor of those trustees; and if they should succeed in ascertaining that fact, it will not be less difficult to show who is the heir at law of that survivor. Upon the second point, his lordship thought that the safest course would be, to give full effect to the generality of expression used in the 17 sect. and nothing appearing to show that that which was held for the benefit of the church under these circumstances did not require the assistance of the act as well as that which was held for the benefit of the poor, and the difficulty in both cases being the same, the Court saw no reason to doubt that the operation of the act was intended to be co-extensive with the mischief. Doe d. Jackson v. Hiley, K. B. 1830. Vide other cases on this act in 1 Ch. Col. H. n. (9) et vide Doe d. Higgs et al. (P. O.) v. Terry, et al. 3 Nev. and Man. M. C. 385, and same v. Cockell et ux. Id. 583.

In concluding this brief outline of the remedy by an ejectment, it remains only to be observed, that an action of ejectment may be brought again and again virtually, by the same person claiming by force of the same right, for the foundation of the action being in modern practice, an imaginary lease entry and ouster, which may all be feigned at the pleasure of the litigant; (1 Hay. Int. Con. 229.) and it may, therefore, be found expedient to provide some check more efficient than the dilatory and discretionary interference of the Court of Chancery, or the peril of costs upon litigation between opposing claimants, which, if it commence early in the period of limitation, may from malice, obstinacy, or other motives, be pursued to a ruinous extent. (Id. 238.) But upon the application of a defendant in ejectment, the Court or a Judge will stay the proceedings until the costs of a former action are paid; although the first action was not between the same parties, but by the father of the present lessor of the plaintiff against the present defendant's father; or by an insolvent, the present ejectment being by his assignees: and even although the present action be not for the same premises, provided it be upon the same title. (Arch. Pr. 990. et seq.)

The consequence of the abolition of real actions without substituting any other mode of specifically enforcing a legal title to real property is, that this country is the only part of the civilized world, in which no direct means exist of recovering this important species of property. (1 Hayes Int. Con. 229. n.)

EXECUTORY DEVISES.

ANSWER TO PROBLEM 19, VOL. IV.

What is an Executory Devise?

BY J. A. M.

It is now finally settled that a limitation by way of Executory Devise, which is not to take effect until after the determination of a life or lives in being, and a term of twenty-one years as a term in gross, and without reference to the infancy of any person who is to take under such limitation, or of any other person, is a valid limitation. Secus, if to the term in gross of twenty-one years be added the number of months equal to the period of gestation, but such period of gestation is to be allowed in those cases in which the gestation exists. 10 Bing. 140. In the House of Lords; and see Bengough v. Edrige, 1 Sim. 173.

When once any preceding executory limitation, which carries the whole interest, happens to take place, that instant all the subsequent limitations became void, and the whole interest is then become vested. Fearne's Exec. Dev. 4 Edition, 415.

The number of contingencies for an Executory Devise is not material, if they are to happen within the limits above mentioned. Thelusson v. Woodford, 4 Ves. 319, affirmed 11 Ves. 112, for in such a case all the candles are lighted, and burning out at the same time. Per Twisden. But a bare possibility that an estate may vest within such prescribed period is not sufficient. In Griffiths v. Vere, 9 Ves, 134, the Court held that an Executory Devise, which may postpone the vesting beyond lives in being, and twenty-one years, &c. cannot be supported on possibility that the estate may vest sooner.

In the great case of Thelusson v. Woodford, supra, it was held, that a testator might direct the rents and profits of an estate whereof an Executory Devise is made, so that they should accumulate till the time when such estate becomes vested, and that the period within which executory interest must vest was applicable to a trust for accumulation. In this case it was calculated that before any part of this property could be touched under the trusts of the will, it would have accumulated to the amount of above £30,000,000? The Judges nevertheless, held, that the will was good, the period of accumulation being within the limits prescribed for the vesting of Executory Devises. To prevent wills of so singular and improper a kind being made in future, the Legislature passed the statute 39 & 40 G. 3, by which it is enacted, that a testator may create a trust for accumulation, to last during the following periods.

1st.—During his own life.

2ndly.—For twenty-one years from his own death.

3rdly.—During the minority of any person living at his death, or then in ventre sa mere.

4thly.—During the minority of any person who for the time being would be entitled to the rents, &c. if of age.

A testator may adopt any or each of these periods if such is his wish.

The statute excepts from its operation—1st. Provisions for payment of debts—2ndly. Provisions for raising portion—3rdly. Provisions touching the produce of timber.

It has been decided that the time for accumulation may be apportioned. So that a part of a trust may be sustained, though part is void as contrary to the statute. Griffiths v. Vere, 9 Ves. 127; 12 Ves. 295. See observations on this act by Mr. Preston, in the notes to Fearne's Cont. Rem. by Butler, p. 538.

A consequence of thus circumscribing the limits of Executory Devises is, that it is not lawful to limit an Executory Devise on a general and indefinite failure of issue. 1 Salk. 232. If however, the failure of issue is restrained to the death of any person or persons actually living, or to any period not beyond a life or lives in being, and twenty-one years, with few months beyond, then the contingency is good, and the Executory Devise has its lawful effect.

The words "dying without issue," (with certain exceptions) as to a freehold were held to mean a general failure of issue. Therefore an Executory Devise to the heirs of A.'s body by a second husband, on failure of issue by the first now living, was too remote a contingency and therefore void. Goodson v. Goodright, 2 Burr. 870; 1 W. Black, 183.

A devise over to J. W. &c. and their heirs each in due succession as named with usual limitations in failure of issue, in and on the decease of A. B. does not import an indefinite failure of issue in A. B., but the limitation over to J. W. &c. is good by way of Executory Devise, these words meaning issue living at the death of A. B. the first taker. Stratford v. Powell, 1 Ball. & B. 1.

But though in general a devise after a general failure of heirs or issue is void, yet this rule admits of some exceptions.

First.—Where a person who is entitled to a reversion expectant on the determination of an estate-tail, devises the lands to another after failure of issue of tenant-in-tail; this is held an immediate devise of the reversion, and therefore good. Badger v. Lloyd, 1 Ld. Raym. 523; 1 Salk. 232.

Secondly.—A devise in default of issue of the devisor, which has been construed to be a conditional devise, to take effect at the death of the testator, and has therefore been held to be executory. Willington v. Willington, 1 Bl. Rep. 645; French v. Cadell, 3 Bro. P. C. 257.

Thirdly.—A devise over for life to a person in esse, to take effect on failure of the issue of a first devisee, may be good; because the future limitation being only for the life of a person in esse it must necessarily take place during that life or not at all; and therefore the failure of issue in that case is confined to the compass of a life in being, Fear. Ex. Dev. 279; Doe v. Lyde, 1 T. R. 593.

Fourthly. That an estate tail is raised by implication in the person on the failure of whose heirs or issue the estate is devised over: in which case the second devise is supported as a remainder, expectant on the determination of such prior estate tail. Walter v. Drew, Com. Rep. 672.

But with respect to executory devises of terms of years, or other personal estate, the Court of Chancery, before the passing of the act mentioned in the next paragraphs used to lay hold of any words in the will, so as to construe the words "dying without issue" to mean such issue as were living at the time of the first devisee's decease, the reason of which difference in the case of personalty was, in order to support the devise over which would be otherwise too remote. Forth v. Chapman, 1 P. Wms. 48. 3 P. Wms. 261. 2 Ves. 615. Ibid. 180.

Innumerable questions have arisen on the meaning of the above words, and it will be sufficient at this time to mention some of the cases in which they have arisen. Tilbury v. Tarbut, 3 Atk. 617. Bennett v. Ankerville, 19 Ves. 178. Walter v. Drew, supra. Dansey v. Griffith, 4 M. & S. 61. Malcolm v. Taylor, R. & M. 416. Pepine Ferard, R. & M. 378. But now by the 4th Wm. 4 & 1 Vic. c. 26. s. 29. it is enacted "that in any devise or bequest of real or personal estate, the words "die without issue," or "die without leaving issue," or "have no issue," or any other words which may import either a want or failure of issue of any person in his lifetime, or at the time of his death, or an indefinite failure of issue, shall all be construed to mean a want or failure of issue in the lifetime, or at the time of the death of such person, and not an indefinite failure, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will, by reason of some person having a prior estate tail, or of a preceding gift being without any implication arising from such words, a limitation of an estate tail to such person or issue or otherwise. Provided that this act shall not extend to cases where such words as aforesaid, import, if no issue described in a preceding gift shall be born, or if there be no issue who shall live to attain the age, or otherwise answer the description required for obtaining a vested estate by a preceding gift to such issue.

Under an executory devise of the residue of real and personal estate, the intermediate rents and profits of the real estate, pass as well as the interest of the personalty, Geary v. Fitzgerald, 1 Jac. 468.

Where there is a bequest over of chattels personal, the mode of preserving them to the second legatee was formerly by compelling the first legatee to give security for the safe forthcoming of the property at the time of his decease, but the present practice is to procure an inventory signed by the first legatee, which is deposited with one of the Masters in Chancery.

Contingent and executory interests in freehold terms of years, and other chattels, are devisable, Seaven v. Blunt, 7 Ves. 294. Veiry v. Pinwell, 44. assignable; Kimpland v. Courtenay, 2 Freem. 250. 2 P. Wms. 608. may be released, 10 Co. Rep. 46. b.; and are descendible and transmissible to heirs and executors, Gurnel v. Wood, 8 Vin. Abr. 112. Goodright v. Searle, 2 Wils. 29.

ROLLS' COURT.—June 1.

THE SOCIETY FOR THE ILLUSTRATION AND ENCOURAGEMENT OF PRACTICAL SCIENCE v. ABBOTT.

JOINT STOCK CORPORATION.—DEMURRER for want of Equity and want of parties overruled.

This Bill was filed by the Incorporated So*ciety for the Illustration and Encouragement of Practical Science* against Peter Harris Abbott, John Strettell Buckwood, John Shaw, and Ann Charlotte Watson, the three former of whom, in conjunction with Ralph Watson, deceased, were the original projectors of the institution. The Bill stated that it was at first intended to be a commercial speculation, and it was contemplated to form a partnership, which was to consist of themselves and such other persons as should be desirous of joining them. Accordingly, in 1832, the projectors of the institution obtained from William Herbert a lease of the premises now known by the name of the Adelaide Gallery; and after the opening of the gallery to the public, the projectors were desirous that Thomas Telford, deceased, and Francis Giles, should become partners, which they refused to do, unless they were secured from all liability on account of the undertaking, beyond the amount of their interests. To effect this, on the 13th of October, 1834, a charter of incorporation was granted to the projectors, and also to Thomas Telford and Francis Giles, together with such other persons as had become or should at any time thereafter become subscribers to the capital or stock of the society thereafter mentioned, or possessed of or entitled to any share thereof, by the name of "The Society for the Illustration and Encouragement of Practical Science," by which name it was declared the Society should sue and be sued, and that it should have perpetual succession and a common seal.—It further declared that the capital of the society was to be £20,000. which was to be divided into 400 shares of £50. each. These shares were to be transferable, and a power was reserved to the Society of increasing this capital to £40,000, in similar shares. The charter then provided for the general meetings of the Society; and for the appointment of managers, who were to possess five shares at least, and declared that three of them should be a quorum; and that Telford, Abbott, Brickwood, Shaw, Watson, and Giles should be the first managers; and that the managers should hold councils, for the purpose of directing the affairs of the Society; and that such councils should have power to enter into all contracts on behalf of the Society, and generally to do all acts to which the corporate seal was required to be affixed, which should be as binding upon the Society as if the same were done by the whole corporation. The bill then alleged that at the time when the charter was granted, neither Telford nor Giles were proprietors of any shares, though they had each agreed to take five on the granting of the charter; but that Abbott, Brickwood, Shaw, and Watson were then the only persons interested therein. That shortly after the grant of the charter, the last four named persons agreed to appropriate amongst themselves the whole of the 400 shares into which the capital of the Society was to be divided, and to resell the same for their private benefit, charging themselves with the whole capital of £20,000; and, as the managers of the Society, they adopted, on behalf of the Society, the purchases and expenditure previously made by them in establishing the institution, and credited themselves in account with the Society for the sum of £16,000. in respect thereof, and paid £4,000. cash into the hands of the bankers of the Society, (Messrs. Smith, Payne, and Smith;) that, until February, 1835, Abbott, Brickwood, Shaw, and Watson exclusively managed the affairs of the Society; and that no council of managers was held before the latter part of January, 1835, nor any general meeting until the 18th Feb. 1835, previous to which latter period about 160 shares had been sold, besides a certain number of shares which were entered in the books of the Society in the names of the wives of Abbott and Brickwood; that at this general meeting Brickwood made a statement to the shareholders, to the effect that he and the three other original members of the Society had expended £16,000. in establishing the Society, and in the purchase of models, philosophical and other instruments and effects, and that there remained £4,000. in the bankers' hands. That a resolution was passed approving of what had been done; and that a statement to the above effect had also been afterwards caused by Brickwood to be entered in the journal and ledger of the Society by its secretary. That the Society continued to flourish, and considerable dividends were paid until 1839, when it was discovered that no further dividend could be made, and the funds of the Society in the hands of the bankers were much reduced; and that in consequence thereof inquiries were made, and the plaintiffs alleged they discovered that the £16,000., alleged to have been invested in establishing the Society, was never in fact so invested; and that no more than £8,000. at the most was so invested; and that the defendants, in stating £16,000. to have been invested, were guilty of a false and fraudulent representation, under cover of which they converted to their own use the sum of £8,000. part of the capital of the Society, as the property stated to be purchased for £16,000. was not then worth more than £8,000. The bill also contained an allegation, that the defendants had sold and transferred a great number of shares, and appropriated the purchase-moneys to their own use. It also stated, that on the death of Watson in February, 1835, Abbott, Brickwood, and Shaw appropriated to themselves his shares, in satisfaction of an alleged debt due from him to them.—The bill prayed an account of the number of shares in the capital of the society which were appropriated by the defendants Abbott, Brick-wood, Shaw, and Watson respectively, and of the amount of capital which, at the time of the appropriation of such respective shares, and in consideration thereof, ought to have been paid or subscribed by them respectively to the funds of the Society, and of the sums which were at any time paid or subscribed or otherwise satisfied to the Society by them respectively, in respect of the capital sum due from them or any of them, upon such their respective shares; and that, in making such accounts, credit might be allowed to them for all sums properly advanced or properly expended on behalf of the Society before the incorporation thereof; and that it might be declared that the Society was not bound by the resolution passed at the said general meeting of the Society, held on the 18th February, 1835; and that the balance found due from Abbott, Brickwood, and Shaw, and from the estate of Watson, might be paid, with interest, to the plaintiffs; and, if necessary, that an account might be taken of the shares of Watson appropriated on his death by the defendants Abbott, Brickwood, and Shaw, and sold by them, and of the proceeds thereof, and that the same might be applied to make good to the plaintiffs what the personal estate of Watson was unable to satisfy of the sum found due from him. To this bill a demurrer was put in for want of equity, and also for want of parties, and alleging that in particular the lives of the defendants Abbott and Brickwood, and the other original shareholders in the bill mentioned, were necessary parties.

Mr. Tinney, in support of the demurrer, said, at the questions for the consideration of the Court, were, first, whether Abbott, Brickwood, Shaw, and Watson, being then the only members and only managers of the corporation, no other person but themselves having at that time any shares therein, were not competent to appropriate to themselves all the shares of the Society on the terms on which they did so; and, by that transaction, to bind the future members of the corporation, and effectually to discharge themselves from all responsibility in respect thereof; secondly, whether the confirmation of that transaction at the general meeting of the shareholders on the 18th February, 1835, did not preclude the plaintiffs from the relief now asked for; and, thirdly, whether all the original shareholders of the Society ought not to be before the Court, as they were interested in the accounts required by the bill. He insisted that the defendants were the managers and sole representatives of the Society, and that the plaintiffs now stood in their place, and were bound by what had been done by them and their predecessors, and by the resolution which had been passed; that they were bound to pay the full value of the shares, but it was to themselves only, they were not trustees for any body of persons except themselves. The appropriation of the 400 shares was made in their own corporate capacity, and was confirmed by the resolution of the whole body.

Mr. Pemberton denied that the plaintiffs were bound, inasmuch as the defendants had not paid up the amount of their shares, and had been guilty of fraud in selling at £16,000 what had not cost £8,000. The defendants, as managers, were trustees of the Society, and had no right to seek individual advantage at the expense of the Society generally; that all the members of the corporation were before the Court, and the corporate officers represented all the individual shareholders, and that consequently it was unnecessary to bring the latter before the Court, as between them and the defendants there may be also a right of account. Hichens v. Congreve(a), Charitable Corporation v. Sutton(b).

LORD LANGDALE observed, that the only question he had to determine was, whether the defendants must answer the bill. I have no means of knowing if the £16,000 had been advanced on account of the Society; it might have been done, and there were many ways in which it might have been expended. The allegations in the bill charge the defendants with fraud. Whether there is any such fraud, I have no means of knowing at present, and I may, therefore, conclude that the £16,000 was fairly laid out. The real question in dispute is this: the plaintiffs say the defendants might, if they pleased, pay the full value of all the 400 shares, and become the owners of them; but, if the corporation was to continue, they were bound to give to the funds of the corporation the value of those shares, which they had not done. The defendants say, we laid out £16,000 in purchasing models of various machines and instruments, and in making alterations in the premises, and in furnishing, which being added to £4,000 paid by us into the Bank, together made up £20,000, and became the property of the corporation, such being the value of all the shares into which the property of the Society was required to be divided, we were the purchasers and owners of all those shares. If the facts were so, it is not disputed by the plaintiffs that what was done was quite right. But what is said by the plaintiffs is, that the expenditure of the defendants did not amount to £16,000; and if so, that such a sum as was actually expended and the sum paid into the Bank was the sum paid by these four persons for all the 400 shares; and that they thus got these shares from the corporation, as individual members of it, without paying the full value for them. It is also alleged, that credit ought to have been given by the defendants for the profits received by them from the exhibition. It is also to be observed, that the transactions sought to be impeached are between the corporation and individuals who were formerly managers of the corporation, and not transactions between them and the individuals who purchased shares from them. I do not, therefore, think that the shareholders who purchased shares from the defendants are necessary parties, but looking at all the circumstances I think the defendants ought to answer the bill.

ROBERTON AND ANOTHER v. CRAWFORD AND OTHERS.

LAW of SCOTLAND.—WIDOWS PENSION in INDIA.—Whether the Widow of a Civil Servant of the East India Company and as such entitled to a Pension during her WIDOWHOOD, only afterwards residing with and passing as the WIFE of a Scotchman in Scotland, shall thereby forfeit her Pension.*

This was a bill filed by Mr. R. Robertson and Harriet Bouchier passing as his wife, against the Agents in England of the Bombay Civil Fund.

The bill stated that the defendant, Harriet Robertson, was formerly the widow of Samuel Bouchier, who held a civil situation under the East India Company. In his life-time he was a subscriber to the Bombay Civil Fund, which, upon his death, entitled his widow to a pension of £300 a year; but by the regulations of the society this was limited to so long as she remained the widow of Mr. Bouchier. Upon his death, in 1815, Mrs. Bouchier returned to England, where, in 1817, she became acquainted with the plaintiff, Robert Robertson, with whom she lived, acting in all respects as his wife. They afterwards went to reside in Scotland, where they still continued to reside together, and Mrs. Bouchier was received in society as Mrs. Robertson. The annuity was paid to Mrs. Bouchier regularly by the defendants, till 1821, when it was discontinued for a short period, but was again renewed upon the declaration of Mrs. Bouchier that she had not contracted any marriage, and that she was still the widow of Mr. Bouchier. On the 5th of June, 1828, a resolution was passed by the members of the Bombay Civil Fund removing the restriction upon the widows of members of the fund who should marry subsequently to the date of the resolution. Upon receiving this information, Mr. Robertson and Mrs. Bouchier immediately entered into a contract to marry, which, on the 5th of March, 1830, was solemnized and formally carried into effect according to the forms of the Scotch law, by a minister of the Church of Scotland, who, after certifying the marriage between the parties, added the words "they having been previously irregularly wed." A copy of this certificate was sent by the parties to the defendants, who transmitted it to India, and the members of the fund, from the words added, conceiving that it afforded evidence of a marriage having been contracted previous to the rescinding the restrictive resolution, directed the defendants to discontinue the payments to Mrs. Bouchier. This was communicated to Mr. and Mrs. Robertson in November, 1832, and in consequence they, in order to establish their claim and obtain payment of the pension, instituted the present suit. Upon the hearing a reference was made to the master to inquire if any marriage had taken place before the 5th of June, 1828, and he reported that there was no valid marriage.

Mr. Tinney said the cause now came on upon an exception to the master's report, and insisted that according to the law of Scotland, the acts of the parties were tantamount to a marriage.

Mr. Pemberton said that for seventeen years this pension had been the sole means of the subsistence of the plaintiffs; for seven years it had been withdrawn. The position of the parties was painful; he did not stand there to justify their conduct, but they had suffered intensely and severely. He thought, however, with regard to the legal rights of the parties there was no question or controversy; the defendants had come there to enforce a penalty and they could only do it on the strictest proof. He thought, however, it would have been better if they had adopted the Scotch adage, that it was better to give bygone for bygone.

Lord LANGDALE observed that a contract of marriage could only be made by the mutual consent of the parties; and, considering the whole of the circumstances, the facts drawn were in favour of the master's finding. The parties had so far succeeded as to induce many persons to believe that they were married, and the habit and repute which they had gained was for appearances only; that, however, according to the opinions before him, and to which he had referred by the mutual consent of the parties, was not of itself, according to the law of Scotland, sufficient to constitute a marriage; the parties therefore had succeeded in preserving their claim to the annuity, and the exception must be overruled. The arrears of the annuity must be paid, but, in order to obviate any future difficulty, receipts must be signed by both parties during the life of the husband. The costs of the suit must also be paid out of the fund to which the plaintiffs were entitled.

July 20.

WELFORD v. BELL AND OTHERS.
AMENDMENT of BILL after the scottish PRACTICE.

Mr. Pemberton moved that the plaintiff say—at liberty to amend his bill, notwithstanding the time allowed by the rules of the court had elapsed, on payment of 20s. The original bill was filed in October last: the answers of all the defendants were not put in until the 12th of March last; they were forwarded to the plaintiff in Northumberland on the 18th of March, and it was not until the 4th of June that the plaintiff's solicitor was enabled to obtain the information from the plaintiff that rendered the amendment of the bill necessary. Application was then made to the defendants' solicitors, but they refused to consent to the bill being amended.

Mr. Purvis, for the defendants, opposed the motion, as the plaintiff's affidavits were not sufficient. The plaintiff had not shown that he had used due diligence, or given any reason why his Lordship should be called upon to depart from the usual course. The suit related to mines in Northumberland; the solicitor there made no affidavit, the motion was made upon the clerk's affidavit in London. The bill was filed in October, 1839, amended a few days afterwards; the answer had been put in, and exceptions were taken to it in April last, and overruled by the Master in May. The bill stated that John Mulcaster, a partner in the mines, had a son named James. John had two shares; James desired to hold other shares himself, but he enjoyed a situation in Greenwich Hospital, and the governors were the landlords of the mine, and James therefore did not wish his name to appear as owner. The shares of James were therefore conveyed to the father, John, and he died intestate, leaving three children, James and two married daughters, the defendants, Mrs. Ann Bell and Mrs. Hannah Nicholson, for whom he appeared. James was in debt; and there had been a sale by the sheriff under a writ of execution at which the plaintiff Walford was the purchaser. The two sisters alleged that James, their brother, was not the purchaser of the shares conveyed to their father, but that their father, John, was. The affidavit on which the plaintiff founded his motion stated that it was necessary to make inquiries on this matter at the mine, and so at York; but by whom were these inquiries to be made? Surely not by the London solicitor. They were to be made on the spot, and the deponent could not tell whether they were or were not made. It was sworn that the counsel for the plaintiff, thought it necessary to amend the bill to state these facts, but the amendments were not made before the 20th of June, and the time expired on the 15th of June.—he submitted that it was not such a case as entitled the plaintiff to his motion.

Lord LANGDALE. — It was a case in which considerable inquiries were necessary. The plaintiff as a purchaser from the sheriff of such interest as James Mulcaster had. John, the late father, had two shares of his own, and two other shares, and the parties to whom those two other shares would belong seemed to him to be a case of resulting trusts.

Mr. Pemberton contended that it was ridiculous in the defendants to oppose the amendments, the result of which would only be that a new bill would be filed, and further time lost.

Lord LANGDALE.—The delay was not much, the time expired on the 15th of June; the application was made on the 20th, and notice given on the 30th of June. He concurred in a portion of Mr. Purvis's argument, but the refusal of the motion would create further unnecessary expense. The order must be granted, but on payment of costs by the plaintiff.

PATERNOSTER v. KING AND ANOTHER.

JOINT AND SEVERAL ACTIONS.—PRACTICE.—Satisfaction of an injury as to one defendant, is satisfaction as to all.

Mr. Hoggins obtained a rule last term calling on the plaintiff to show cause why the proceedings in this cause should not be stayed, in obedience to a rule of Court founded on an order of nisi prius, in a cause of Paternoster v. Finch and others, by which it was ordered by consent of all parties, that in consideration of an annuity of £150 a year settled upon the plaintiff, all actions and causes of action between the parties or any of them should be stayed and considered settled, and that the plaintiff was in future to abstain from annoying his father and mother, and other members of his family.

Mr. Serjeant Channel now showed cause against the rule, and contended, that whatever might be the effect of the rule as regarded the defendant Wing, who was a party to the cause in which the order of nisi prius was made, it could not operate as a stay of proceedings against the defendant Gardiner, who was no party to that cause.

SIR N. C. TINDAL, C. J., said the Court decided that the settlement of the annuity on the plaintiff having been accepted in the nature of a satisfaction of all causes of action then subsisting against any of the parties to the cause of Paternoster v. Finch and others, and the defendant Wing being one of those parties, the cause of action against him was satisfied; where there was a joint and several trespass, satisfaction of the injury as to one defendant was satisfaction as to all, and consequently the rule for staying the proceedings in the present cause must be made absolute.

METCALFE v. FOWLER.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER.—BREACH OF CONTRACT—PURCHASER'S RIGHT to interest at £4. per cent. on purchase-money lying idle—PRACTICE—PLEADING.

This was an action brought to recover compensation from the defendant for the loss of interest incurred by the plaintiff, in consequence of the non-performance of an agreement for the sale of an estate in Lincolnshire. The declaration set forth the contract, whereby the defendant contracted and agreed to sell and convey to the plaintiff, on the 25th of March, 1838, certain property in the county of Lincoln, in consideration of the sum of £2,115.; and it was agreed between the parties, that in case the sale could not be completed on the day mentioned in the contract, the plaintiff should be allowed interest at the rate of two per cent. per annum on the above mentioned sum from thence; and alleged, that though the plaintiff was ready and willing on that day to perform his part of the bargain, by the payment of the money and acceptance of a conveyance, with a good title, yet that the defendant did not then, or at any other time whatsoever, perform his part, by making such conveyance, but wholly failed therein, by reason of which the plaintiff lost the interest upon the purchase-money till the day when the contract was finally abandoned. The defendant paid £20. into court, denying that the plaintiff had incurred any damage beyond that sum, upon which issue was joined.

It appeared that the defendant was unable to make out a good title to the property on the 25th March, 1838, but the negotiations between the parties continued until the month of January, 1839, when the contract was finally broken off, and the plaintiff brought this action to recover the amount of the difference between the interest at the rate of two per cent. per annum, and that at four per cent.—the latter being the rate which he could have received, as he alleged, had he put the money out to use instead of keeping it idle to await the completion of the contract. The action was tried before Lord Abinger, at Guildhall, when a verdict for £41. was returned for the plaintiff, with liberty to move the Court above to enter a non-suit upon an objection made by the defendant's counsel to the averment in the declaration, under the form of which it was contended the plaintiff could not recover damages for the loss of interest beyond the 25th of March.

Mr. R. V. Richards, last term obtained a rule nisi to set aside this verdict and to have a nonsuit entered, on the ground that the plaintiff had not averred in his declaration that he had been ready and willing at all times, since the 25th of March, 1838, to perform his part of the contract; and it was contended that he was not entitled to recover for any damages he might have sustained after the day on which the breach took place.

Mr. Bayley, in support of the verdict, argued, that time not being the essence of the contract, the plaintiff was not limited to the day on which the breach of it occurred, but was at liberty to sue for damages subsequently incurred by reason of the pendency of negotiations for the completion of the sale, which ultimately proving futile, only ended in increasing the plaintiff's claim for damages.

The COURT, however, without calling on Mr. Richards, at once decided in favour of the rule. The contract was broken on the 25th of March, and though negotiations were carried on after that day, the plaintiff could not recover for loss of interest during their continuance, without averring in his declaration a readiness on his part, after the day originally named, to perform the contract, or alleging that by a subsequent agreement the contract had been enlarged to a reasonable time within which a further breach had been committed. As it was, it was clear that the damage must be limited to the 25th of March, and as the payment into court satisfied that claim, the rule must be made absolute for a nonsuit.

3 &amp; 4 Vict. Cap. 55.

An Act to enable the Owners of Settled Estates to defray the Expence of draining the same by way of Mortgage.

[4th August, 1840.]

Whereas much of the land in England and Ireland would be rendered permanently more productive by improved draining, and nevertheless, by reason of the great expence thereof, proprietors having a limited interest in such land are often unable to execute such draining: And whereas it is expedient, as well for the more abundant production of food as for the increased employment of farming labourers, and the extended investment of capital in the permanent improvement of the soil, that such proprietors should be relieved from this disability, due regard being had to the interests of those entitled in remainder: Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That from and after the passing of this Act, it shall and may be lawful for any tenant for life, or for a term determinable on his or her life, under any will, settlement, or other like disposition, entitled in possession at law or in equity to any lands in England or Ireland, (or the guardian or guardians of any infant, on the behalf of such infant so entitled as aforesaid,) to apply by petition to her Majesty's Court of Chancery or Exchequer in England or Ireland for leave to make any permanent improvements in the lands to which he or she shall be so entitled, or any part thereof, by draining the same with tiles, stones, or other durable materials in a permanent manner; and in every such petition shall be specified the improvements proposed to be made, and the estimated cost thereof, and of all matters incidental thereto; and every such petition shall be referred to a Master of the said Court of Chancery, or to a Master, or in Ireland to the Chief or Second Remembrancer of the Court of Exchequer, to inquire into and ascertain the propriety of such improvements being effected; and such Master or Chief or Second Remembrancer shall and he is hereby required to call for such plans and estimates and specifications in relation to the said proposed improvements as he shall think fit; and the Master or Remembrancer shall make his report respecting such proposal; and the Court to which any such application shall be made shall make such order upon such petition and report as such Court shall think fit.

2. Provided always, and be it enacted, That a copy of every such petition shall be served twenty-one days at the least before the hearing thereof upon the person or persons beneficially entitled at law or in equity to the first vested estate of freehold of inheritance in remainder after the estate of the tenant for life, but if any such persons shall be of unsound mind, or under the age of twenty-one years, or under any other legal disability, or beyond the limits of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, then a copy of such petition shall be served, on his, her, or their behalf, upon such person or persons respectively as the said Court of Chancery or Court of Exchequer to which the said petition shall be preferred shall appoint for that purpose; and every person upon whom a copy of any such petition shall be so served shall be at liberty to attend before the Master or Remembrancer to whom such petition shall be referred, and to consent or object to the proposal contained in such petition; and any person appearing before the Master or Remembrancer on any such petition may also appear before the Master or Remembrancer, previously to his signing any such certificate as after mentioned, for the purpose of producing any objection to the mode in which any such improvements as after mentioned may have been executed; and all the costs attending any such application, and of the party so served, shall be paid by the party making such application as aforesaid.

3. And be it enacted, That if it shall appear to the satisfaction of such Master or Remembrancer, on the report of one or more surveyors to be appointed or approved of by the said Master or Remembrancer, that it will be for the benefit of such lands that they should be so drained, and such report shall be confirmed by the said Court, then it shall be lawful for the tenant for life, or such guardian or guardians as aforesaid, who shall have presented such petition, to make and execute such improvements accordingly.

4. And be it enacted, That in every case where the said Court of Chancery or Exchequer shall have made an order sanctioning the execution of any such improvements of any lands, and such improvements or any part thereof shall have been made accordingly, it shall be lawful for the Master or Remembrancer whose report shall be so confirmed by the said Court, by a certificate under his hand to be filed in the said Court, on having satisfaction that the money had been properly expended, to authorize any such person so entitled as aforesaid, or the executors or administrators of such person, or such guardian or guardians of such Infant as aforesaid, by deed in writing, to charge all or any part of the lands so drained as aforesaid, or any other land subject to the like uses or trusts as the lands so drained, with the payment to any person or persons willing to advance the same of the amount of the money which may have been so expended, and so from time to time as any money shall be so expended, together with interest thereon after any rate not exceeding five pounds per centum per annum from the time of making the charge, but so nevertheless that in any such charge it shall be so provided that the principal sum charged shall be paid off by equal yearly instalments, such instalments not to be less than twelve nor more than eighteen, the number of such instalments to be determined and recommended by the said Master or Remembrancer in his report, and such number of the said instalments to be diminished or increased at the discretion of the said Master, according to the greater or less improvement shewn to have been made by such draining; and for the purpose of securing such monies to be so charged it shall be lawful for the person making such charge to demise the hereditaments to be charged for any term or number of years, by reason whereof the rents and profits of the said hereditaments shall be applicable to the payment of the said monies so to be charged as aforesaid, but so as such term be made to cease on the payment of the monies charged: provided nevertheless, that such person making such charge, and every succeeding tenant for life, or tenant for term of years determinable on his or her life, shall be bound to keep down the interest and instalments to be charged, or any rent-charge to be charged as after mentioned; and the lands charged shall not (except as against any tenant for life or other persons liable to pay such instalments and interest or keep down such rent-charge) be liable to pay more than six months of any interest, and one half of any instalment, or pay more than half a year's rent-charge, which is hereby directed to be kept down as aforesaid: provided nevertheless, that if any person shall be willing to advance to any person hereby authorized to make such charge as aforesaid the amount he or she may be so authorised to charge in consideration of a rent-charge for a term of not less than twelve nor more than eighteen years, then such person so authorized to charge, instead of charging the said hereditaments with such instalments and interest as aforesaid, may charge the same with a rent-charge for any such period as aforesaid, so as that the said Master or Remembrancer shall in his said report approve of the substitution of a rent-charge, and of the amount to be charged, and shall ascertain and determine the number of years for which the same shall be granted (such number of years to be ascertained in the same manner as is before directed with respect to the ascertaining the amount of such instalments as aforesaid:) provided also, that no person shall be entitled to make any such charge as aforesaid unless it shall be stated in the report of such Master or Remembrancer that it hath been made to appear to him by the report of such Surveyor that the annual value of the lands so drained is increased by such draining to an amount equal to seven pounds per centum at least on the sum to be charged.

5. And be it enacted, That this act may be amended or repealed by any act to be passed during the present session of Parliament.

ANNUITY.

1. By a private act of Parliament the rector of A was empowered to erect a new rectory-house, and to supply the necessary funds for that purpose he was authorized to sell the old one and to borrow, with the consent of the bishop of R, a sum not exceeding 2000*l.*, by selling an annuity for two lives. The new rectory-house was to be built to the satisfaction of the bishop, whose signature and seal to a declaration to that effect to an account of the monies expended, was declared to be a sufficient discharge to the trustees appointed for the purposes of the act, who were also, in case any surplus remained, to apply it, with the consent of the bishop, to permanent improvements upon and about the rectory-house. The rector advertised to grant an annuity for 2000*l.* by tender, and received one offer, which the bishop thought too high, and ultimately he advanced the money himself, but in the name of a trustee to whom an annuity of 170*l.* was (nominally) secured. Subsequently this trustee executed a declaration of trust to the bishop, who assigned the annuity to his son, and it was paid to the latter during the life of the said rector, who constantly paid it for twenty-four years, but on his death his successor refused to continue the payment: held, that the grant of this annuity was void, and could not be enforced, because the interests of the rectory being entrusted to the bishop's care, and he being placed in a fiduciary situation as regarded the expenditure of the 2000*l.*, and the grant of the annuity could not be allowed to contract for his own benefit, however fair the transaction might outwardly appear to be. Greenlaw v. King, M. R. IV. 326.—See Western's Conveyancing, 174. n. i.

2. An annuity, through the defendant's neglect, became void for want of due enrolment of a memorial. Whereupon assumpsit was brought for the consideration money, to which the statute of limitations was pleaded as a defence, because the original debt accrued above six years before: held, that a payment in respect of the annuity within six years took the case out of the statute. Middleton v. Middleton, N. P. II. 221.

ANSWER TO BILL.

1. After a plaintiff has amended his bill, the defendant may set forth another schedule in addition to that set out in his answer to the original bill. Bertin v. Smith, V. C. III. 165.

2. A bill charged securities to have been given for money lent at play, and interrogated respecting the consideration given. The defendant's answer merely stated the securities to have been given for money lent at different times. Answer held insufficient. Sloman v. Kelly, Ex. Eq. III. 166.

A joint power of appointment by husband and wife is suspended or destroyed by the bankruptcy of the husband; but a separate power of appointment in the wife surviving the husband, and becoming vested on his death, is susceptible of an execution, although a limitation to children in default of appointment was contingent, and there was no particular estate of freehold upon the death of the husband to support it. Hole v. Escott, L. C. I. 71. See the Editor's review of the judgment in this case. See also the Bankrupt Act, 6 G. 4. s. 77. Long v. Rankin, Sug. Pow. 6. Id. EDITOR'S REVIEW of the Judgment in this case, I. 24.

ASSIGNEES, EQUITABLE.

Where a party entered into a contract for the purchase of a lease, but no assignment was ever made to him, and he entered into possession, and part of the terms of the contract was that the tenant was bound to repair. #### ARTICLED CLERKS.

1. (a) Service.—Where an articled clerk had not attended to business during the last year of his articles, on account of ill health, the court, nevertheless, gave him leave to go before the examiners. In Re Hodge. B. Court, I, 27.

(b) An articled clerk served his full clerkship under two masters, his articles being assigned from one to the other; but after the agreement for the assignment was entered into, and before the execution thereof, a fortnight intervened, during which fortnight the clerk served the second master, and the examiners deemed the service not good service. The court ordered the examiners to proceed with the examination de bene esse, and when the clerk applied for admission the objection might be raised if necessary. Anon, C. P. I, 56. Quere, Whether the court has power to make an order upon the examiners? Id.

(c) A was originally articled to B, who was in partnership with C. B died nine months before A's period of service expired, but he continued to serve C without interruption. After the expiration of the term of clerkship (five years) A served C nine months longer, when his articles were assigned to C by B's executors, and the examiners deemed the service not good service. The court ordered the examiners to proceed with the examination of the clerk, intimating that some general rule would be laid down upon the subject. In re Johnstone, Bail C. I. 60.

2. (d) Examination.—Where an articled clerk had been examined under the regular notice of intention to apply for admission, but his passing was postponed by the examiners on account of his incapacity in answering the requisite questions on one particular point. Upon his application to be again examined he was informed that he must give a regular term's notice; and upon application to the court for an order upon the examiners to examine him, the court held, that there must be a fresh notice of admission given, the same as if nothing whatever had taken place on the matter. Q. B. I, 26.

(e) When an articled clerk is prevented from leaving his articles of clerkship, together with the requisite answers of the clerk and his master to the questions as to due service preparatory to examination, owing to an accidental delay in their transmission from the country, the court will, on an application properly verified by affidavits, relieve him. Exp. Dolman, B. C. I, 46.

(f) An articled clerk proceeding to New Brunswick to practise as an attorney, whose articles would not expire before the 11th April, 1840, applied to the court in Michaelmas Term, 1839, for leave to be examined before the expiration of his articles, because, if he was compelled to wait till Easter Term, 1840, he would not be admitted till Trinity Term, which would be after vessels for New Brunswick had sailed, and he would not then arrive before the winter had set in, and, by being examined at once, he would be admitted in Easter Term. The court, under circumstances, ordered his examination. Ex parte Twynam, B. C. III, 72. See V. p. 78.

(g) Rule, H. T. 6 W. 4.—When any articled clerk shall be dissatisfied with the refusal of the examiners to grant him a certificate testifying his fitness and capacity to act as an attorney, III, 140.

(h) Petition of an unsuccessful candidate, under such Rule, III. 141.

(i) Orders of the Master of the Rolls relating to the admission of solicitors to practice in the Court of Chancery, 27th July, 1836. III. 166.

(j) New Rule of the Q. B. for admission of attorneys. E. T. 1840. III, 38.

See INFANT.—ATTORNIES.—ADMISSION 67.
ATTORNIES.

1. (k) Admission—An attorney must be admitted in the Court of Bankruptcy before he can practise there. Exp. Webb, C. R. I. 236.

(l) An attorney of the Court of Common Pleas of Durham and Lancaster, where he had been practising seven years, applied to the court for a rule to shew cause why he should not be admitted to practice in the superior courts at Westminster without submitting himself to the examination. The rule was granted, but the court suggested that the applicant had better go before the examiners in the first instance, and if he should happen to be "plucked" he could afterwards come to the court for assistance. Exp. Marshall, B. C. I. 410.

(m) Attornies, who are not admitted in Chancery, cannot enforce payment of bills of costs for business done by them in that court. Creswell v. Natta, Q. B. I. 27.

(n) Where a mistake appeared in the notice of intention to apply for admission by reason of a wrong christian name being inserted therein, the court allowed the notice to be amended. Exp. Duke, B. C. II, 122.

(o) Rule of Court of Exchequer as to. H. I. 3 Vict. III, 239.

(p) Re-Admission.—An application was made to the court for a rule to shew cause why an attorney should not be struck off the rolls for having neglected to take out his certificate, and also for having been re-admitted without giving the usual notices of his intention to do so. The court granted the rule, which was discharged upon argument. Paget v. Chamber, C. P. I. 393. II. 74.

(q) Order as to admission. M. T. 2 Vict. 26.

2. Certificate.—(r) An attorney who does not take out his certificate in due time, although it is taken out within a year from the expiration of his last certificate, yet he is not entitled to recover costs of his client for business done during the time he was without a certificate, the new certificate not having a retrospective effect. Archer v. Garrard, Ex. I. 314. Bowler v. Brown, 2 Ad. & El. 116, doubted.

(s) An unintentional default in payment of the proper amount of stamp-duty on an attorney's certificate is cured by payment of the duty and penalty. Anon. B. C. I. 44.

(t) An attorney may maintain an action for costs although he has not entered his certificate according to 37 G. 3. c. 90. s. 27. Eyre v. Shelley, Ex. IV. 92.

(t*) Allowing unauthorized Persons to Practise in their Names.—The Law Society applied to the court for a rule to shew cause why an attorney should not be struck off the Roll, and why an authorized person, who had practised in his name, should not be committed to the prison of the court for one year, under 22 G. 2. c. 46. s. 11. The court granted the rule. The Law Society v. Willis and Allen, Q. B. I. 54.

(u) An attorney applied to be re-admitted. He had taken out his 6l. certificate upon his admission, for three years; after that time he had given his client 12l. a-year during two years, to take out the increased duty certificate; but he lately discovered that the client had only taken out 6l. certificates. He then offered at the stamp-office to pay the difference of the duty and penalty, which was refused without the sanction of the court. On affidavit of these facts the court granted the application on payment of the difference.

of the duty, the amount of the penalties, and a fine of 20s. Anon. B. C. I. 44.

3. Duties and Liabilities.—(v) The court has the power of enforcing the delivery of a bill of costs to the client, but the court has no jurisdiction as to the taxation. In re Archer, I. 107.

(v*) A rule to set a verdict aside was refused in an action for witnesses' expences brought against an attorney in which a verdict passed for the plaintiff, who had been subpoenaed by the attorney as a witness on the trial of a former cause, in which the defendant had acted as plaintiff's attorney, but refused to pay the witnesses' expences. Cannon v. Young, Q. B. I. 25.

(w) An attorney is liable to damages for negligence, if he invests the money of his client upon insufficient security, and that to the extent of the loss sustained. Smith v. Hanley, N. P. I. 346.

(x) In an action against an attorney under 22nd Geo. 2. c. 45. for the penalties consequent upon acting as an attorney, while holding the offices of deputy town clerk and clerk of the peace. It was ruled at Nisi Prius by Parke, J. that proof of the defendant's merely acting as clerk of the peace, without an appointment to that office, was not sufficient to maintain the action, which ruling the court, on argument of a rule for a new trial, held to be correct. Faulkner v. Chevill, Q. B. II. 55.

(y) The court will not listen to an application to set aside a non-suit caused by neglect of plaintiff's attorney in not being in court when the cause was called on, but will leave the parties to bring a new action. Ullithorne v. Cass, Q. B. III. 26.

(z) Where an attorney is employed to bring an action, and in pursuance of his instructions sues out a writ, directed to the sheriff of Middlesex, but which was served in the city of London, and the writ is set aside by a judge's order, with costs to be paid by the plaintiff, and the plaintiff neglects to pay the costs until an attachment is issued against him; upon an action brought by the plaintiff against the attorney to recover the amount of the attachment: held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the costs of the writ of summons, but not the costs of the attachment. Exp. Samuel v. Pill, N. P. III. 299.

(aa) But the attorney is not liable to the costs of an attachment against his quondam client for non-payment of the costs incident to the setting aside the writ by means of a judge's summons and order, because the client, when informed of their non-payment by the attorney, ought to have paid them instead of allowing himself to be attached. Id.

(bb) The court will not disturb a sale of real property by a client to his solicitor (who subsequently obtains an advance in the price) after the lapse of more than a quarter of a century, and a failure of proof of fraud. Rudd v. Sewell, L. C. III. 359.

(cc) Where a bill is filed, impeaching a deed on the ground of fraud, the attorney who prepared it will be allowed to be made a party to the suit, in order to obtain a full discovery, because he is in effect a party to the fraud. Beadles v. Burch, V. C. III. 405.

(dd) A solicitor ought not to act for both vendor and purchaser on the sale of real property, for, by so doing, he places himself in a situation rendering it difficult for him to act entirely right. When a solicitor acts for a client, and it afterwards becomes a question whether he acted for such client or not, the client may call upon the solicitor for his authority in writing. But to this rule exceptions prevail, inasmuch as the client's conduct may show authority either at the time or by subsequent acquiescence. Cattell v. Simons, M. R. III. 407.

(ee) When a solicitor is compelled under the 56th

Order to withdraw from the prosecution of a decree, the court will give the new solicitor liberty to inspect all papers, &c. relating to the cause which may be in the possession of his predecessor, but without prejudice to the latter's lien for costs. Binnett v. Baxter, V. C. IV. 5.

(es*) A solicitor who voluntarily removes himself from a cause, shall give up the papers to his client's new solicitor, without prejudice to his own lien, for costs, so as to enable the new solicitor to carry on the suit. Id. See Heslop v. Metcalf, 3 Mylne & Cr. 183.

(ff) An attorney cannot discharge a prisoner in execution for debt without receiving the amount thereof, and license by an attorney to discharge such a prisoner is no answer by a public officer to an action for an escape, unless he avers payment of the debt or a special authority from the creditor to his attorney to consent to the prisoner's discharge. Savery v. Chapman in Davis v. Cresswell, Q. B. IV. 89.

(gg) If the solicitor of a cause set down for hearing, neglects to deliver the usual papers to the judge, the course usually adopted at the Rolls is to strike the cause out of the paper, and, at the same time, to give leave for its restoration therein, on application being made for that purpose the same day. Gray v. Foot, M. R. IV. 141.

(hh) If evidence is adduced sufficient to satisfy a jury, that the defendants (two attorneys), for the purpose of arresting the plaintiff on a capias ad satisfaciendum, directed a clerk in their employ to devise means for that purpose, and he adopted the novel scheme of trumping up a criminal charge against the plaintiff, whereby he might be taken before a police magistrate, with a view, that on his certain discharge from thence, they might have an opportunity of arresting him on the civil process, or that the attorneys, being cognizant of such a proceeding, acquiesced therein, they are liable in damages for the offence. Rugby v. Moss and Humphreys, N. P. IV. 222.

(ii) An attorney who retains a proctor for a party in a cause, does not thereby necessarily become liable to him for costs, and such attorney may therefore be examined as a witness in the same cause. Allen v. M'Pherson, Prerog. C. IV. 285.

(jj) A solicitor will not be held to have obtained a deed of security for costs from his client by means of undue influence, where proof is merely given that the client trusted wholly to the solicitor, without showing that the latter had some particular controul over the client; but proof will, in such cases, be required that some advantage was obtained—some threats or undue influence used, or that the transaction complained of was contrary to the policy of the law. Casborn v. Barsham, M. R. II. 358.

4. Privileges.—See Stockdale v. Hansard, III. 251.

(kk) An attorney is entitled to carry a cause to trial after a notice from his client not to do so, where a fair reason exists of imputing collusion between the plaintiff, the defendant's attorney, and other parties, to deprive the plaintiff's attorney of his costs. Marks v. Benjamin, Ex. II. 152. III. 265.

(ll*) It is not the custom of the courts to call upon an attorney to answer matters on an affidavit, charging him with an offence for which he may be indicted. Id.

(ll) An attorney cannot be called upon to answer matter in an affidavit which charges him with an indictable offence. Id.

(mm) If a plaintiff and defendant settle an action between themselves, without the plaintiff's attorney's cognizance, and without paying his costs, the latter may (on proof that the agreement for such settlement was entered into for the purpose of depriving him of such costs) proceed against the defendant to judgment as if no settlement had been made. Jones v. Hughes, Ex. IV. 76.

(nn) The Insolvent Debtor's Court issued commissions to attornies in the country to take bail. Id. I. D. C. II. 378.

5. TAXATION AND OTHER INCIDENTS TO COSTS, &c.

(oo) The Court of Exchequer has power to enforce the delivery of an attorney's bill of costs, in order that the client may satisfy himself of the amount, and have an opportunity of seeing whether he has been properly credited for all monies received. The point never decided on argument.—A rule was made absolute for the delivery of a bill of costs against an attorney, Esparte Archer, Ex. I. 107. See Clarkson v. Parker, 7 Dowl. 87.

(pp) The Court of Chancery has the power to refer the bill of costs of a London solicitor who has acted as agent for a country solicitor for taxation. Esparte Boord, M. R. III. 340. On appeal L. C. did not decide the point, ante, III. 391. See Jones v. Roberts, 8 Sim. 397. Esparte Wood, M. R. IV. 7.

(qq) To enable a court of law to order an attorney to deliver his bill of costs, it is imperatively requisite that some portion (however small) of the business in respect of which such bill is required, should be done in the court in which an application to order such delivery is made, and the affidavits upon which the application is founded, must be entitled in the cause. The court has jurisdiction for the purpose. Esparte Lord Cardross re Hodgson, and Burton, Ex. III. 410, (8.)

(rr) Rule that an attorney cannot oppose the discharge of an insolvent debtor in respect of a bill of costs not delivered before the hearing. Re Wm Schultz, Ins. Deb. C. III. 72.

(ss) An assumpsit for work and labour as an attorney, the defendants pleaded in abatement and alleged that the promise was made by them jointly with others, on which point issue was joined. It was proved that some of the contracts on which the action was founded, were made by the defendants alone, but others jointly with other persons: held, that the plea was not made out; that the plaintiff was not bound to new assign, and that inasmuch as the plea was indivisible, the plaintiff was entitled to recover the whole demand. Hill v. White, C. P. III. 104.

(tt) An attorney cannot maintain an action against his client for the costs of a former action incurred after a positive revocation of the retainer, and notice not to proceed therewith have been given. Briggs v. Glover, C. P. III. 121. (See Marks v. Benjamin (kk), and Jones v. Hughes (hh), supra.)

(uu) Where an order was made for payment of costs within a limited time after taxation, the proceedings taken under that order were held irregular, because it was not served upon the client before the expiration of the time specified in the order, for payment. Duffield v. Elwes, L. C. IV. 21.

(vv) On the death of an attorney his executors delivered a bill of costs due to him as attorney for the lessor of a plaintiff in an action of ejectment, and a judge's order was obtained referring it to the master for taxation: held, that the bill was not taxable, and that the judge had therefore no power so to refer it. Doe d. Sabine v. Sabine, B. C. IV. 89. See Maddesford v. Austwick, 3 Mylne & Cr. 423.

(ww) Upon discharging the original attorney in a cause, and substituting another in his stead, the former is not bound upon tender and payment by a third person of his bill of costs, as taxed by the master to deliver up the deeds and other writings in his custody belonging to his client, to such third person, upon his simple demand ~~unaccompanied by a letter of attorney~~. The rule in such cases is, that a third person may make the demand upon the authority of a letter of attorney only, a copy of which must be served with the demand, and the original produced. Doe d. Hickman v. Hickman, C. P. IV. 280.

(x1) In 1837, the widow and executrix of A, a solicitor, filed a bill against the executrix of B, for the recovery of a bill of costs due to A for services rendered to B, from 1826 to 1830. The statute of limitations was pleaded in answer to the bill, but at the time of the filing it, the law on the subject was under the circumstances doubtful, in consequence of the decision of Lord Brougham in Jones v. Scott. The law being subsequently settled against the plaintiff, the defence became good. The defendant had also set up as a defence the non-application of a sum of money which A received for the benefit of B, but failed to prove this defence. The L. C. dismissed the bill, but without costs as regarded the false defence. Field v. Churchill, L. C. IV. 411. See Jones v. Scott: D. P. 4 Cl. & Fin. 382.

6. MISCELLANEOUS.

(yy) Lien. A solicitor cannot retain deeds deposited in his custody, and on which he has a lien for costs, unless they belong to the person who employed him. Distinction in these cases between deeds belonging to the party who employs the solicitor, and deeds belonging to another party. A solicitor cannot have a lien upon anything to which other parties beside his clients are entitled. Hicks v. Kent, M. R. III. 24.

(z1) The Court of Queen's Bench has no ordinary jurisdiction over the attornies to compel them to deliver up mortgage securities upon which they have a lien, although improperly or irregularly obtained. Rising v. Dolphin, B. C. III. 310.

(aaa) If a solicitor withdraw himself from the conduct of a suit, his client will be allowed the free use of such of the papers which he (the solicitor) holds as are required in the prosecution of the suit. But it will be without prejudice to that solicitor's right of lien on those papers. In this case such use was allowed on the new solicitor's undertaking to prosecute the suit with diligence. Cane v. Martin, M. R. IV. 155.

(bbb) The principle is, that the solicitor claiming a lien should have every security not inconsistent with the progress of the cause, but there will neither be the same ease and celerity, nor as little expence in the conduct of it, if the new solicitor is merely to have access to the papers, as when they are placed in his hands upon his undertaking to restore them after the immediate purposes of the production have been served. L. C. IV. 156.

At common law the sheriff can only seize things which he can sell; goods, therefore, deposited by A with B in the way of trade, and B holds them as a lien for work and labour bestowed on such goods, and also under a special agreement as a security for other monies, cannot be taken in execution under a writ of fieri facias issued against the bailee. *Legg v. 2. The exclusive privilege of the Bank of England to accept bills of exchange, having more than six months to run, operates to render it unlawful for an English Joint Stock Banking Company, consisting of more than six persons, to enter into an arrangement with a foreign bank in pursuance of which the latter drew such bills upon the manager of the Joint Stock Banking Company in his individual capacity, but payable at the company's bank, whose funds are made responsible for the due payment of the bills. *Booth v. 3. To an action by R, (Manager of the "National and Provincial Bank of England") against the maker of a promissory note payable to such "manager," the defendant pleaded that the plaintiff was not such manager. It appeared that the Company had various branches in the country, with a local manager or chief clerk to each, and at one of which branch banks the note in question was issued: held, that in this case the term "manager" referred to and meant the "general" and not the "local manager." *Robertson v. (3) On appeals from the Court of Review, the Court of Chancery has no jurisdiction upon facts which are not found by the Court of Review. Exp. Ross, L. C. II. 101.

(4) Orders of the Court of Review are of no effect until the great seal has been affixed to them. Exp. Harper, L. C. IV. 187.

(b) (5) A dentist who deals in teeth, and occasionally purchases large quantities of them at one time, is a trader within the meaning of the bankrupt laws. Gibson v. Carroll, N. P. II. 186.

(c) (6) A second affidavit against a debtor under section 8. of the act for abolishing imprisonment for debt, (1 & 2 Vic. c. 110,) will not be ordered to be taken off the file, because made for the same debt as a former affidavit, if it appears that such former affidavit is not available by reason of being made for an uncertain amount. Exp. Rose, C. R. II. 90.

(7) If a trader gives a bill of sale of the whole of his property for a pre-existing debt, he thereby commits an act of bankruptcy. Exp. Iron, C. B. II. 375. See 9.

8. An affidavit of debt was made on the 22nd Aug. and a fiat issued on the 29th September following, but being superseded for want of prosecution, a second fiat issued on the 24th Oct.: held, (on appeal from C. R.)

that the second was a good fiat, although it was not issued until after the expiration of two months from the filing of the affidavit, in as much as the act of bankruptcy was complete on the issuing of the first fiat. Exp. Parker, L. C. III. 165.

(9) An assignment of a trader's effects sufficient to constitute an act of bankruptcy must be an assignment of all his effects, and not of a part only. Exp. James Moore, Bankr. C. IV. 348. See (7), (34).

(d) (11) O, the owner of a vessel trading to the East Indies, called "the B," engaged D as her captain for the voyage; D being in embarrassed circumstances went ashore at Algoa Bay, leaving F the first mate in command, and whom he afterwards by writing desired to take charge of the vessel for O. D also wrote to the latter, stating that he had handed the cabin furniture over to him in discharge of a debt he owed him. Upon receiving this letter, O wrote to F instructing him to keep possession of the furniture, &c. for him. On the ship's arrival at London on the 6th December, O took possession of the goods. Two days previously to this, however, D committed an act of bankruptcy, on which a fiat issued on the 6th December. The assignees of D claimed the goods: but it was held, that while the goods were in F's possession, he held them as O's agent, and therefore that O, through F, had possession of the goods before the act of bankruptcy was committed, and was entitled to detain them from the assignees. Belcher v. Oldfield, C. P. III. 71.

(11b) A fiat bore date on the 4th May, and the docket thereupon was struck on the same day, but was not delivered to the solicitor to the commission until the 6th of the same month: held, that from the time the great seal was applied to the fiat, the bankrupt's property was bound by it. That "suing out a commission" was the "application" for it, and that the fixing the great seal is the "issuing" of it. Therefore where a declaration of insolvency was filed on the 9th March, a fiat and docket dated and struck as above-mentioned, though not delivered till the 6th May, was held good. Exp. Rowe, L. C. III. 21.

12. It is optional in an official assignee to allow the use of his name in an action before he receives a sufficient indemnity. Exp. Franks, C. R. IV. 362.

(13) A promissory note for barrister's fees, marked by a solicitor and charged to his client is provable by a barrister against the solicitor's estate on his becoming bankrupt. Exp. Helder and Co., Bankr. C. II. 376.

(14) A creditor's assignee, claiming by assignment, may prove the assigned debt against the bankrupt's estate, to the amount appearing on the bankrupt's books, without the concurrence of his assignor. Exp. Chambers, Bankr. C. III. 105.

(15) Where a trader became bankrupt, who upwards of six years anterior to his bankruptcy, agrees to pay his bankers, as well as his other creditors, a composition of 5s. in the pound, which the bankers agreed to accept, and on payment of part of the composition, gave an undertaking to release him from the whole debt, on payment of the full amount of the composition; but no further payment was made until after their bankruptcy, when, after a correspondence on the part of the bankers' assignees and the bankrupt, in which the original debt was referred to and acknowledged, the bankrupt sent a check for 100*l.*, and in the form of a receipt he sent with it, the composition was referred to as then subsisting, but the assignees declined to adopt that form of receipt: held, that the whole of the composition was not paid before the bankruptcy, the original debt was revived, and could be proved under the fiat. Exp. Wetherston, C. R. IV. 268. See Exp. Bennett, Ross v. Ross, Ann. 332; Mackenzie v. Mackenzie, 16 Ves. J. 372; Swell v. Mussen, 1 Vern. 210; Boothby v. Sinder, 3 Camp. 175; Austey v. Marden, 1 N. R. 134; Smith, 426; Steinman v. Magnus, 11 East, 300; Camp, 124. 3 Western's Conveyancing, 182 n. (6).

(16) An allegation, in a petition, that proof of a debt had been received on a defective deposition is immaterial, and no creditor has a right to say a commissioner admitted a proof on defective evidence, unless he succeeds in negating the right to prove. Exp. Marston, C. R. III. 136.

(17) Proof against a bankrupt's estate, by his trustees, for the amount of trust monies applied by the bankrupt to his own benefit, cannot be made without an order from the court above. Exp. Clarke, Bankr. C. I. 334.

F. (18) On a dissolution of partnership between A and B, it was agreed that B should take the whole of the property and guarantee the payment of outstanding debts: held, that on the bankruptcy of B, a debt due to A, contracted during the partnership, might be proved under the fiat against B's separate estate. Exp. Jones, C. R. II. 44.

(19) Two partners, A and B, dissolved partnership, and the concern was then carried on by B alone, who was to give a warrant of attorney with judgment thereon to A, for the amount which his share of the stock, &c. was valued at, payable by instalments. Before the whole of the sum due to A was paid, B became bankrupt, leaving some of the partnership debts unpaid. A claimed to prove for his balance against B's separate estate. The outstanding joint creditors were cognizant of the arrangement between the partners and seemed to assent to it, though one of them had a joint judgment on which he had acted subsequent to the arrangement: held, that these circumstances were sufficient to take the case out of the rule in bankruptcy "that a retired partner cannot prove against the separate estate of his former partner, if any debts for which he was jointly liable remain unpaid." Exp. Rolf, C. B. II. 344.

(20) A member of a copartnership agreed with the other members thereof to retire from the concern, and leave all the partnership property to the continuing partners, on condition of their discharging all the partnership debts, including a large one due to the bankers. The bankers signed a memorandum acceding to such agreement so far as it concerned them, but afterwards took proceedings under 1 & 2 Vic. c. 110. to declare all the partners bankrupts on account of the debt due to them. The retiring partner applied for an injunction to restrain the bankers from taking any proceedings to obtain such fiat against him, which was granted as prayed. Attwood v. Banks, M. R. II. 153.

(21) Bankruptcy does not affect the identity of a partnership established under the joint stock bank Act, 7 G. 4. c. 46. Exp. Marston, C. R. III. 136.

(g) (22) A fiat will be superseded if proved to have been concerted by the bankrupt and connected for fraudulent purposes conducing to his own benefit, and the defeat of an execution by a judgment creditor. Exp. Glover, C. R. III. 55. See (24.)

(23) After a fiat has been superseded the Court will under circumstances order its enrolment in order to enable the party against whom it was illegally issued to prosecute an action against the petitioning creditor for such issue. Exp. May, Bankr. C. III. 56.

(24) An order of the Court of Review is of no effect until the great seal is affixed thereto; and the Lord Chancellor therefore declined to alter the date of an order annulling a fiat pronounced by that Court on the 30th May, which could not be obtained from the office in order to procure his lordship's signature until the 1st of June, when it reached his lordship for that purpose. Exp. Harper, L. C. IV. 187.

(25) Where a fiat appears to have been issued at the instance of a bankrupt to defeat an execution by a judgment creditor, the court will annul it. Exp. Munroe, C. R. IV. 282. See 22 sup.

(26) A bankrupt's right to a supersedeas, after he has obtained his creditor's assent thereto, is not conditioned on payment of costs. Exp. Green, C. R. IV. 110.

(h) (27) The court will not on petition stay a bankrupt's certificate until the master has reported on the state of the accounts. The allowance of the certificate is a matter within the discretion of the court, and it will not interfere unless misconduct can be fairly imputed to the bankrupt. Exp. Stocken, C. R. I. 329.

(28) An objection to a petition because it only asked that the certificate might be stayed, without alleging that it had been issued and allowed by the proper authority, will not be allowed. Id.

(29) A bankrupt, after obtaining his certificate, remains liable upon a guarantee given by him before his bankruptcy, such guarantee not being proveable under the fiat. Lane v. Burghart, N. P. IV. 206. 234.

(i) (29*) The commissioners of the Court of Bankruptcy will not certify their approval of a bankruptcy bail bond, where no particulars are laid before them but the bond and an affidavit of its execution, if none of the parties appear, and no evidence is given of the sufficiency of the sureties, or of the creditors having been served with notice of the debtor's intention to tender the bond. Exp. Cathis, Bankr. C. I. 162.

(30) The word "witness," is a sufficient attestation to a petition within the order of L. C. Eldon made in 1809. Exp. Stocken, C. R. I. 329.

31. Bankruptcy excludes a husband from joining his wife in the exercise of a joint power of appointment. Hole v. Escott, L. C. I. 71. But see Jones Winwood, Vol. v. 360.

(32) Powers of attorney relating solely to matters in bankruptcy require no stamp. Exp. Davis, C. R. I. 75.

(33) A bankrupt who kept no books, and who was unable to produce vouchers of any kind to support his balance sheet, was not allowed to pass his last examination. Exp. Williams, Bankr. C. II. 312.

(34) Where an act of bankruptcy is founded on an affidavit of debt under stat. 1 & 2 Vic. c. 110. s. 8. and the neglect of the debtor to pay or settle for such debt within 21 days, the fiat may be issued on the petition of any creditor, and not necessarily by the creditor filing the affidavit, to the exclusion of all his co-creditors. Exp. Parker, L. C. III. 165.

(35) Where it would be an inconvenience and increased expense to a great majority of creditors if a fiat was worked at the place of the bankrupt's residence, the court will allow its removal to some other place more convenient and less expensive. Anon. L. C. II. 262.

(36) Bills of exchange amounting to 523*l.* were drawn by A, and accepted by B for A's accommodation. They were then deposited with A's bankers to secure a floating balance. On A's becoming bankrupt, the bankers proved a debt of 7520*l.* against his estate (of which debt the amount of those bills formed part), and they subsequently received a dividend of 2*s.* in the pound on the whole amount of their debt. B afterwards paid the bills: held, (reversing a decision of the Court of Review,) that B was entitled to have such dividend on the value of the bills paid to him by the bankers, and also to receive all future dividends thereon. Exp. Holmes, Re Garner, L. C. IV. 57.

(37) A person attending the court as the husband of a petitioner, is privileged from arrest. Exp. Britton, C. R. IV. 236.

Where an association raised funds by contribution, portions of which were agreed to be advanced to the members upon certain conditions, viz. the portions to be advanced were put up by auction and lent to the highest bidder who was to pay five per cent. interest in addition to the sum bid: a verdict was given that such advance was a partnership transaction, and not a scheme to lend money at usurious interest. Silver v. Burns, N. P. II. 252. A motion was afterwards made to set this verdict aside, and for a new trial, but refused. C. P. M. T. 1839.

BEQUEST.

1. Where a testator bequeathed property "in trust at his wife's decease for his surviving children:" it was held that the issue of children who died in the mother's lifetime were not included. Warrinck v. Wood, M. R. I. 406.

2. RESIDUARY.—A testator, after bequeathing a sum sufficient to produce an annuity of a given amount, directed that the principal should on the testator's death be paid over to his son and daughter, provided they attained the age of twenty-one, and he then gave them the residue of his property. If his son and daughter died under twenty-one, the testator directed it to be divided between four persons whom he named as executors, one of whom was named as surviving with testator's effects: The children died under twenty-one: held, that the principal money producing the annuity went to the next of kin, and that the executor who had renounced was not entitled to a share of the residue. Barber v. Barber, L. C. on appeal, I. 41.

3. Where a testator directed trustees after, and in case of the death of his daughter without issue, to assign the residue of his personal estate, "unto the nearest of kin of his own family for ever:" it was held, (confirming a decree of the court below,) that, as circumstances shewed that these words referred to the nearest of kin of the testator at the daughter's decease, the nearest of kin both of the testator himself and of his daughter at her decease was entitled to the fund. Clapton v. Bulwer, L. C. IV. 75.

4. A bequest to trustees to be enjoyed by the person in possession of other property until a tenant in tail of the age of twenty-one years shall be in the possession of such property, and then to go and belong to such tenant in tail, is void for remoteness. *Ibbotson v. #### BILL, AMENDING.

1. A bill cannot be amended after replication upon affidavits which are not positive or pledged to belief. Addis v. Campbell, R. C., III. 153.

2. It is always a matter of discretion in the court to grant leave to amend a bill after demurrer. Heriz v. Reina, L. C. III. 391.

3. A plaintiff may amend his bill by an order of course before answer, and without prejudice to a common injunction. Ferrand v. Hamer, L. C. I. 118. 137.

4. In a case where extensive inquiries were rendered necessary by the answers, and the plaintiff's solicitor could not complete them so as to move to amend his bill before the time allowed by the rules of court for so doing had expired, but permitted as little delay to take place as possible, the court granted leave to amend on payment of costs notwithstanding those rules. Wilford v. Bell, M. R. IV. 428.

5. If an order to amend is made upon stating amendments to shew their materiality, and if exceptions are allowed to the answer to those amendments rendering it necessary to make further amendments, the party seeking to amend must show such further amendments to have become necessary by the setting forth of new facts in such answer. *Dixon v. #### BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

1. A bill of exchange drawn on a discontinued stamp is invalid, and the amount thereof cannot be recovered. Abraham v. Skinner, N. P. I. 119.

2. An acceptor of a bill of exchange, which was altered in its acceptance by being made payable at a certain place, but without his knowledge, is not liable for the amount. Calvert v. Baker, Ex. I. 108.

3. The figures in the margin of a bill of exchange are controlled by the words written in the body of it—and parol evidence will not be admitted to show for what amount the parties themselves had treated it, although the stamp was for the larger sum. Sunder-son v. Piper, C. P. II. 58.

4. An acceptance of a bill of exchange, written by a third party, but subsequently avowed by the acceptor, was ruled to be a sufficient acceptance. Ansell v. Andrews, N. P. II. 89.

5. In an action by A against B on two bills of exchange, a plea of tender was held supported by proof, that B's shop-boy enquired of A's attorney what was due for principal and interest on the bills, at the same time stating that he had orders to tender the amount, which the attorney said would not be accepted unless a disputed shop account was settled as required by A. This question the shop boy declined entering into, but said, "Here are 150 sovereigns: if you won't tell me what is due to the plaintiff, will you take what is due out of this sum?" and placed the money in view, which the attorney refused. Bevan v. Rees, Ex. II. 104.

6. An acceptance of a bill of exchange, written by a third person by direction of the intended acceptor, is of the same effect as if he had written it himself, so as to quash an indictment for forgery preferred against such third person by the holder of the bill. Reg. v. Spencer, Hants Summer Assizes, 1839. II. 199.

7. An action of debt may be maintained against the immediate parties to a bill of exchange or promissory note, although the words, "value received," are not found upon the instrument. Hatch v. Trevelyan, Watson v. Keightly, Q. B. III. 408.

8. To an action on a bill of exchange, it was pleaded that before the commencement of the suit the bill was indorsed by the plaintiff to some person unknown to the defendant, and who was at that time the holder of the bill:—the plaintiff's replication, which alleged that he indorsed the bill to R K, who presented it to defendant for payment, when it was dishonoured; after which the plaintiff again became the holder thereof and entitled to sue thereon, and concluding with a special traverse of the allegation of an unknown person's being holder of the bill, was held bad, as offering a traverse of an immaterial circumstance. Phillips v. May, Ex. IV. 143.

9. The proper answer to such a plea would have been to reply that the person in the said plea alluded to was not the holder of the bill modo et forma. Id.

NOTICES OF DISHONOUR.

10. A notification whereby "Mr. S informed Mr. P that B's acceptance was not paid—as indorser Mr. P was therefore called upon to pay the money, which was expected immediately," was held an insufficient notice of dishonour to the indorser of a bill of exchange. Strange v. Price, Q. B. II. 40.

11. But "I beg to inform you that Mr. D's acceptance for — drawn and indorsed by you, on July 1, has been presented for payment and returned, and now remains unpaid," is a good notice of dishonour to the drawer of a bill of exchange. Cook v. French, Q. B. IV. 44.

12. A notice, "This is to inform you that the bill I took of you for 15l. 2s. 6d. is not took up, and 4s. 6d. expences, and the money I must pay immediately," was held by the court not a sufficient notice. Messinger v. Southey, C. P. IV. 44.

A notice that "the bill for 250l., drawn by J F, and accepted by C S, and bearing your indorsement, has been presented for payment to the acceptor thereof and returned dishonoured, and now lies overdue, and unpaid with me as above, of which I hereby give you notice." The court held was a sufficient notice to the indorser of a bill of exchange. Lewis v. Gomperts, Exch. IV. 61.

G, a master mariner, agreed to freight the A from London to the East Indies, and C guaranteed the performance of the charter party, whereby G bound himself to repair any damage the ship might sustain during the voyage: the ship stranded on her return, and received considerable damage. On arriving at London she was taken to a shipwright's yard and repaired to some extent, but whether by the order of G or the owner did not appear. It was, however, afterwards discovered, that the ship required greater repairs than was at first anticipated, and she was then sold for the purpose of breaking up. It was decided that C was liable upon the guarantee to the difference between a sum received from an insurance office for the damage, and the estimated costs of the required repairs. *Mosley v. 1. Election of.—The following mode of electing churchwardens was held a valid custom for that purpose, viz. "The inhabitants being assembled in the vestry on the day appointed for the election, quit that room upon the vicar taking the chair, and retire into the body of the church, leaving the churchwardens whose term of office is about to expire with the chairman in the vestry. The churchwardens then proceed to the body of the inhabitants and select two of their number, whom they send into the vestry in their stead, and having so done, they themselves mingle with the rest of the parishioners. The main body still remaining in the church, then send into the vestry two more persons as their representatives, and the four who thus join the vicar call in two more. The six then deliberate amongst themselves, and appoint the two churchwardens for the ensuing year." Reg. v. Archdeacon of Ely, N. P. II. 219.

A mandamus cannot be maintained against the archdeacon to compel his admitting a person to the office of churchwarden for the parish in which such a custom prevails, where he had been elected in opposition to it. Id.

2. Place of Election of.—The proper place to elect churchwardens is some convenient place within the precincts of the church. Reg. v. Doyly, Clk. Q. B. IV. 314.

3. Right to preside at Elections of.—The rector has a common law right to preside over the election of churchwardens, because he is, for ecclesiastical purposes, the head of the parish, and because he is the owner of the freehold of the church. Id.

4. Although churchwardens are temporal officers, yet they are so far connected with ecclesiastical matters, that the rector has a right to interfere. Id.

According to a practice existing at Hull, the merchants there are not bound by contracts entered into with or by brokers on their behalf, unless the principals were satisfied that parties to whom their goods were sold on credit were respectable, and trust-worthy : held, therefore, that where such a principal, on whose behalf a broker had contracted for the sale of goods on credit, caused an enquiry to be made, from the result of which he deemed it advisable to treat with the parties for ready money only, he was, on their declining so to do, entitled to rescind the contract altogether. *Aston v. Where A contracted with B, of London, (who was then an insolvent to a very large amount), to sell him a quantity of lead, which B ordered to be delivered, and the lead was shipped for and conveyed to London accordingly ; during which time B failed, and the bills given in payment were dishonoured. It was held, that unless B entered into the contract with a certain prospect of inability to pay for the lead, and with a fraudulent view of obtaining the property without payment, it would not amount to a case of fraud, sufficient to avoid the contract. Toulmin v. Turquand, N. P. I. 139.

1. Phillpotts*, N. P. II. 154.

2. A house of ill fame is not a sufficient nuisance to entitle a party to treat an agreement for taking premises adjoining thereto as null and void, although he was ignorant of the ill fame at the time of entering into the agreement, and the agent of the owner of the premises without his principal's authority, and without being cognizant that such was not the fact, in answer to a question from the party taking the premises, stated that there was nothing objectionable about them; it is not enough to constitute fraud. *Crowfoot v. 2. When the court has ordered a party to

3. A cause was originally set down for trial and referred to an arbitrator whose award was set aside for want of a finding, except on an immaterial issue held, that neither party could claim the costs of the trial thus rendered abortive. Wood v. Duncan, C. P. II. 43.

4. The court has no power under 7 Jac. I. c. 5. to award double costs to magistrates, independent of the Judge's certificate. Penny v. Slade, C. P. II. 42.

6. Equitable circumstances will on some occasions exempt a defeated party from payment of costs. Townsend v. Champenown, Ex. Eq. II. 392.

1. Arrest.—The court refused to grant a rule to shew cause why a judge's order for defendant's arrest should not be reconsidered, and why the bail-bond given should not be discharged and the expences of the arrest be borne by the plaintiff, in Larchin v. Willan, Ex. I. 47.

1 a. Where a defendant who had been arrested, made an affidavit, stating that he had not been and that he did not intend to go out of England. The court granted a rule, calling upon the plaintiff to shew cause why an order, authorizing defendant's detention until he should give bail, should not be rescinded. Baddington v. Wordley, Bail C. I. 60.

1 b. Where a defendant, who had been arrested upon an affidavit that he was about to leave the country, swore that he knew no such person as was alleged to have made the affidavit, and that he had no intention of quitting the country. The court granted a rule nisi for his discharge. Exp. Jacob, B. C. III. 56.—See INSOLVENTS.

2. Bail.—Where a person was in custody for the amount of a verdict obtained against him in an action of crim. con., the court exercised its discretionary power to grant or refuse bail under this act by remanding the prisoner. Exp. Gomme, I. D. C. II. 90.

See INSOLVENTS.

3. Discharge of Debtor.—The court cannot discharge a prisoner out of custody while his petition under the act remains upon the file of the court. Exp. Williams, I. D. C. II. 13.

3 a. An insolvent who was out upon bail had petitioned the court for his discharge under the act. But while out of custody was discharged by his detaining creditor the night previous to the appointed day of hearing: held, that he could not be heard upon this petition. Exp. Whiteman, I. D. C. III. 27.

4. Jurisdiction and Power of Courts and Commissioners.—This act does not extend to the courts of Common Pleas of Durham and Lancaster. Carl v. Elliott, B. C. I. 58.

4 a. Under sections 14 and 18 of the act, the court has the power of ordering a sum of money standing in the name of the accountant-general of the court to the separate account of defendant to be charged with the amount of a judgment obtained against him in a court of common law. Hales v. Day, V. C. III. 22.

4 b. The court of chancery has no power under sec. 14. of the act to make orders creating a charge upon stock belonging to a debtor in favor of a judgment creditor. Miles v. Pristland, L. C. III. 328.

5. Property of Debtor.—A creditor who had obtained a vesting order under the compulsory clause of the act, and was named assignee, was allowed an order to search the prisoner's room for property. Exp. Ford, I. D. C. 1. 4. 8.

5a. The court refused to grant a plaintiff a rule to attach a sum of money under the 12th and 14th secs. of the act, where it appeared that the sum in question was the purchase-money of a piece of land sold by the defendant to a railway company, and that it was uncertain whether the money remained with the company or had been paid by them to a trustee for the defendant's use. *Robinson v. 2. A testator devised the "freehold lands," which he held in the parishes of W, B, and M, and which he described as being held for a considerable time by his father's ancestors in the male line, with his own collateral heir of the name of D; held, that this devise was sufficient to pass "leaseholds" in those parishes, which had been held as described by the testator. Doe d. Dunning v. El. of Cranston, IV. 267.

3. H devised lands to his daughters J L and R A for life, remainder to his sister for life, remainder to M H and N H for their respective lives, and if either of the two should die without leaving issue male, the whole to the survivor for life. If M H should die after testator's daughters and sister before N H, leaving issue male, a moiety of the estate was to go to the first and other sons of M H in tail male, and in default of such issue, remainder to N H for life, remainder to the use of the first and other sons of N H in tail male, and in default of such issue to testator's right heirs. If N H after the death of testator's daughters and sisters should die before M H, leaving issue male, a moiety of the estate was to go to the first and other sons of N H in tail male, and in default of such issue to M H for life, remainder to the use of the first and other sons of M H in tail male, and in default of such issue to the testator's right heirs. In case M H and N H should both die without issue male or such issue male should die without issue male, the estate to go to the use of such person as at the death of the survivor should be the testator's right heir. Testator's daughter R A, his sister and M H, all died in the lifetime of J L without issue: held, that upon her death without issue N H took an estate tail in the whole of the property. Franks v. Price, R.C. IV. 278.

4. A testator after making a trust direction of the produce of the residue of his real and personal estates in favor of R P, if a certain event should not happen, on the happening whereof he "revoked that bequest," and made a conditional direction "of the residue of his estate" to R P's issue, and in default thereof, after bequeathing some specific legacies, directed the remainder of "the said property" unto W H, his executors and administrators, to whom in a given event he gave and bequeathed the same. Neither condition took effect, and R P died without issue: held, that W H was entitled to realty as well as personalty, notwithstanding the non-technical use of the words printed in italics. Hinds v. Pugh, L.C. IV. 397.

5. A devise to three daughters by name M, E, and A, will not include an illegitimate daughter bearing one of such names, unless she can satisfy a jury that the testator intended her to be one of the devisees. Doe d. Thomas v. Brynon, N. P. I. 365.

The defendant had not appeared, and there was consequently a variance between the writ of summons and the affidavits. The court held the objection and discharged the rule. Borthwick v. Ravenscroft, Ex. II. 27. See Shrimpton v. Carter, 3 Dowl. 648.

2. Where it appeared that enquiries had been made for a defendant at his residence in order to serve him with a writ of summons, on the 10th December, when he was stated to be at a certain inn, and also on the 27th of the same month and five following days, when the servant's reply was that he was "from home." 3. Where repeated attempts had been made to serve a writ of summons on a defendant who kept out of the way to avoid service, and gave directions that the person who attempted the service should be given into custody the next time he called, the court granted a rule for a distringas. *Mason v. ## ENTERTAINMENT, PLACE OF.

The penalty imposed by 26 Geo. 2. on persons who keep a place of entertainment without being duly licensed, only attaches when the place is kept open with the owner's permission, and in an action for such penalty it is not necessary to prove that the house was kept solely for the purposes which were unlawful without such license, it being sufficient if proof is adduced that that was one of the purposes for which it was kept, and it is immaterial that the owner of the house derives no profit from the entertainment. But these are questions of fact and ought always to be left to the jury. Marks v. Benjamin, Ex. II. 152. III. 265.

ESCAPE.

1. After an insolvent had been heard, he, accompanied by an officer went to a place 300 yards out of the direct line from the court to the prison, and there remained about an hour and a half and had some refreshments. The court held, that he had been out of custody and dismissed the petition. Exp. Lockwood, I. D. C. I. 108.

2. A prisoner in the Queen's Bench prison for debt was seen beyond the prescribed limits of the prison rules, viz. at Greenwich fair on the 16th April, 1838, which fact coming to the creditor's knowledge he sued the gaoler for an escape. It being proved that the prisoner returned within the rules next morning, and the jury being satisfied that he theretofore remained in custody until the action was commenced, they by the judge's direction returned a verdict for defendant. Davies v. Chapman, N. P. IV. 267.

EVIDENCE.

1. The evidence of a person, who signed a promissory note as surety, is admissible in an action against the principal to prove the signature by him or such, and by the witness and another person as sureties. Page v. Thomas, Ex. IV. 330.

2. A husband, to whose wife a testator had bequeathed all the property, furniture, and credits pertaining to him at his decease, cannot be examined as a witness in an action by the executors to recover some of the property, although he had executed a release to them, unless the wife joined in such release, because her interest in the property could not be reduced into possession by the husband before its recovery by the executors. Budd v. Edwards, N. P. IV. 270.

3. On the trial of an action by a person, who had been secretary to an association, for the amount of his salary. The books of the association were produced, and the following entry appeared therein—“Resolved that J H be secretary, at a salary of 51. per week:” held, that this entry was properly received in evidence, although unstamped. Montague v. Bryant, C. P. IV. 330.—But,

4. The books of a joint stock company are not evidence of agreements with their officers unless stamped as such. Hammon v. Timmins, N. P. I. 124.

5. An I O U for money lent without an address will in the absence of proof to the contrary be construed to represent the person in whose possession it is as the lender, and he will be entitled to recover upon it although unstamped. Curtis v. Richards, C. P. IV. 414.

6. In an action of debt on an I O U, which was given in pursuance of an illegal and corrupt agreement, touching the withdrawal of a petition against the return of an M. P. on the ground of bribery, unstamped papers were admitted in evidence to prove the illegality of the agreement. Coppock v. Bowen, Ex. I. 46.

7. Where a party seeks to enforce an agreement, a stamp is necessary; but where papers are produced to prove the illegality of the alleged agreement, which on that ground ought not to be enforced, then such papers are admissible without any stamp. Id.

8. A letter from a landlord to a tenant intended only as a proposal for a lease is inadmissible in evidence as an agreement unless properly stamped, although the tenant entered and held the land under its terms. White v. Deverell, Ex. I. 46.

9. The removal of a witness from humane motives to prevent his giving evidence on the trial of a very near relation punished with imprisonment. Reg. v. Colcraft, 2 B. I. 89.

EXECUTORS.

1. An account may be taken against one of two executors, although his co-executor who was originally a party to the suit has been committed for want of an answer after appearance, and subsequently discharged under Sir E. Sugden's act, 11 Geo. 4. and 1 W. 4. c. 36. Hughson v. Cookson, Ex. Eq. II. 153.

2. Executors cannot discharge themselves from liabilities by their own books and affidavits, but must produce other evidence. Payments of above 40s. will not be allowed in executors' accounts without vouchers. Hargett v. Bell, M. R. I. 407.

3. Where the directing executors of a will (so far as the estate was concerned) permitted certain sums to remain in the hands of bankers, who failed, and the money was lost in consequence: it was held, that such executors were personally liable for the deficiency. Drake v. Martin, M. R. II. 122.

4. Two executors O W and J W instead of investing 300*l.* in manner directed by their testator, suffered the money to remain on the personal security of S, who failed, and whom cestuis que trust had never accepted as their debtor: held, that the representative of the surviving executor took upon himself the responsibility of the legacy by not adopting measures to secure the money, and was therefore personally liable. Kemp v. Brown, M. R. II. 135.

5. G bequeathed all his property to L and D in trust for his wife for life, and after her decease for his children, and appointed his wife and L and D executors. After G's death, N, his attorney, received 1500*l.* due to G, on mortgage, 1000*l.* whereof he paid to Mrs. G, other part thereof he paid to the trustees, and the remainder through N's insolvency became irrecoverable. The trustees had by deeds acknowledged the receipt of 890*l.* of the money paid to Mrs. G.: held, that they were liable for the amount, because they ought not to have allowed the widow to enjoy it, otherwise than by receipt of interest. Garland v. Littlewood, M. R. II. 342.

6. Parties on going into the master's office, can only have regard to the decree. The above trustees could not therefore be charged on further directions with other sums, for which the plaintiff's (G's children) did not at the hearing obtain from the court a declaration or enquiry. Id.

7. The trustees having succeeded in some parts of their resistance to the plaintiff's claims were held liable only for the costs occasioned by their resistance of claims which had been allowed. Id.

8. A bequeathed leasehold houses to B, in trust for his wife for life, remainder to his daughter S, and in default of issue of S, to his next of kin. A directed his executor to convert the houses into money, but this he did not, and the term expired in the lifetime of S: held, that the executor was liable to the next of kin for the value of the terms at the expiration of one year from the death of A. Mehrers v. Andrews, M. R. II. 391.

9. Equity will not support a purchase by executors of the estates of their testators against the creditors of the deceased, although a fair price may have been given, the policy of the court not allowing such transactions by trustees. Luik v. Stallard, M. R. II. 403. See 3 WESTERN'S CONVEYANCING, 174. n. i.

10. Where two of three executors permitted a sale of their testator's effects to be managed by the other of them, the court held them personally answerable for the acts of the third executor. Stevenson v. Smith, M. R. III. 378.

11. A testator appointed two executors, and died leaving money in the funds, and other property. The executors proved the will, but one of them alone received the dividends, which he misapplied; the other ignorantly and yet reasonably believed that the property was duly applied: held, that he was not answerable for the default of his co-executor. Williams v. Nixon, M. R. IV. 43.

12. Where an executrix and devisee of an insolvent's estate, carried on the testator's business for the benefit of his family, when she was entitled to nothing until all the debts were paid, the court granted an injunction on behalf of the creditors to restrain her from further interference. Jones v. Broster, M. R. II. 24.

13. A testator authorized three executors to carry on his business, and to stand possessed of the monies arising thereby, as well as from the sale of his property, in trust for his children, all of whom he named, except his son John, who he stated was purposely omitted on account of his misconduct, and the testator dismissed him with 3*l.* trusting he would amend his conduct, in which case he gave his three executors and the survivors, and survivor of them, and the executors and the administrators of such survivor, full authority to give John an equal share with the others. One executor alone proved the will. John demeaned himself according to the testator's wish: held, that the executor who proved was competent to exercise his discretion on a claim made by John's representatives for an equal share, although the other executors had not executed a deed of disclaimer, because the confidence was not personal, inasmuch as it was given to the executors, and the survivor of them, and the executors, &c. of such survivor. Eaton v. Smith, M. R. III. 85.

14. One of several persons named as executors and residuary legatees refusing to act, not entitled to the legacy as residuary legatee, because it was given to him by name on condition that he was to discharge the duty of executor, and the share to which he would have been otherwise entitled, devolved on the testator's next of kin. Barber v. Barber, I. 41.

A contract to sell the produce or crop of a certain specified close of potatoes at so much per sack, to be dug by the purchaser at the usual time, and to be then paid for by him, is not such an agreement for the purchase of an interest in land as will require a contract in writing. Sainsbury v. Mathews, Ex. L. 107.

2. D, a commercial traveller of the plaintiffs (wholesale grocers) called on the defendant (a retail grocer in the country), and received an order for a quantity of sugar, which he entered in his book and signed, but which the defendant himself did not sign: held, that D's signature was insufficient to take the case out of the enactment requiring a signature by the party to be charged, in as much as D was the agent of the plaintiffs only. Graham v. Munson, C. P. II. 103.

3. In construing the statute of frauds no distinction is to be observed between contracts for lands and contracts for goods, when those of the latter description are required to be in writing. #### HABEAS CORPUS.

1. A single Judge of the Queen's Bench may, in vacation, order this writ returnable immediately before himself at chambers, to bring up the body of a prisoner in custody, and under sentence of transportation, by a Colonial Judicature. Case of the Canadian Prisoners, I. 184, 201, 392. II. 28.

The return to the writ set out that, by an act of the Legislature in Upper Canada (passed after 5 G. 4. c. 84), the Lieutenant-Governor was enabled to grant a pardon under the great seal, upon such terms as might appear proper, to such persons then under charge of high treason committed in that province as should petition the Lieutenant-Governor before their arraignment, praying for pardon, and it provided that in case any persons should be pardoned under that act, upon condition of being transported, or banishing himself from that province either for life or for any term of years, such person, if he should return to the province before the period of his transportation or banishment, should be guilty of felony, and liable to suffer death; that the prisoner was duly indicted at a special court of Oyer and Terminer, held by authority of another act of the same legislature for the crime of high treason; that before his arraignment, in accordance with the statute, the prisoner petitioned the Lieutenant-Governor, confessing his guilt of the treason charged against him, and praying that her Majesty's pardon ought to be extended to him upon such conditions as the Lieutenant-Governor should see fit; that the Lieutenant-Governor did consent that her Majesty's mercy should be extended to him, upon condition that he should be transported, and remain transported to her Majesty's colony of Van Diemen's Land, for the term of fourteen years next ensuing the date of his arrival at Van Diemen's Land, to which terms and conditions the prisoner assented; that there being no means of conveying the prisoner directly from Upper Canada to Van Diemen's Land, it became necessary to convey him first to Quebec in Lower Canada, and then to England, for the purpose of transporting him to Van Diemen's Land; and that accordingly he was transmitted, by authority of the Lieut.-Governor of Upper Canada, to Quebec, and thence, by authority of the Executive Government there, which issued letters patent in the name of her Majesty to command that the prisoner should be delivered to Digby Martin, the master of the bark Captain Ross, to be by him conveyed to England, to such place as her Majesty should think fit, to the end that he might thence be transported to Van Diemen's Land; that Digby Martin accordingly brought him to Liverpool, the same being the place which seemed fit to her Majesty, and which was the most proper place for the purpose, and there delivered him to the gaoler of Liverpool, who retained him in his custody whilst means were preparing to transport him to Van Diemen's Land: held, that the return was good—that he was liable to be tried in England for the crime—that he cannot plead the pardon he has renounced; and that any subject of the crown in England under such circumstances might take and detain such prisoner until dealt with according to law. Any subject who held him in custody, with a knowledge of these circumstances, would be guilty of aiding him to escape, if he permitted him to go at large without lawful authority. Id. II. 28.

8. _____ to access to Children under custody of Infants Act, 2 & 3 Vict. c. 54.
9. Separate Estate.
10. Rights of both Parties during separation.

1. Rights of the Husband over the person of his Wife.

By the common law, a husband, to prevent his wife from eloping, may confine her to his dwelling house; and restrain her liberty for an indefinite period; provided he uses no unnecessary cruelty, or hardship, towards her, and imposes no unnecessary restraint upon her, and that although the wife's previous conduct affords no reason for the supposition that in her husband's absence, or whilst free from his controul, she would by her conduct injure his honour or property, Re Mrs. Cochrane, Bail Court, IV. 119.

2. Husband's right over the property of his Wife.

(a) Under a devise the wife of an insolvent was entitled to a life interest in the rents and profits of real estate. The husband's assignees filed a bill praying payment to them of the rents and profits of the wife's estate during coverture, and that the receiver should account to him accordingly. The wife insisted that she was entitled to a provision out of the rents. Decree for the assignees as prayed, but the Court has no power to order payment out of the rents for the maintenance of the wife. Sturgis v. Champney, V. C. II. 232. Decree reversed as to the wife, the assignees in coming to the Court for the purpose of enforcing equitable rights against the property, must themselves do equity by allowing a reasonable sum for the support of the wife, and a reference will be made to the master to settle the proportion that ought to be appropriated to her maintenance. Id. L. C. on appeal, III. 36.

(b) Upon the husband's death the wife is entitled to the rents and profits of the estate from the day of his decease, and to be let into possession, Id. III. 247.

(c) Where the wife of a bankrupt is entitled to a legacy, she has an equity and is entitled to a settlement. The Court is not tied down to any fixed rule as to the proportion the wife should have; in this case the wife was devised half the legacy. Ex parte Peters, C. R. III. 57.

(d) J P bequeathed personal estate to W M C upon trust for sale; and out of the proceeds to pay the interest, dividends, and annual produce thereof unto and permit the same to be received and taken by A R. (the wife of H R,) and her assigns during her life, in her and their own absolute use and benefit. After the death of the testator, A R alone agreed and directed W M C, in writing, out of the interest of part of the testator's estate to pay and allow unto A E, 7s. a-week until she should attain the age of sixteen, and A R alone covenanted to indemnify W M C against such payment. A R lived separate from her husband, and she filed a bill against W M C, for due administration of the testator's estate according to the trusts of her will. Her husband H R disclaimed all interest in the trust funds: held, that as the husband had put in his answer, and did not dispute the agreement made by his wife, and as the fund was in the hands of the defendant, W M C, and the trust for A E was therefore executed, the agreement made by A R, although voluntary, ought to be enforced against her. The trust did not constitute a gift to the separate use of A R; but the disclaimer by the husband left the trust fund at her disposal. Rycraft v. Christy, M. R. IV. 344.

(e) A man marrying a woman having children by a former husband, and by settlement all her property was assigned to trustees for her separate use. The husband becoming embarrassed, the sheriff took in execution the clothes belonging to the wife and her children by her former husband. She at the time was living separate from her husband, and the apparel was purchased from her separate property: held, that a married woman may have the use of a chattel settled upon her, but cannot convert that chattel into another. The trustees have no property in the chattels purchased with the settled property, because they belong to the husband. The trustees of the settlement are entitled to the goods purchased before the marriage, but not to the goods purchased since the marriage; the husband has no property in the clothes belonging to the children of the former marriage, even if he purchased the clothes himself, subsequent to the second marriage, for as they are not his children, but the children of his wife by a former husband, such articles can only be considered in the nature of gifts. Corn v. Bryer, Ex. N. P. IV. 60., affirmed by the Court on the ground that there was no evidence to prove agency for the trustees by the wife. V. 125.

3. Husband's liabilities for Wife's debts and actions.

(a) "Furniture" does not fall within the term "necessaries" so as to render a husband, who turns his wife out of doors without making any settlement on her, liable to pay for it. Harvey v. Norton, Q. B. N. P. III. 278. 294.

(b) A husband is prima facie liable, but he is liable only for necessaries furnished to her bona fide, for the purpose of maintaining her in a reasonable and decent manner according to her station in life. Id.

(c) A husband is liable to the father of his wife for her maintenance, after he had turned her out of doors and compelled her to go to her father. Graham v. Bunn, C. P. N. P. IV. 92.

(d) Where, in consequence of the intemperance of the wife, she is returned by the husband to her father, but an agreement is made between the husband and wife's father that, upon the husband receiving her again, if she returned to her intemperate habits, her father should take her back again, such a defence is an answer to the action. Id.

4. Husband's liabilities for debts of Wife contracted before marriage.

(a) A husband was liable to debts contracted by the wife before marriage. Edwards v. Perry et Ux. Q. B. I. 173.

(b.) A husband is not liable for the debts of a wife, who, before her marriage and during the time she was a feme sole, had taken the benefit of the insolvent act. The plea of her discharge under the insolvent act is an answer to the action. The case not one contemplated by the statute. Storr v. Lea et Ux. Q. B. I. 235.

5. Husband's Exoneration from liability for Wife's necessities.

The law exonerates a man from all liability on account of a wife who commits adultery. Newton v. Barclay, Ex. I. 123.

6. Wife's right to property where Husband lunatic.

The court will grant a summary order under the 91st sect. of 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 74, on the part of a woman whose husband was and had been in a lunatic asylum three years, that she might execute a release of her dower, without such husband's concurrence. Re Ann Holborn, C. P. I. 264.

8. Wife's right to Children under the custody of Infants Act.

On an application by a married woman (plaintiff in a suit in the ecclesiastical Court for a restitution of conjugal rights) to the Court of Chancery under the custody of infants act (2 and 3 Vict. cap. 54.) for an order for access to her children, who were in the husband's custody, the Court declined making an order until the result of the proceedings in the ecclesiastical court should become known. Re Mrs. Taylor, V. C. IV. 262. 292.

9. Wife's Separate Estate.

A testator gave certain specified stock to trustees upon certain trusts with an ultimate trust as to a moiety, in default of appointment by his daughter, to her executors, administrators or assigns. After the date of the will, the daughter married, and her husband died in the lifetime of the testator without issue. After the death of the testator his daughter married again, previous to which her specified property, and any future property she might acquire, was settled with an ultimate limitation in default of issue to her next of kin. The second husband survived; his wife had no issue, and she had made no appointment: held, that after the death of the husband and wife, the next of kin of the wife and not the representative of the husband were entitled to the moiety. The words "executors and administrators" had been construed to mean next of kin. Graftley v. Humpage, M. R. I. 25.

10. Rights of both parties during separation.

(a) If a wife elope from her husband, he is not liable for her subsequent debts; so on the contrary, if he turn her away either actually or by his own bad conduct, as by living in adultery, he is liable. Where the parties separate by consent, the husband is still liable, unless it appears that the wife has a competent maintenance, either by the provision of the husband considering his station in life, or by a settlement. If the husband is liable at all, it is of no avail that he proclaims he will not so consider himself. Dixon v. Hurrell, I. 122. Ex. N. P. Coltman, J.

(b) A, by deed of separation, in consideration of Col. P. (a trustee) undertaking to indemnify him against his wife's future debts, covenanted that he would on a certain day secure, either on real estate or by investment in the funds, or by the best means in his power secure payment to his wife an annuity of 1000l. a-year for her separate use; also, that he would pay his wife's solicitor 1000l. within a certain time. A became entitled subsequently to charge real estates with a jointure of 1500l. a-year for his present or any future wife, but refused to perform his covenants with Col. P. within the times specified. A bill was filed for a specific performance, alleging that the trustees in whom this property was vested were raising money upon it and remitting it to A, that he had no other property whereon to charge the annuity, and that he refused to secure it on this: held, that the wife had an equity to have the covenant specifically performed. A's trustees demurred for want of equity, but the demurrer was overruled. Wellesley v. Wellesley, V. C. II. 341. affirmed on appeal, L. C. III. 119.

(c) If a party enters into a contract which he disables himself from performing, the court will compel him to perform it if he shall become able. Id.

(d) It is not absolutely necessary that a deed of separation between husband and wife should contain a covenant by a trustee to indemnify the husband against the wife's future debts, or show some circumstance, which would induce the ecclesiastical court to grant a divorce a mensa et thoro. Therefore a deed containing neither of these particulars, is valid against volunteers, but not against creditors, such a deed requires no consideration. Clough v. Lambert, V. C. II. 358.

(e) As there are confessedly separations in matrimony which are legal, and as nothing appeared to show that it was in any degree in opposition to the law, the presumption must be in favour of its legality, and in such circumstances a promise to sign a deed of separation will constitute a good and sufficient consideration to support the promise to pay. Jones v. Wait, C. P. Affirmed in Error, Ex. Ch. I. 280.

(f) If a deed of separation has been actually executed, and if the husband, being party to that deed, had promised to pay a sum of money to a trustee for the wife, such a promise will be binding upon the husband; as will also a promise if made by a person who is an actual trustee for the wife. Id.

(g) The actual signing of such a deed will constitute upon the husband a sufficient consideration upon the part of the husband to support such promise on the part of the trustee. Id.

1. Custody of. (See HUSBAND AND WIFE, 8.)

2. (a). Necessaries.—In an action by a tradesman against an infant for goods to which infancy was pleaded, and the plaintiff replied that the goods were necessaries: held, that although, as a general rule, it is the duty of tradesmen, before giving credit to an infant, to enquire of his friends whether or not he required the articles ordered for him, yet the court denied the existence of the rule in a case where the defendant was accompanied by her mother, and in her carriage, to the door of the plaintiff's shop, and the goods were either taken home in the carriage, or sent to where the mother resided, so that she must have seen them, and the jury found the goods were necessaries suited to the infant's apparent condition in life, and the court refused a new trial. Dalton v. Gibbs, C. P. I. 265.

(b). In an action by a jeweller against the son of a M. P., an undergraduate of Cambridge, and residing there, for a watch and other articles of jewellery, to which he pleaded infancy, &c.; and the plaintiff replied, that the goods were necessaries suitable to the degree and condition of life of the defendant: held, that necessaries are such things as are useful and suitable to the station in life of the party requiring them, and the term is not to be confined to things absolutely necessary for life, but is to be extended so as to include such things as are fit and proper to maintain the infant in the degree and state of life in which he may happen to move. But all things which are merely ornamental, and calculated for no actual use, are in no instance necessaries for any person. It is a question for the jury in such cases, whether the particular things being calculated for use were bought by the infant to support him in that degree of life in which he moves. Peters v. Fleming, Ex. II. 220. The Court refused a new trial. Ex. III. 266.

(d). In an action against the same person for expensive wines, cigars, eau de Cologne, and liqueurs, supplied at his lodgings in the University: held not to be considered necessaries for him, and he had a verdict. The Judge also certified, that it was a fit case to be tried by a special jury. Schwabacher v. Fleming, Ex. N. P. III. 122.

(e). Damask goods and expensive upholstery are not necessaries for a young lady of fifteen occupying apartments, but who did not appear to have the means of paying for them. Dench v. Webb, N. P. II. 250.

(f). In an action against a parent for a debt incurred by his son (an infant), who had been accustomed to support himself, for board and lodging, the plaintiff relied on a letter from the father in these terms:—"I am sorry to hear J is so ill. You have written home for money, but I cannot advance any at this time, being harvest; but J will be of age soon, when he will be able to pay you what he owes you, being entitled to some 'money.'" held, that this letter contained no evidence to bind the father to pay the claim. Mortimer v. Wright, Ex. IV. 45. There is a moral obligation on a father to support his child, but no legal one more binding on him than on any other relation. Id. Lowe v. Wilkin, over-ruled.

(g). A Mackintosh coat of "the first cut and most fashionable appearance," is such a necessary for an articulated clerk as to support an action against him by the tailor for the cost. Bragshaw v. Eaton, Sheriff: C. I. 364.

3. Suits on behalf of.—It is incumbent upon a person who files a bill on the behalf of infants, to show that he did it for their benefit, and not on account of interested motives towards himself, and if he files such a bill improperly he will be held liable for the costs, but the court will protect persons who properly and not craftily file such bill. Sale v. Sale, M. R. II. 230.

INNKEEPERS.

1. In an action against an innkeeper by a traveller, for the value of goods that had been stolen. The plaintiff went with his horse and cart to the defendant's inn. The cart was put into a barn and locked up, the plaintiff slept at the inn, and on going next morning to the barn, found it open: the defendant's brother and nephew were at work in the barn: the cart had been taken out and his goods stolen: the goods were afterwards found in the houses of the defendant's brother and nephew, who were prosecuted and convicted of the robbery. The defendant pleaded 1st, That the plaintiff was not in his house as a traveller; 2dly, That the barn had been given him for his separate use, and that he was responsible for its custody. It was left to the jury to say whether the goods were left in the custody of the innkeeper or of the traveller himself, who was a guest at the inn, and the plaintiff had a verdict. Richett v. Edington, N. P. III. 120.

2. In an action by a traveller against an innkeeper for jewels stolen from the inn where the plaintiff was a guest, the plaintiff had a verdict. Gey v. Martin, Ass. III. 383.

INQUIRIES, PRELIMINARY.

The fifth of the new Orders in Chancery applies only to cases free from doubt and difficulty, and preliminary inquiries will only be allowed when the court is satisfied that they applied to clear cases, and that if the cause was actually at the hearing those inquiries would be necessary. Mainhartzen v. Dera, V. C. III. 23.

No orders can be made under the terms of such fifth order against a defendant who has not appeared, or is out of the jurisdiction. Id.

1. Property of the debtor.

(a) A compensation to officers of the Government for loss of office is not assignable so as to be effectual against the assignees of an insolvent debtor. Exp. Browne, I. D. C. II. 377.

(b) The court will not grant a peremptory order for the committal of an assignee for retaining money in his hands after being ordered to pay it into court. Anon. I. D. C. III. 129.

2. Bail.

(a) Where an insolvent was directed to be liberated till his day of hearing on filing bail, but on the day on which his bail had been allowed, and before he left the prison, a fresh detainer was lodged against him, which rendered the direction ineffectual: the court said the applicant must again give notice of bail, and again come up before them. Exp. Richardson, I. D. C. I. 7. Exp. Lawson, id.

(b) Where an insolvent is out upon bail and does not appear at the day of hearing, the recognizances will be put in force against the bail and the Court will order a warrant for the apprehension of the insolvent by the assignee; but the court has no jurisdiction to alter or reduce the amount secured by the recognizances. Exp. Hastings, I. D. C. IV. 29. 95.

(c) The court (I. D.) will not grant a rule to shew cause why money paid into court in lieu of bail should not be paid out again. Anon. B. C. I. 60.

(d) An insolvent may render himself in discharge of his bail. Owston v. Coates, Q. B., I. 393. II. 87.

(e) The court (I. D.) will not on the petition of an overseer committed to Newgate for defalcations, admit him to bail, under the insolvent act, but the court has authority to discharge him upon petition. Exp. Giblett, I. D. C. IV. 189. See 1 & 2 Victoria, c. 110. s. 78.

(f) Where an insolvent is out on bail and does not attend when the hearing of his case is called on, the court will adjourn it and send him to prison instead of enlarging his protection on bail. Exp. Morrison, I. D. C. II. 394.

(g) When insolvents are out on bail, and are re-nanded at their hearings, the time they are out on bail will be considered to have been excluded from the time mentioned in its judgment. Exp. Johnson, I. D. C. III. 46.

3. Imprisonment.

(a) Where a debtor makes away with his property to the injury of his creditors, the court (I. D.) will order him to be confined within the walls. Exp. Solomon, I. D. C. I. 152. But the court will allow a prisoner to reside within the rules during a remand on the ground of serious illness. Id. 346.

(d) The court refused an application to stay proceedings against a prisoner, where, he being in custody at the suit of another person was then brought up under a habeas corpus, and was about to be charged in execution. Reynolds v. Simmonds, Exch. I. 30.

(c) The court (I. D.) has no power to remove a prisoner from one prison to another for contempt of its orders. Exp. Board, I. D. C. I. 108. 163. 206.

(d) The court (I. D.) can only remove an insolvent from a London prison to a country prison, and not vice versa. Anon. I. 334.

4. Discharge.

(a) The court (I. D.) will, in a proper case, grant a rule nisi, to dismiss a prisoner's petition in order to his discharge. Exp. Williams, I. D. C. II. 13.

(b) The court (I. D.) has power to annul its adjudication where a remand has been ordered, and the insolvent obtains his discharge from custody at the suit of his detaining creditor. Exp. Fellgate, II. 876.

5. Petition.

(a) Where an insolvent had three years previously filed his petition, but had remained in prison for want of funds to proceed upon it, the court ordered 5*l.* to be paid to the attorney in the case out of the unclaimed fund, for that purpose. Exp. Shackelford, I. D. C. I. 316.

(b) Upon a denial by an insolvent of a belief in a future state of rewards and punishments, the court will dismiss an order for hearing his petition. Exp. Connard, II. 393.

6. Preference.

The insolvents owed their bankers 600*l.* which was secured by the father-in-law of one of them. Their book debts and stock were sold under an assignment, out of the produce of which sale the bankers were paid, and the father-in-law received 157*l.* of a debt due to him, and a composition was subsequently offered the other creditors, which they partially accepted: held, that the payment to the bankers was no preference; aliter of the payment to the father-in-law. Exp. Johnson and another, I. D. C. III. 45. See 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 78.

7. The Schedule.

(a) The court will allow a prisoner time to file his schedule. Exp. Gomperts, I. D. C. I. 206.

(b) The court has no jurisdiction to commit a debtor to the county gaol for contempt in not filing his schedule, although a creditor may have obtained a vesting order. Exp. Chambers, I. D. C. III. 169, 343, 363.

8. Vesting order.

(a) The court (I. D.) will not dismiss a vesting order on payment of the detaining creditor's debt. Exp. Jones, I. D. C. I. 316.

(b) If a creditor who obtains the vesting order has his debt discharged and satisfied, that will not be a reason why the vesting order should, as a matter of course, fall to the ground. Exp. Chambers, I. D. C. III. 363. But

(c) A vesting order has no effect against the estate of a debtor, who does not take the benefit of the act after his liberation on bail, and the discharge of the debt. Exp. Lee, I. D. C. II. 377.

(d) The hearing of a cause will be stayed on production of the vesting order, until the assignee of the debtor shall appear in the cause. Chambers v. Bircham, Ex. III. 410.

(c) A vesting order cannot be dismissed without the consent of the creditor obtaining it, and the only way to get rid of it in such cases is to declare it null and void. Exp. Gardner, I. D. C. IV. 251.

9. Future acquired property.

(a) P, in 1819, took the benefit of the Insolvent Debtors' Act, then existing, and assigned his effects to the provisional assignee; he had no estate and consequently no assignees were appointed; he subsequently engaged in trade and acquired 3,000*l.*; he died in 1838, and made a will, by which he gave all his property to his wife, who administered. One of the creditors under the insolvency filed a bill against the widow and administratrix, praying an account, that the assets might be administered by the court, and supplied first in the discharge of the deceased's debts, contracted since his insolvency, and then in discharge of the debts from which he was relieved by the insolvent act. The widow demurred, that the debts were barred by the statute of limitations, that the court had no jurisdiction for want of equity: held, that the acts for relief of insolvent debtors were to relieve them from personal imprisonment, and not to discharge their future estates, they were allowed to acquire future property, but subject to their former debts. The intention of the legislature was to make the judgment available against the insolvent in the insolvent debtor's court, but upon his debts, the application of assets being part of the general law of the land, the jurisdiction of chancery cannot be ousted, and the remedy was properly there. The demurrer was overruled. Ward v. Painter, M. R. II. 216. affirmed on appeal, L. C. V. 41.

As to the statute of limitations, the case Barton v. Tattershall, 1 Russ. & My. 237. was a sufficient answer. Id.

A bill may be maintained by any one creditor against the personal representative without the sanction of the insolvent debtor's court. Id.

A verdict for debt and damages, when recovered by an insolvent after his discharge under the act, is such future acquired property as passes to his assignees. Exp. Bartlett, I. D. C. III. 72. Exp. Stockdale. Id. 186.

(b) The court has no power to interfere with a judgment entered up on an insolvent's warrant of attorney. Exp. Forsyth, I. D. C. IV. 125.

2. A mis-statement made in a claim for a loss by fire, which is not a substantial mistake, nor made with a fraudulent view, will not be the means of avoiding the policy. Weller v. Lewis, N. P. IV. 167.

2. Contracts by and with—fraud—misrepresentation.
3. Control over land required by them for their purposes.
4. Payment of purchase-money where title defective.
5. Liabilities for damages to goods, and injuries to roads and walls.
6. Liabilities of shareholders to call upon their shares.
7. Liabilities, personal, of shareholders.
8. Identity of partnership—what does not affect it.

1. Rights and lien of shareholders, directors, trustees, and public officers against each other, and suits by, between, and against each other.

(1) The directors of a joint stock banking company instituted a suit in equity in the name of their public officer, under 7 Geo. IV. c. 46. s. 9, against several shareholders of the company, and other persons not shareholders, to recover monies improperly withdrawn by such shareholders from the Bank, without the knowledge or consent of the other shareholders, out of the funds of the company, and applied for the purposes of carrying on a newspaper, submitting that the defendants, who were shareholders, ought to be held responsible jointly with the other proprietors of the newspaper who were not shareholders, and praying a declaration that the shares of the defendants were subject to a lien in the hands of the company for what should be found due. Demurrer for want of equity, it being nothing more than an ordinary legal debt on a balance of account for advances made by the bank, and ought to be sued for under 1 & 2 Vic. c. 96, and if not, the plaintiff had no right to represent the company, to whom the debt was due: held, that prima facie there was equity enough to support the bill against the shareholders, and that there was nothing in the second objection. Demurrer overruled with costs. Manuvers v. Rowley, V.C. III. 394.

(2) A bill was filed by several shareholders of a joint stock bank, which had suspended its payments against the directors, all of whom except one were bankrupts, on behalf of themselves and all the other shareholders except the defendants, praying the usual account of the partnership concerns, and for a receiver, that the assets might be applied as far as they would extend in payment of all the co-partnership liabilities. Demurrers for want of equity, and for want of parties, because "all the partners or shareholders in the partnership or company were necessary parties to the bill, and all such partners or shareholders were not made parties," and because the assignees of the bankrupt defendants were not made parties, and because the bill was exhibited for several and distinct and independent matters and causes, which had no relation to each other: held, that the court could not grant the limited relief asked without declaring a dissolution of the copartnership, and directing the accounts to be taken, because the bill did not pray the court to administer the funds of each individual partner. Demurrers allowed. V. C. IV. 380—ON APPEAL: held, there was more equity for the bill than against it. The court will decree an account in a suit between partners without declaring a dissolution. L. C. V. 200. A bill by some partners, on behalf of themselves and all the other shareholders except the defendants, who should come in and contribute to the expences of the suit against other shareholders, trustees, and directors, is maintainable. Id.

See 3 and 4 Vic. c. 111.

(3) S purchased 500 shares in a joint stock banking company, and filed a bill against the public officer, and the directors of the company to set aside the purchase, and have his purchase-money refunded, alleging against the defendants, the director's fraud and misrepresentation as to the prosperous, flourishing, and profitable condition of the company's affairs, at the time he had made the purchase, by which he was induced, relying upon the representations to be bona fide, to make the purchase, and that after signing the company's deed, he discovered that these representations were fraudulent and untrue, and that the affairs of the company were in a very embarrassed state. Demurrer by the public officer for want of equity, and that he could not be sued in a dispute between the partners. Demurrer allowed. Seddon v. Connell, V. C. IV. 412.

(4) A, possessing shares in a joint stock bank, deposited them with the bank to secure advances, and became bankrupt. The bank sold the shares, and the assignees filed a bill for an amount of the produce of the sale, and a motion was made for inspection of the bank books and papers, to enable the assignees to establish fraud against the bank, who did not refuse the production of such books and papers as were produced at the public meetings of the shareholders, but refused the inspection of any others, on the ground of an express stipulation in the deed of partnership constituting the company, that no shareholder should be at liberty to call for or inspect any books, papers, &c. but such as were produced at the request of a general meeting of the shareholders: held, that the transaction was only a mortgage, which would not give a mortgagee a greater right than a shareholder, but that such a covenant would not protect a fraudulent transaction; and if a bill is filed alleging the whole affair to be a bubble, and stating particular grievances and instances of fraud the court will interfere. Decree made for production of books and papers produced at the public meetings only. Stubbs v. Lister, V. C. II. 371.

2. Contracts by and with fraud and misrepresentations.

(5) Where directors of a joint stock company made gross misrepresentations to induce persons to purchase shares, holding out that the money subscribed was to be applied in carrying on the works, but concealing other payments that were to be made from the subscribed capital, and it turned out that the expenses exceeded the receipts, and the property was mismanaged: an injunction will be granted to restrain directors from proceeding with the concern, and a manager and receiver appointed to carry on the business, and prevent the property from perishing. Bullman v. Thomas, M. R. I. 137.

(6) A, B, S, and W projected a public institution, the incorporating charter whereof declared that a capital of 20,000*l.*, consisting of 400 50*l.* shares, should be raised; provided for the appointment of managers, who were to be holders of five shares each, and then declared that T, A, B, S, W, and G should be the first managers. When the charter was granted, T and G were not shareholders, but had agreed to become so. Afterwards A, B, S, and W appropriated all the shares among themselves, agreeing to resell them for their own benefit, and they charged themselves with the whole 20,000*l.* accordingly, and took credit for 16,000*l.* in the Society's account as for sums expended by them in its formation, &c. and paid the remaining 4000*l.* to the Society's bankers. Exclusive of several shares entered in the names of the wives of A and B, about 160 others were sold previous to February 1835, when a general meeting of the Society was held; on representation that the fund had been so appropriated, it was confirmed by such meeting. It was subsequently found that the 16,000*l.* was not laid out as represented—that a moiety thereof only was so laid out, on which a bill was filed against A, B, S, and W's widow, charging them with fraud; alleging an appropriation of purchase monies on the sale of shares to their own use; that, on W's death, A, B, and S transferred his shares to their own use in discharge of an alleged debt due to them; and praying an account of the appropriation of the shares, purchase-money, and expenditure; that the Society might not be bound by the resolution of February 1835, and that the proceeds of W's shares might be appropriated to make good what should be found due from him to the Society. The defendants demurred for want of equity and for want of parties, alleging that the wives of A and B, and the original shareholders, ought to be made parties. Demurrers over-ruled, but defenders to answer the bill. The Society for the Illustration and Encouragement of Practical Science v. Abbott, IV. 425. M. R.

(7) The shareholders who purchased shares from, are not necessary parties. Id.

(8) This decision was appealed from, but before the appeal came on to be heard before the Lord Chancellor, the disputes between the parties were settled by a compromise. MSS.

(9) The plaintiff was the owner of mines of very great magnitude, and entered into a contract with the defendants, Small, Shears, and Taylor, managing directors of The British Iron Joint Stock Company, in their own names; the effect of which was to give those persons the property in the mines, for which the plaintiff was to be paid by certain instalments; that the defendants were not to be personally liable; that the instalments were to be paid at certain stipulated periods, the last in 1827; and the plaintiff was to look to the estate for payment. That in fraud of that contract, they instituted a suit containing a variety of false charges, which at one time were supposed to be well founded, but which, by the ultimate decision of the House of Lords have been declared to be ill-founded, and that by those means, and by undertakings in the cause when it was pending in the Court of Exchequer, they have protracted the day of payment, and the result had been that during the whole of this period, the defendants were continuing to work the mines and exhaust the property to which the plaintiff was to look for the purpose of working out his security; and the result of that had been that 300,000*l.* remained due, the property itself having, by the working of the company in the meantime, become an inadequate security for that sum. While the suit was pending in the Exchequer the plaintiff filed a bill for a specific performance; but upon the Chief Baron pronouncing the agreements void, the plaintiff on the next day obtained an order to dismiss his bill with costs. Afterwards the decree of the Chief Baron was reversed by the House of Lords, by which the agreements were established, and the plaintiff had made no attempt to get rid of the dismissal of his bill; he therefore sought a declaration of the court that the defendants or some of them were personally liable for the remainder of the purchase-money. The defendants demurred for want of equity and want of parties, the directors of the company at the time the bill was filed not having been made parties: held, that, that on the ground of conduct no relief could be had against Small, Shears, and Taylor, and a fortiori none against the other directors or their agent, or the company; yet as some relief could be given against them in the way of a specific performance, their demurrers were overruled, the demurrer for want of equity only entertained. Attwood v. Small, V. C. L. 37*ç*. ON APPEAL, demurrer for want of equity overruled. Demurrer for want of parties allowed. The actual proprietors of the property of the company are necessary parties, because the property of the company is liable to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff had leave to amend. L. C. Id. III. 375.

(10) It is not necessary that all the shareholders are necessary parties, but if they are not so as shareholders, there must be some persons whom those in contact with the company are at liberty to sue. Id.

3. Control over land required for their purposes.

(11) The proprietor of a railway company required

some land, not for the railway to pass through, but for the purpose of digging for materials for the embankments of another part of the railway a mile distant; in the notice to the proprietor the object for which they wanted the land was not stated; the proprietor did not wish to part with the land, but the company sent a precept to a jury. The proprietor then filed a bill and obtained an injunction restraining the company from proceeding with the precept and from taking possession, but which was afterwards dissolved.—ON APPEAL, it was suggested that some scientific person might be fixed upon on each side, who would examine the works and report upon the necessity for taking the land. Webb v. The Manchester and Leeds Railway Company, L. C. I. 390.

(12) A report was subsequently made by an engineer, who stated that part of the land only was required, and the injunction was ordered to restrain the company from proceeding with the precept for any land beyond that part. MSS.

(13) The powers conferred on railway companies are so large and so injurious to individuals that they will receive no extension from the court. L. C. Id.

(14) The proprietors of railway companies will be restrained by injunction from exercising any control over land staked out by their agents, unless included in the company's notices. Blayney v. The Barn & Glouc. R. Co. M. R. II. 134.

4. Payment of purchase-money where title defective.

(15) The directors of a joint stock company may pay the purchase-money for land required for its purposes into the Court of Chancery where the title is not shown to the satisfaction of the company, although directed by their act of Parliament to be paid into the Exchequer. Hyde v. G. W. Railway Company, V. C. II. 7.

5. Liabilities for damages to goods.

(16) The proprietors of a steam-boat company were held liable in damages done for goods shipped on board one of their boats for conveyance, and which became damaged and unsaleable. Muddle v. Stride, N. P. Q. B. III. 298.

6. Director's powers, and liabilities.

(17) A director of an incorporated company is not personally liable (unless made so by their act of parliament) to a judgment obtained against him as a nominal defendant; and therefore a rule calling upon such a director to show cause why he should not pay the damages and costs recovered in an action, wherein he was such a defendant, or why in default execution should not be issued against his goods, was discharged. Harrison v. Timmins, Q. B. I. 55, 73.

7. Injuries to roads and walls.

(18) A mandamus will be granted directing joint stock companies to make good and sufficient new roads in the place of roads destroyed or rendered useless by their operations. Reg. v. Birmingham Railway Co., Q. B. N. P. I. 314.

(19) They have no right to extend parapet walls: if they might, there would be no limit to their power, and they might continue them as far as they pleased. Id.

(20) On motion for an injunction against a railway company, to restrain them from carrying works across a turnpike road, and from doing other damage thereto, by altering the level of the road: it was refused with costs, although, in the consent given by the trustees of the road, to the passing of the company's act, it was provided that the railway should cross over the road at a sufficient elevation, and that the road should not be lowered to effect such elevation, or be prejudicial thereby, because such assent did not interfere with the trustees' right of opposing the bill, to obtain the mainfection they insisted on; as a protection to their road; and as the bill had passed without any proviso limiting the company's power of levelling roads, the court had no power to prevent damage thereto by the company's works. Aldred v. Directors of the North Midland Railway Company, V. C. I. 342.

8. Liabilities of shareholders to calls upon their scrip shares.

(21) A railway company brought an action for calls. The defendant held scrip for forty shares, and had claimed to be registered for them, and his name was accordingly entered in the books of the company. Calls were made and advertised, but he paid none of them. He was not an original scrip subscriber, and other proprietors had been registered in respect of his shares. The directors were empowered, in case of default made in payment of calls, to declare the shares of such defaulters forfeited, and, in a notice they had given the defendant, they stated that "his shares would be declared forfeited," but no subsequent declaration was made. The defendant pleaded that he was not indebted; that when the calls were made he was not a proprietor; and that after he had become a proprietor, the directors had declared his shares forfeited: held, that the notice was a declaration that something would be done at a future time; no subsequent declaration was made, and therefore the shares were not forfeited, and that the plea was not made out, and the defendant must be taken as a proprietor, and a verdict went against him. The Birmingham, Bristol, and Tham. Junction Railway Co. v. Locke, 1. 105. (See NOTICE.)

9. Personal liabilities of shareholders..

(22) An action was brought against a shareholder in a scrip company for goods supplied; the company had issued prospectuses announcing a capital of 250,000*l.* in 10,000 shares at 25*l.* each, and the certainty of success, upon the faith of which the defendant took some shares; the project turned out a failure, as the directors only disposed of a small portion of the shares: held, that as the contract of partnership entered into by the defendant, with the directors, had been altogether set aside by the latter, the defendant could not be made liable for goods supplied them on the order of their secretary, because he was a shareholder under the prospectus of the company. He made himself liable on a capital of 250,000*l.*, and as the directors began on 12,000*l.* the defendant's assent to such circumscribed capital, must be shown before he can be made liable. The directors are the persons primarily liable. Pitchford v. Davis, Ex. 1. 407.

(23) A shareholder of the same company was held not liable, as a proprietor thereof, to be sued by a tradesman, for articles supplied by him for the company's use, which were ordered before such shareholder became a member of the company. The action was brought for the price of some machinery. The prospectus was issued in May, 1836, which stated the machinery to be in a state of forwardness. The defendant had not his shares till the 31st of that month. Whitehead v. Barron, N. P. III. 106.

(24) To an action for arrears of salary against a director of a joint stock company, the defendant pleaded that he was not a director when the action was brought, inasmuch as he had become disqualified by selling his shares. It appeared that the defendant was appointed a director by the act of Parliament, and would continue so for some time: plea held bad. Harrison v. Warnford, Ex. III. 71.

(25) A creditor of a joint stock company is entitled to make an individual shareholder thereof a bankrupt, such being a common law right and not taken away by any act of Parliament. Exp. Wood, C. R. II. 328.

(26) A consented to become a member of a joint stock company (The Metropolitan Parcels Delivery Company), if 5000 shares were sold. The directors commenced business when 400 only were disposed of: held, that A was not bound by their acts. Hopkinson v. Snow, N. P. IV. 253.

(27) A shareholder cannot be made liable for the contracts entered into by the company, unless it is shewn that the principles upon which the company was originally established had been fully carried out, in every respect, or that the defendant as a shareholder was aware of any deviation that had been made in them. Id.

(28) The clerk of a joint stock company brought an action against a director for arrears of salary. The defendant pleaded he was not a director at the time the action was brought, he having transferred his shares and thereby become disqualified: held, that the plea was bad, as the defendant was appointed a director by the company's act, and so would continue until 1840. Harrison v. Warnford (West Cork Mining Company), Ex. III. 71.

(29) Where it became necessary to proceed against individual partners of a joint stock banking company, an application was granted to enter a suggestion on the roll under the joint stock companies' act, 7 G. 4. c. 46, that certain persons were such partners, in order that execution might be had against any individual partner, on a judgment obtained against the company. Powlett v. Imp. Bank of England, B. C. III. 71. See ss. 12, 13, 7 G. 4, c. 46. IV. 329.

(30) A judgment had been obtained against the registered public officer of the Learnington Joint Stock Bank, a rule was obtained calling upon individual proprietors of shares to shew cause why a suggestion should not be entered upon the roll to charge them as separate individuals, and why execution should not issue accordingly. The question was, whether such interposition ought to be effected in the manner proposed by the rule, or in the form of scire facias. It was, in fact, a question in what manner new parties were to be placed upon the record, which according to the antecedent usage, must be by scire facias, the proceeding by suggestion being only appropriate to the introduction of collateral facts, as the change of name or death of parties: held, that no parties ought to be chargeable with any liability without full notice and opportunity of defending himself, and this could most effectually be done upon a scire facias. In Bartlett v. Pentland, 1 Barn. & Ad. 704, it was determined that if an Act of Parliament authorizes the making an officer of a company a nominal defendant, and enables the plaintiff to take out execution against the individual partners as being the real defendants, it is necessary that he should in some way have the authority of the court before he can have such execution. A scire facias is the usual course in such cases. A suggestion is applicable only to collateral facts affecting other parties than those upon the record, and the rule was discharged per Lord Denman. Bosanquet v. Rainsforth, Q. B. IV. 329.

(31) Where a joint stock banking company (The Imperial Bank of England) had failed, and a fiat had issued against one of the registered officers, proof was allowed on his estate for a debt due by the company for the purpose of enabling the claimant to vote in the choice of assignees, and to exercise a control over his estate. Upon petition to have the proof expunged it was dismissed. Exp. Marsden, C. R. III. 126.

10. Identity of Partnership.

(32) Death.—Bankruptcy or disposition of shares does not affect the identity of a partnership established under the Joint Stock Banking Act, 7 Geo. 4. c. 46. Esp. Marston, C. R. III. 36.

JUDGE'S ORDER.

1. A Judge's order must be served forthwith, i. e. before the opposite party can take further proceedings in the cause. Therefore an order allowing two days to join in demurrer obtained at five o'clock on one day, and not served until between two and three o'clock on the following day, before which time the other party had signed judgment: held, that the order was served too late. A rule was refused for setting aside the judgment. Kenny v. Hutchinson, Ex. IV. 46.

2. As to what is a reasonable time to allow a party obtaining an order to elect to draw it up, and serve it or not. When the parties live within any reasonable distance of each other there is ample time from five in the afternoon until nine at night to serve an order of this description, but at all events it ought to be served before the opening of the office next morning, or rather in strictness before the time when the opposite attorney would have to leave his office for the purpose of being present at the opening of it at 11. Per Parke, B. Id.

3. A judge had (by consent of both parties) made an order that on payment of costs by defendant, and on payment of the debt at a given time all proceedings should be stayed, but that on default of such, plaintiff was to have final judgment: held, that the plaintiff could not, before the appointed time had arrived, apply to a judge for a capias to arrest the defendant on his being about to leave the kingdom. Ball v. Stanley, Ex. III. 412. IV. 188. The court suggested that in cases where the plaintiff has reason to suspect an intention in the defendant to leave the kingdom, he should by the order, by a special clause in the margin, reserve leave to apply for a capias if necessary. Id.

The word "proceedings" means any proceedings tending to final judgment. A capias is only such a proceeding. Id. per Parke, B.

The order staying proceedings is an agreement on the part of the plaintiff granting six months for the defendant to pay the debt. He can take no proceedings against him while that time is running. Id.

JUDGE'S SUMMONS.

A judge's summons operates as a stay of proceedings; therefore, where a plaintiff had signed judgment for want of a plea, the defendant having taken out a summons for time to plead, which the plaintiff had abandoned, the court ordered the judgment to be set aside. Hodgson v. Casler, B. C. III. 342.

JURISDICTION.

The court of Exchequer Chamber has jurisdiction as a court of appeal from the Queen's Bench. A rule for quashing a writ of error from Queen's Bench to this court, on the ground that the 11 Geo. 4. and 1 W. 4. c. 70. did not intend to allow three writs of error where two only previously existed, was therefore discharged. *Rushton v. ## JUSTICE OF PEACE.

1. Qualification.—In a qui tam action against a clergyman for acting as a justice of peace, without being duly qualified, the court held that a sequestration, under which a sequestrator was in possession of the grounds, &c. belonging to defendant's vicarage, was an incumbrance within the 13 Eliz. c. 30., although the vicarage was allotted to the defendant by the bishop, with 120*l.* per annum, in order that he might do the duties, on the ground that the allowance of that stipend was discretionary in the bishop, and it did not appear that the vicarage-house was worth 100*l.* a-year. Pack v. Tarpley, Q. B. I. 264.

2. Actions against.—Before an action is brought against a justice of the peace, for enforcing a conviction under sects. 74 and 75 of the Highway Act (5 and 6 W. 4. c. 50.), he is entitled to a month's notice under the 24 G. 2. c. 44., although sect. 9 of the Highway Act provides that no action shall be commenced for anything done in pursuance of that statute, until twenty-one days' notice shall be given. Re v. Boston, Q. B. IV. 205.

3. Power of.—A justice has no power to enter the house of a chariot to search for and take for arms from the person in possession, though known to be a suspicious character and not qualified to have such arms in his possession. Bryson v. Unwin, Esq. N. P. IV. 327.

1. A bill was filed in 1835, complaining of an infringement of a patent obtained for a newly invented gas-burner. The alleged piracy continued upwards of four years without an injunction being moved for or any steps being taken to determine the legal right, or any motion being made to bring the cause to a hearing. Bill dismissed, M. R. affirmed by L. C. Bacon v. Jones, II. 266.

2. A bill was filed in 1836, and answered by two out of three defendants in January, 1837; no further proceedings were taken by plaintiff until March, 1839: held, (reversing a decision of the vice-chancellor) that in the absence of any attempt to explain the delay, the plaintiff was not entitled to an order to amend his bill. *Altres v. ### LANDLORD AND TENANT,

As to Distress.

1. A landlord has no right to distress goods removed to avoid a distress, unless removed after the rent became due, the stat. 11 G. 2. does not apply. Wells v. Day, B. C. I. 28.

2. Unless rent is actually due and payable when goods are removed to avoid a distress, the landlord has no right to follow and take them. Nun v. Johnson, N. P. III. 87.

3. Some damage is implied in all excessive distresses. Hooper v. Armes, Ex. I. 106.

4. Butcher's meat in a butcher's shop cannot be distrained for rent, because the distrainer is bound to keep the distress merely as a pledge for a certain number of days, and then to deliver it up in the same plight as when taken if the rent and costs are paid, and which he could not do in the case of fresh meat from the perishable nature of the article. Parrott v. Oakes, N. P. IV. 286.

5. Where parties entering a house in an unlawful manner ostensibly for the purpose of making a distress for rent, and taking a greater quantity of goods than necessary for that purpose, fail to connect themselves with the landlord, all their proceedings will be deemed illegal. Muir v. Sewell, N. P. III. 412.

6. Where a broker and his men, in order to effect a distress for rent, on being refused admittance by the door, entered by means of a ladder placed against a window at the back of the house, it was ruled that such entry was a trespass in itself, for which those parties were answerable, even if they had a landlord's warrant. Id.

7. Outgoing tenant.—Under a custom to stub the land where it would be fit for cultivation, an outgoing tenant has no right, after his receipt of a notice to quit, to cut the whins, and dispose of them for his own benefit. Storm v. Millar, N. P. II. 204.

To an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, defendant pleaded a title by conveyance by lease and release, to which the plaintiff demurred, because the deed of release had been pleaded without profert: held, that although profert is unnecessary of a conveyance deriving effect from the statute of uses, yet as a release operates at common law, the defendant ought to have pleaded profert of it. To an action of trespass, the defendant pleaded a conveyance by lease and release; the plaintiff demurred by reason that the release had been pleaded without profert. Leave was given to amend by making profert of release. Jenkin v. Pence, Ex. IV. 382.

(a) A bargain and sale for a year (now abolished) or a covenant to stand seised to uses, will operate by the statute of uses without profert, but a release on the contrary operates at the common law, and a party claiming under such an instrument must make proferi of it. Id.

LEGACIES.

1. Legacy given to a person under a falsely assumed name.

2. General and specific Legacies.—Construction.

3. To a daughter who shall survive any husband, and she dies without having been married.—Construction.

4. Legacies vested.

1. Legacy given to a person under a falsely assumed name.

2000*l.* was given by a testator to trustees upon trust to pay the interest to Lady C, the widow of Sir N. C. so long as she should remain single and unmarried. He also gave her 500*l.* without any condition annexed. There was a close intimacy between the testator and Lady C. At the date of the will, and at the testator's death Lady C was a married woman, having been secretly married to Mr. R, who was still alive, but who had deserted her and gone abroad, and she did not take her second husband's name: the testator was unacquainted with this second marriage, but no evidence was produced to shew that his attachment would have ceased had he known of such marriage. She went by her first husband's name; and the testator considered her as his widow: held, that she was entitled to both legacies. Rishton v. Cobb, L. C. III. 134.

When a legacy is given to a person under a particular character, which the legatee falsely assumed, and which alone can be the supposed inducement to the testator's bounty, the court will not permit such a legatee to avail herself of such falsely assumed character, and she cannot demand the legacy. Per Lord Alvanley. Id.

2. General and specific Legacies.—Construction.

A testator bequeathed to trustees, their executors, administrators, and assigns  $5\frac{1}{2}$  shares in The Leeds and Liverpool Canal, upon trust to permit his son J R and his assigns to receive the quarterly produce for his and their own use, and after his decease upon certain other trusts, and he gave other shares in the same canal upon trust for the benefit of other children. At the time of making his will the testator was possessed of fifteen and a half shares of 100*l.* each; but between that time and his death he sold the whole of them, and was not at the time of his death possessed of any shares in the canal. The children filed a bill against the executors of the testator and other parties for a declaration of the Court that the several bequests of the shares were general and not specific legacies, and that they were entitled to have so much money as at the end of one year next after the death of the testator would have been sufficient for the purchase of fifteen and a half shares in the canal at the then current market price, raised and paid out of the testator's personal estate: held, that the bequests of the shares were general and not specific legacies, and the children had a decree as prayed. Robinson v. Addison, M. R. IV. 311.

3. Legacy if a daughter shall survive any husband, and she dies without having been married.—Construction.

A bequeathed 4,000*l.* to trustees in trust for his daughter for life for her separate use, without power of anticipation, and after her decease upon trust as she should appoint, and in default of appointment upon trust for all her children, but in case there should be no child who should attain twenty-one or be married, then if his daughter should survive any husband whom she might marry, in trust for her and her heirs, executors, administrators and assigns absolutely; but if any such husband should survive the testator's daughter, then in trust as she should appoint by will as if she were sole and unmarried, and in default of such appointment, upon trust for her next of kin. The testator's daughter died intestate, and without having been married, and her administratrix claimed the 4,000*l.*, and the trustees refused to act but under the direction of the Court: held, that the legacy did not pass to her personal representatives, but fell into the residue of A's personal estate, and belonged to his residuary legatees. Lennor v. Lennor, V. C. IV. 41.

4. Legacies vested.

(a) Five hundred pounds was bequeathed to an infant when he attained the age of twenty-five: held, that the interest of the legacy could not in the interim be applied towards the infant's support. Roberts v. Williams, L. C. I. 54.

(b) Testator devised to trustees upon trust, to sell and lay out so much as should be sufficient to raise three annuities of 100*l.* each, and to apply one of such annuities towards the maintenance and education of his grandchildren, the children of his late daughter M H, until the youngest of such children who should live to attain twenty-three should attain that age; and from and immediately after such youngest child should have attained that age, upon trust that the principal money laid out in purchase of the annuity "should be paid and divided unto and equally amongst his last mentioned grandchildren, share and share alike, as tenants in common;" and as to the two other annuities, to be paid to his daughters E C and S W respectively, for life; and as to the principal money laid out in purchase of these annuities, he directed "to pay, apply and divide each of them, from and immediately after the respective deaths of E C and S W, unto and equally amongst all and every his grandchildren then living (children of M H), and all the children of E C and S W, as well those then living as those who might thereafter be born, share and share alike as tenants in common." And as to the residue, to pay and divide the same unto and equally amongst the children of M H then living, and the children of E C and S W then living or who should be born during his lifetime, share and share alike as tenants in common; and he directed that the legacies or shares should vest in the grandchildren, in sons at twenty-three, and in daughters at that age or marriage, and that if they should die under twenty-three without issue, then the legacies or shares of them so dying, should go and accrue to the survivors and survivor of them, and the lawful issue of such as might be dead, share and share alike. At the testator's death there were eleven grandchildren; of these, four died under twenty-three, six and seven attained that age; M H had five children, three attained twenty-three, and one of them, J T H, died after attaining that age but before the time when the principal money became divisible: held, first, that J H, one of M H's children, took an original one-fifth share, one-third of another share, but no part of his brother D's original share; secondly, that as to the principal monies of the two other annuities, the bequest was void for remoteness, and fell into the residue; thirdly, that eight were entitled—the representatives of J T H were entitled to one-eighth, and the remaining grandchildren to the rest equally. Cromek v. Lamb, Ex. Eq. II. 167.

LEGACY DUTY.

The Commissioners of Stamps have the power of taking a fixed sum in gross for legacy duties due under a will, and may therefore discharge the testator's estate from all future claims of duty. Egerton v. Egerton, M. R. II. 150.

LEGAL ESTATE.

An estate was devised to A, B and C in trust, to permit and suffer A to take the "net rents" thereof during her life, and then in trust to suffer B to take the "net rents" during her life, and after her decease, to suffer C to take the rents during his life: held, in an action by A, B and C, for use and occupation, that the legal estate was vested in them as trustees, and therefore, that they were proper parties to bring the action. Barker v. Greenwood, Ex. I. 73.

It is a maxim that whenever any duties are imposed upon trustees, the legal estate is vested in them. Id.

The word net must be taken to be something contradistinguishable from gross rents. The trustees are therefore to take the gross rents and pay the net rents to the first cestui que trust. Id.

LESSOR AND LESSEE.

1. Lessee for thirty years, under covenants to "rebuild sufficiently the party walls" and to repair. The house was a wooden house and fell down; the lessor insisted that the lessee was bound to build another house, and, as the Building Act prohibited wooden houses, that it should be of brick, the cost of which would be 450*l.* which the defendant refused. In an action by the lessor for damages, he obtained 200*l.* Trustees of the Strathmore Estate v. Hart, Sh. C. Middlesex, II. 169.

2. In 1825, by "memorandum of agreement," C agreed to take, and B agreed to let, certain premises on lease for the term of twenty-one years. The lease to contain the same covenants as in the lease to B, and to be prepared at C's expence. C entered and continued in possession until 1838, when he gave notice to quit. B then called upon C to take a lease according to the terms of the agreement, which C refusing to do, the lease was prepared and tendered to C, who refused to accept it, contending that the "Agreement itself operated as a lease." B then brought an action against C for the costs of the lease, and obtained a verdict. Upon motion to enter a nonsuit, on the grounds that the agreement was a lease in itself; that the statute of limitations was a bar to the action: held, 1st, that the agreement was an agreement to grant and execute a future lease at C's expence, for the expence of preparing which C was liable; and, 2d, that as to the statute of limitations, the time was to be calculated from the moment at which a cause of action arose, which could only have been when the lease was offered, and the defendant refused it, and not from the date of the agreement which could not give any right of action until a breach had been committed, and the motion was refused. Burnel v. Curties, Ex. IV. 346. See 3 Western's Conveyancing, pp. 75, 113, in notis.

3. N agreed to let, and C to take, premises in K, for twenty-one years; N to put the premises in a proper state of repair; C entered in September 1830; and in November, while the repairs were going on, received a draft lease for perusal, of which he took no notice, and no lease was executed; but C sent repeatedly to N requesting him to get the repairs done until 1833, when he expressed himself satisfied, and then, on being pressed to execute a lease, refused to do so, or bind himself otherwise than as tenant from year to year, alleging that the repairs were not done in due time, and the lease contained covenants which N had not made him acquainted with, being covenants contained in the original lease by which N held the premises under the crown: held, (affirming a decree of the Vice-Chancellor,) that the contract must be performed, and a specific performance was decreed accordingly. Nash v. Cockrane, L. C. II. 197.

4. In an injunction suit by a lessee of mines against his lessor, to have his rent reduced below the amount reserved by the lease on the ground of a parol agreement with the lessor to that effect, in consideration of the works being increased by the lessee, it appeared that a verbal communication had been made by the lessee to the lessor, that if the reduction was acceded to, the working of the mines would be increased; that the works had been increased accordingly, and that accounts had been settled on the faith of such agreement; the lessor afterwards brought an action at law against the lessee for the whole of the rent reserved by the lease, and the lessee filed his bill for an injunction to restrain the lessor from proceeding with the action: held, there was sufficient to support the plaintiff's case, and the injunction was made perpetual. Roes v. Phillips, M. R. II. 360.

5. An intended lessor by his own act became incapable of performing his contract, having destroyed the subject matter thereof pending a suit by the intended lessee for a specific performance, and a reference to the master to ascertain the amount of damages. The Court ordered an action to be brought, the defendant making the requisite admissions to bring the question of damages fairly before a jury. Nelawn v. Bridges, M. R. III. 69.

6. By lease, dated in January 1832, P demised a farm to G, habendum from October 1831 for seven years, "and so on from year to year:" held, that P was entitled, on giving G notice to quit at the preceding Lady-day, to recover possession as from October 1839, the words used not implying a tenancy for two years certain at the expiration of the term of seven years. Doe d. Pryme v. Gifford, Ass. III. 346.

7. The equitable interference of a court of law under 4 G. 2. c. 28. which enables courts of law to give relief in cases of forfeiture under particular circumstances, was denied, where the lessee of some houses held under the usual covenants to repair, and to make good all dilapidations within three months after notice, neglected to comply with such a notice, and the lessor had judgment in ejectment for a forfeiture, although the lessee swore that he had since fully repaired the premises, and therefore he claimed the equitable interference of the court. Doe d. Mayhew v. Asby, Q. B. II. 40.

LEX LOCI DOMICILII.

1. A and his wife, British born subjects, after living a short time at St. Kitts, went to St. Croix, where A advanced money on mortgage, and subsequently with his wife returned to England and died domiciled there. A and his wife made a joint will according to the Danish form, and appointed executors (Danish subjects domiciled in St. Croix, who claimed control over the money invested there on mortgage by taking out probate at St. Croix). A's wife survived, and she made another will intended to supersede the joint will, she being the legatee of her husband of the mortgage-money, which was proved in England: held, that probate must follow the domicile, and that the property must be dealt with according to the English law, and that the executors in St. Croix were trustees of the mortgage-money for the legatees of A's wife. Pries v. Dewhurst, L. C. I. 54. affirmed on appeal from the Vice-Chancellor.

Rule of law. Where a person dies intestate, his personal estate is to be administered according to the law of the country, in which he was domiciled at the time of his death: whether he was a British subject or not, and the question whether he died intestate or not must be determined by the law of the same country. Id. II. 113.

2. Where a question arose as to the title of certain parties to the personal estate of a testator, in the course of which it appeared that his place of domicile was disputed. The Master of the Rolls, before making any adjudication, directed an inquiry before the master to ascertain the place of domicile; if in England, who were the next of kin, if in France, who by the law of France would be entitled. *Chamau v. ### LEX LOCI REI SITÆ.

(a) Upon ejectment sent to be tried by Lord Eldon in King's Bench for a special verdict to settle the law on the question. W B died, in 1819, seized of lands in England without issue; all his brothers died in his lifetime unmarried, and without issue, except one A B, who went from England to Scotland, and became and was domiciled there, and there remained and dwelt so domiciled till the time of his death. While domiciled in Scotland he cohabited during the whole period of time with M P, being also domiciled there, and during such cohabitation had issue by her, J B, (the plaintiff) who was the only son of A B and M P, and was born in Scotland on the 15th May, 1799. On the 6th May, 1805, after the birth of J B, A B and M P were married in Scotland according to the laws of Scotland, and on the 5th February, 1810, A B died in Scotland, seized to him and his heirs of lands there, leaving J B him surviving, who after the death of his father was duly served thereto according to the law of Scotland, which he held and enjoyed in his own right, he having from the time of his birth dwelt and remained in Scotland and been domiciled there. Question put by the Lords to the Judges: "Is J B entitled to the real estate in England of W B as heir of A B?" held, that J B was not so entitled, which was the judgment of the court below. Affirmed, Dom. Proc. Birtwhistle v. Vardill, IV. 204. 214. Leading Case.

(b) If a marriage of the mother of a child with the father of such child takes place in Scotland, such child born in Scotland before the marriage is equally legitimate by the law of Scotland with children born after the marriage, for the purpose of taking land, and every other purpose. Id. sed qu. per Lord Lauderdale. Id. 216.

(b) B, of St. Vincent's, married an English woman there, having previously settled lands and slaves in that island, the ultimate remainder whereof was limited to the issue of the marriage in equal shares. B afterwards whilst residing at Demarara (then ceded to England) purchased lands there, where his wife died leaving two children, H M B and L J, who married V, a Frenchman. In 1811, B returned to England with his children, and in 1822, there was married a second time, having previously settled the Demarara property to secure a jointure to his wife, and limiting it to the issue of the second marriage, reserving thereout to himself a power of appointment over 30,000*l.* which in default of such appointment was limited to the issue of both marriages in equal shares. In 1832, when he had five children by the second marriage, he made a will devising half his Demarara lands to them, and the other half to all his children equally: he made several codicils to this will, by one of which he gave compensation slave money among his children, and directed that if the children by his first wife should trouble his wife by litigation, the devise to them should be void. He died in England in 1838, leaving the two children by the first marriage, and eight children by the second, him surviving. H M B, and L J V filed a bill in Demarara for a moiety of the land purchased there, of the slaves, and to a moiety also of the slaves and compensation money in accordance with the Demarara law of property which they claimed exclusively. The children of the second marriage then filed a bill in England against all parties claiming beneficial interests in the property, praying that the trusts of the settlement made on the second marriage might be established, and that the will and codicil might be carried into execution, and for an injunction to restrain the children of the first marriage from proceeding with the suit at Demarara. The defendants (all of whom resided in England except L J V) appeared and answered: held, that as all the parties claiming a beneficial interest in the property had appeared, and were within the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery in England, it would be more convenient to have the ultimate question decided in this country. Leave given to the plaintiffs in the Demarara suit to go on with it there, and obtain a verdict if they could. Injunction granted to restrain execution. Bunbury v. Bunbury, M. R. affirmed on appeal, L. C. II. 367.

LIBEL.

1. Upon a rule for a criminal information for libel held, that in an indictment for libel, as well as a criminal information, the question of the truth or falsehood of the libel must be altogether laid aside; but where, in the preliminary stage of the proceedings, before they are ripe for the consideration of a jury, a defendant might have offered evidence to the Queen's Bench to shew that the allegation of the prosecutor as to its falsehood was without foundation, and if what the defendant shewed caused against the rule, he at the same time established the facts in the libel, or failing to do that, had shown that at the time of the publication he had reason to believe them to be true, if the statement complained of appeared to the court to have been made with a bona fide belief that it was true, then the Court will not make the rule absolute. Reg. v. Lawson, I. 120. Q. B.

The jury are the sole judges of the question of issue. Id.

2. The question of libel is a mixed question of law and fact, and the jury are at liberty to find a general verdict. Knight v. Coupland, II. 200.

There is a distinction between public men's public conduct, and private men's private conduct. There is no public interest concerned in dragging into public notoriety a private man; and if any one choose to drag him forth, and wound him in private life, nothing would justify him but a direct proof of the truth of his assertion. But with regard to public men and public measures, it is necessary for the public interest that they should be examined with great freedom, and the mode of doing so is by the public press. Whoever makes comments upon public men in a spirit of honesty is only doing that which is allowable. In respect to men in parliament, or even parliament itself, all persons may with the greatest freedom, even with coarseness of language, examine into the wisdom or folly, the justice or injustice of their proceedings. Id. per Coleridge, J.

3. In an action against the printers and publishers of the reports of proceedings in the House of Commons for libel reflecting on the character of the plaintiff, the defendants pleaded that they published the documents containing the libel by command of such house: held, that the defence pleaded was no defence at law. Stockdale v. Hansard, Q. B. II. 8 et seq. 333.

4. On the trial of an action for a libel, it is not the compulsory or necessary duty of a judge to tell the jury whether the publication is a libel or not: but it may be left to the jury alone to decide the question, whether it is or is not a libel. Baylis v. Lawrence, Q. B. IV. 142.

LIGHTS.

1. The court will not grant an injunction to restrain a defendant from erecting a building which when completed would exclude the light from a neighbouring house, but will leave the defendant at his peril to finish the erection, so that the plaintiff may bring an action at law, and if he obtains a verdict, then the court will deal with it. Smith v. Elger, II. 340. L. C. overruling an order of the V. C., who granted an injunction on the ground that the defendant had no ground to cause the obstruction (building a wall.)

The principle on which the court interferes by injunction, is purely for the maintenance of the legal right of the parties, either when that right clearly appears to be invaded, or when there is good reason for anticipating that it will be invaded. If there is any doubt of the legal right, then the court left the parties to establish it at law, putting them, if it thought fit, on such terms as the exigencies of the case may require. Id.

2. To entitle a party to recover damages for stoppage of lights, he must prove the obstruction to be so material as to cause inconvenience. Mere proof that there is somewhat less light than at a former period is insufficient. The Mercers' Company v. Hudson, Q. B. III. 204.

LIMITATION.

1. G W, by his will, devised real and personal property to trustees upon trust for L for life, and after her decease "for all and every his brothers and sisters who should be living at the time of the decease of L, and to their issue male and female equally, share and share alike. All the testator's brothers and sisters died in the lifetime of L, the brother and one sister without issue, and the other sister left issue who filed their bill: held, that the word "issue" is a word of limitation. It was in this case the same as heirs of the body. The words of limitation must be applied to the brothers and sisters who were intended to be the first takers, and that the plaintiffs took no interest under the devise. Tate v. Clarke, M. R. I. 137.

2. J M gave the produce of the residue of his real and personal estates to his daughter S M for life, for her separate use, and after her decease he first directed his trustees to transfer and pay one moiety of that residue "to the issue" of his daughter, if she should happen to marry and have any such issue, equally at their respective ages of twenty-one years, and if only one child, then the whole to be in trust for such one child, the dividends to be applied for the maintenance of such issue, and the surplus to be invested for the benefit of such issue; and in default of such issue, he gave that moiety to his nephews and nieces living at his daughter's decease, and as to the other moiety, "at the decease of his said daughter without issue," he gave it to trustees in trust for his godson for life, and after his decease for charitable purposes. The testator's daughter survived him, and suffered a recovery of all the freehold estates of T M, and married C C; she afterwards died without having ever had a child, surviving her husband, but having previously made a will, whereby she devised one moiety of her real and personal estate to the plaintiffs W C C and S C C, two-thirds of the remaining moiety to the children of W B who should be living at her death, and the remaining third to the children of W A. The plaintiffs charged that the gifts by T M, for the benefit of his nephews and nieces and of the charities, were limited to take effect after an indefinite failure of issue of his daughter, and were therefore void, and lapsed for her benefit as heiress at law, and sole next of kin of T M: held, that as related to the first moiety, the direction of T M, the testator, amounted to a distinct gift to the issue of his daughter, and that the use of the words "if only one child," and "such one child," illustrated that the testator meant by the word "issue," children of his daughter; and in default of such children, the gift over to the testator's nephews and nieces took effect. 2nd. That as related to the second moiety, there was no such distinct gift; that the word "issue" being there unexplained, the gift over in default thereof was too remote, and consequently void as to all the property. Carter v. Bentall, M. R. IV. 296.

LIMITATIONS, STATUTE OF.

1. In an action for mesne profits for a period of twenty-five years and ten months, the plaintiff, M K, was devisee of the land by will dated in 1781, when she should attain twenty-one; and the testator, at the time of making his will, and at his death, was in possession. M K married E K in 1799; during the marriage the husband of M K never demanded the rents, and the defendants had received them. The husband died in 1835, leaving M K surviving, and she then claimed the rents. The defendants pleaded the statute of limitations. M K had a verdict. King v. Edwick, Ass. I. 317, and subsequently judgment in ejectment, Id. I. 335.

2. As the law empowers a creditor to appropriate a payment made by a debtor to such account as it best suits his interest to select, he may apply such a payment in discharge of a debt barred by the statute of limitations. Mills v. Fowkes, C. P. II. 27.

3. Money expended for the maintenance of a lunatic cannot be recovered as a debt (under 3 & 4 W. IV. c. 104.) payable out of his real estate, inasmuch as the statute only intended to render the real estates of intestates, &c. liable for the debts they contracted, and a debt could not be contracted by a lunatic, as he is incapable of contracting. Carter v. Beard, V. C. II. 70.

4. It is insufficient merely to show incompetency of mind, there must be other circumstances to render a commission of lunacy expedient and necessary. Wilkinson v. Harwood, L. C. III. 85.

5. Where a lunatic was confined in an asylum, the keeper whereof refused the plaintiff access to him for the purpose of serving process upon him. The court granted a rule nisi for the keeper to show cause why a habeas corpus should not issue. Marston v. John, Ex. IV. 206.

MAGISTRATES.

1. A prisoner taken before a magistrate for house-breaking, about to make a confession, was told by the magistrate, that "any thing he might say for or against himself would be taken down, and in the event of his being committed, would be used at the trial as evidence against him," when he made a confession, and it was objected at the trial that the caution amounted to an inducement to confess: held, that this evidence was admissible. Reg. v. Arnold, Ass. I. 3.

Magistrates are often in too great a hurry to warn prisoners against making statements. Provided that no stratagem be made use of to induce a prisoner to make one, he ought to be encouraged to say what he thinks proper. Id. per Lord DENMAN.

3. It is the duty of magistrates to inform a prisoner, that all he may have said previously is to go for nothing, but that any thing he is about to say then will be taken down and used as evidence against him. Magistrates had better drop the use of the word "for," as it tends to raise a question of law. Id. per Lord DENMAN.

3. By licence in another diocese.
4. By an English woman in France with a Frenchman under the French law of dowry.
5. Validity of, by British subjects with French women at the Hotel of the Embassy by the Chaplain.
6. Refusal by a Clergyman to celebrate.
7. Incestuous.

1. Valid by the English law.—The marriage act of 1822 made all previous marriages by parties under age, without consent, valid, provided the parties had cohabited together as man and wife. Doe d. Quayle v. Nicholson, N. P. I. 299.

2. Valid by the Scotch law.—H R, formerly the widow of S B, who was in the service of the East India Company, and was a subscriber to the Bombay Civil Fund, which entitled his widow to a pension so long as she remained his widow, became acquainted with R R in England, with whom she lived, acting in all respects as his wife, and afterwards went to Scotland, where she lived with R R in a similar manner, and was received in society as Mrs. R. She continued to receive her pension upon a declaration that she was still the widow of S B. Subsequently the Bombay Civil Fund removed the restriction upon widows of members who should marry after that resolution; and then H R married R R in Scotland, according to the law of Scotland, the certificate of which marriage stated, "they having been previously irregularly wed." From these words of addition to the certificate, the Bombay Civil Fund discontinued the pension. Mr. and Mrs. R filed their bill to establish their claim, and the Master reported that no valid marriage had taken place prior to the resolution made by the Fund. Exceptions were taken to the report: held, that the Master was right in his finding. A contract of marriage can only be made by the mutual consent of the parties; but in this case the habit and repute the parties had gained was for appearances only, which is not of itself according to the law of Scotland sufficient to constitute a marriage, and Mrs. R was held entitled to her pension. Robertson v. Crawford, M. R. IV. 428.

See LEX LOCI REI SITÆ.

3. By licence in another diocese.—H W W, aged 21, and Miss D, aged 19, agreed to a clandestine marriage. W procured a license for the marriage at S, in the diocese of L and C, where Miss D resided, but he procured it from a surrogate of the dean of St. A, in whose diocese it was celebrated by a clergyman in orders of the Church of England: held, that as it had been decided by the judicial committee with respect to banns, that in order to render a marriage null and void under the marriage act 4 G. 4. c. 76. s. 23. both parties must have acted knowingly and wilfully with an intention to defeat the law; the words of the section with respect to licence, may be construed to mean either having authority to grant the particular licence, or any licence at all. The marriage was legal. Williams v. Williams, I. 56. C. C.

4. By an English woman in France, with a Frenchman, under the French law of Dowry.—Miss M F was entitled under the settlement made in the marriage of her parents to money charged on lands in Ireland. She married in Paris G, and by the marriage contract it was declared that the marriage took place under the law of dowry established by the French code. G and his wife filed a bill in England to ascertain who was entitled to the fund under this contract. The master reported that according to the French law G was not entitled, except under the obligation of converting it into immoveable property in France, over which neither he or his wife would have any power of alienation, and that the trustees would not part with the money unless for the acquisition of such property: held according to the master's report. De Gaga v. The Duke of Leinster, M. R. II. 327.

See A LIENS.

5. Validity of marriages by British subjects with Frenchwomen at the Hotel of the Embassy by the Chaplain.—G L, aged 22, a domiciled subject of England, married A P, aged 25, a domiciled subject of France, in the first instance by civil contract before the mayor of the Arrondissement, which was duly registered, and on the same day they were married at the Hotel of the British Ambassador at Paris by the Chaplain of the Embassy, both being described according to their respective places of domicile. On a suit for a nullity of the marriage on the grounds that the consent of the father of G L was not obtained, and that it was necessary to prove his birth according to the law of France, and that neither of the parties was a member of the household of the embassy: held, that under the statute 4 G. 4. c. 91. the marriage was valid. Lloyd v. Petitjean, III. 4. C. S.

A marriage between two British subjects in the house of the British Ambassador by the chaplain to the embassy is valid under the 4 Geo. 4. c. 91. Id.

Marriages at St. Petersburg in the chapel of the Russia Company, and in private houses, are valid, whether both or one of the parties be English subjects, under 4 Geo. 4. c. 67. Id.

a foreign marriage valid according to the law of the place where celebrated is good anywhere else, Per Lord Stowell. Id.

Marriages in ambassadors' chapels, if made by the allowance of the foreign state, would be good marriages in those countries; but that if not a good marriage in the place where it was celebrated, it would not be a good marriage anywhere. Per Lord Ellenborough. Id.

See the law of France previous to the celebration of a marriage. Id.

6. Refusal by a clergyman to celebrate.—Plaintiff obtained a verdict against a clergyman of the Church of England for refusing to marry him with a woman, on their producing a sufficient licence, without giving sufficient reasons for his refusal. Davis v. Black, Clk. Ass. III. 413. See Vol. 6, where the court declined any opinion on the subject.

7. Incestuous.—A man married the daughter of his own sister; proceedings were taken to annul the marriage as being incestuous, and a question arose as to what was the best evidence that the marriage had taken place: held, that in all the courts the fact of the marriage may be proved without any register at all. If there is any connection between the parties by blood, even if they are illegitimate, the marriage is void. It is not absolutely necessary that a marriage should be registered, therefore a register is not the best evidence. Nor can a mistake in the register affect the validity of the marriage. A register is a mere record or memorandum. Oral evidence was here given to establish the fact, that the party proceeded against had married, and still cohabited with his own niece, and the marriage was declared null and void. No penance was directed. Woods v. Woods, Cons. C. IV. 300.

MASTER AND SERVANT.

1. A servant was indicted for stealing some wheat from his master. The prisoner took the wheat to give to his master's horses, because they were out of condition: held, that if the prisoner took the wheat without his master's permission even to give it to his master's horses, that constituted a felony, and the prisoner was found guilty. Per Ld. Denman, Reg. v. Mould, III. 382. The civil law makes the lucri causa, or the intention of the thief to derive a profit from his crime, an essential part of the offence of theft: it has been held to be larceny in a servant clandestinely to take his master's corn to give his master's horses, and in which some of the judges stated it to be the ground of their opinion, that the additional quantity of corn would diminish the work of the men who had to look after the horses; so that the lucri causa, viz. to give themselves ease was an ingredient in the case. Western's Conveyancing, Ed. 3. 208. n. 13. See also Id. 227. 228. 422.

2. In the absence of any special agreement, a domestic servant, on quitting his situation instantly at his master's command, is entitled to a month's wages in lieu of a month's warning. Hatten v. Wilson, 8h. C. II. 248.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ACT.

1. Where nine overseers are appointed in one parish, it is a several duty attaching on all of them individually, to sign the burgess list thereof, and if any one of such overseers neglects signing the list of that portion of the parish allotted to him, he will be liable to the penalty imposed by the act, although all the other overseers signed the lists for their respective portions of the parish. Reg. v. Burrill, Q. B. I. 409. IV. 263.

The Corporation Act differs from the Reform Act; it drops the word "wilfully" and gives the penalty for any omission or inaccuracy, per Lord Denman. Id.

2. The 92d section of the municipal corporation reform act empowers town councils to order a rate, in the nature of a county-rate, and gives them the same powers as those exercised by justices under 55 G. 3. c. 51. In 1839, the town council of S ordered such a rate, and required F, the overseer of the township of C B, to levy a certain sum on a portion of E, which was situate in the borough. This, F was unable to do, and his goods were seized and detained by virtue of a warrant from W, the then mayor of S, until the amount was paid: held, that the proper mode of levying the rate had not been adopted, although F resided in the borough; and that trespass was the proper form of action. *Fearnley v. NUISANCE.

1. The smoke arising from a blacksmith's forge does not constitute such a nuisance as will support an action, where it appears that the party seeking damages came into the locality of his own accord, and that the smoke created an annoyance, but without interfering with the fair exercise of his trade or rendering his house uncomfortable. Muggleton v. Edwards, N. P. I. 348.

If the smoke and dirt from the defendant's chimney rendered the occupation of the plaintiff's house in a suitable and substantial degree uncomfortable, or interfered in the like degree with the carrying on of his trade, then the defendant could not justify himself in the action. Per Tindal, C. J. Id.

2. A lease had been granted in 1736, by A to B, of lands with a covenant to build one new copper smelting house for smelting, making and refining copper, and to contain 202 furnaces, and another covenant to deliver up the premises at the end of the term in a sufficient state, and condition for smelting, making and refining of copper or other metals. The lessor covenanted to allow the lessees to dig on his land for clay to make bricks for the furnaces, and to supply them with coals for the works. Various copper works were accordingly erected, and the lands came to the Earl of J. who also granted leases of other works of a like nature in the same locality. A competition existed between the lessees of the latter and former works. B had also erected other works of which A was aware, upon some exchanged land, formerly the property of the Earl of J's ancestors. The Earl complained that the smoke and vapour arising from A's furnaces had infected and corrupted his farms and lands which had been prevented from increasing, and brought his action at law for a nuisance. A filed his bill for a declaration, that he might be entitled to use and practise the smelting of copper ores, without any interruption by the Earl of J, and to be quieted in the use and enjoyment of the works, and for an injunction perpetually to restrain the Earl of J from molesting or disturbing him in the enjoyment of the works, either by prosecuting the action at law, or by commencing any other action. The Earl of J demurred for want of equity. The injunction was granted to stay the action at law. Williams v. Earl of Jersey, V. C. IV. 246. Affirmed on Appeal, L. C. V. 181.

NURSERYMAN'S STOCK IN TRADE.

A lease of a nursery ground was granted in 1776 for 60 years: upon its expiration the holder of the lease proceeded to advertise a sale describing the nursery stock, "consisting of large and ornamental trees and shrubs, forest trees, &c." The lessor filed a bill for an injunction restraining the lessee from selling, cutting down or removing any full grown or standard timber, fruit or other trees or any hedges except such trees or shrubs as might or could be removed in the ordinary course of his trade or business of a nurseryman. Injunction granted until answer or order to the contrary. The question in the cause applied to trees of the growth of above 40 years. Littler v. Thompson, M. R. I. 245.

Where one of several partners in a banking firm received money of a person, and pretended to place it in the bank for her, and her checks upon them were duly honoured, but her pass-book, which was of the same description as those used as the regular pass-books of the bank, was headed as an account with that individual partner only; it was ruled that all the partners were nevertheless liable on that account. Taylor v. Lloyd, N. P. II. 313.

PARTNERSHIP.

1. Dissolution.—Articles of copartnership provided for a general account half-yearly, and if it appeared that the gains of the concern in any successive half year were insufficient to pay the expenses, then either party might, after one month's notice, dissolve the partnership. A deficiency of 83% appeared in the Midsummer account of 1839, and a deficiency of 2,650% in the subsequent account. One of the partners gave the other notice on the 4th of January 1840, to determine the partnership: held, that he had a right to do so, and that the partnership ceased to exist on the 4th of February. Ratcliff v. Dickins, V. C. III. 293.

2. Where one of several partners filed a bill, praying the production of documents which were in the hands of another partner, but which were deposited with him as the common agent appointed to hold them for the mutual benefit of all. #### PATENT.

1. Equitable Rights to.—In a bill complaining of an infraction of a patent, and praying for a specific performance of a parol agreement for its purchase, it is unnecessary to set forth a full statement of the specification. Westhead v. Kern, M. R. I. 87.

2. After an injunction had been obtained against a party for infringement of a patent; he laid by for ten months, before applying to the Court to have it dissolved. His application after that lapse of time was refused by the Vice-Chancellor, and that decision confirmed on appeal. Bickford v. Shumet, L. C. I. 341.

3. The court is not bound to grant injunctions merely because a patent has been granted and exclusively enjoyed for some time; but at the hearing the plaintiff must prove his title clearly, and must not rely upon evidence of a prima facie title. The court may interpose its injunction without putting the party to establish the validity of his patent by an action at law. Bacon v. Spottiswoode, M. R. II. 53.

4. Although it is unusual to bring an injunction case to hearing without a previous motion to the court to grant the injunction, yet a plaintiff will not be precluded from seeking the injunction because he had not applied for it on interlocutory motion. Id.

5. Legal Rights in.—Where a plaintiff had obtained a verdict at law, establishing the validity of a patent, to set aside which verdict a rule nisi for a new trial had been granted, a motion for an injunction to restrain the defendant from further infringement of the patent, cannot be entertained until judgment shall be given at law. Collard v. Allison, L. Ch. IV. 22.

A pilot is personally liable in damages, if by negligence and an improper exercise of his vocation, a ship, of which he has the charge, runs down another vessel. Drew v. Knight, N. P. III. 409.

PIRACY.

An injunction was applied for to restrain a bookseller from publishing a work called The Dictionary of "Materia Medica and Practical Pharmacy," alleged to be a piracy from a book written many years before by the plaintiff, called the "Manual of Pharmacy." The defendant answered that the latter work had become entirely useless by the publication of a new edition of the "London Pharmacopœia," and that the first-mentioned work could not prejudice the sale of the copies on hand, which were quite unsaleable, whether his "Dictionary" was published or not. The court was thus asked to interfere by injunction on behalf of the unsaleable work to prevent the sale of a new work, the only objection to which was, that parts of it were the same as the one which had become unsaleable: held, that such an injunction would not be advantageous to either party; there ought to be an inquiry at law as to the quantity of matter taken. *Renshaw v. 1. On Bills of Exchange.—In an action by the indorsee of a bill of exchange against the indorser, the latter pleaded that the plaintiff had not before the bill became due paid the value thereof to the person who had indorsed it to him: plea allowed, but the court observed that, whenever the circumstances of the case warranted it, the court had power, in such cases, to order the plea to be taken off the file, and would exercise it. Horner v. Keppell, Q. B. I. 393.

2. Declaration.—That defendant made his bill of exchange directed to Messrs. —, by whom it was dishonoured on being presented for acceptance, whereupon it was protested for non-acceptance, of which premises the defendant had notice; that the said bill being still unpaid, was afterwards, on becoming due, presented to Messrs. — for payment, but they wholly declined paying it, and of which premises the said defendant then had due notice. In addition to this there was the usual count, upon an account stated, with a general allegation that the defendant, in consideration, &c. promised the plaintiff to pay him the said several monies respectively, on request, with a general breach and special damage. Special demurrer assigning for causes that the declaration was double and uncertain, inasmuch as it alleged two distinct dishonourers of the bill, either of which would alone give him a good cause of action. Demurrer Overruled, Galway v. Rose, Ex. III. 299.

3. In an action on a bill of exchange defendant pleaded that it had not been protested for non-payment, the court granted a rule to set the plea aside as frivolous. Squires v. Edwards, C. P. III. 41.

DEMURRER, that the declaration did not state that the coals were delivered "from" any ship, lighter, barge, craft, or warehouse in London or Westminster, or within twenty-five miles of the General Post Office. #### PRACTICE.—COMMON LAW.

1. Arrest.—A barrister having been arrested en memo process on his return from attendance in the Court of Chancery, obtained a judge's order for his discharge; the sheriffs, however, had also a ca. m. against him at the time, and refused his discharge; he brought an action of trespass against the sheriffs: held, that the sheriffs were bound to detain him on the ca. m.; if they had discharged him they would have been liable to an action for escape. Watson v. Carroll and another, Ex. I. 235.

2. Judgment.—Where one of two defendants had suffered judgment by default, it is still competent for the other to move for judgment, as in case of a nonsuit against the plaintiff for not proceeding to trial. Stewart v. Rogers and another, Ex. I. 186. 205.

3. New Trial.—A party entering a cause in the new trial motion paper, is bound to give the opposite party notice of that fact, and if such notice is not given, a judgment, signed on the morning of the fifth day of term will be regular. Dee d. Duncan v. Edwards, B. C. I. 237.

The point was new, and the question had been in some doubt. Id.

4. Proof at Trial.—In trover against assignees to recover the value of property deposited with a bankrupt (an auctioneer) for sale, and which remaining in his custody until the bankruptcy, was sold by the assignees with his other effects: Defendant pleaded. 1st, that the plaintiff was not possessed of the goods in question; and 2nd, not guilty. Under the first plea, it was held, that the defendants might show in evidence, that the party became a bankrupt in the course of law, that the assignees thereupon became possessed of the goods, by reason of the plaintiff having allowed them to remain under the order and disposition of the bankrupt until the fiat issued. Law v. Belcher, R. Nisi, I. 187.

See BANKRUPTCY, 10.

5. Service of Process.—Where the copy of a writ & summons served on defendant, stated the action to be "on the case promises." The court set aside the service, and all subsequent proceedings for irregularity. Jones v. Haines, Ex. I. 281.

6. Taxation of Costs.—An action was brought in a superior court for a sum above 20*l.*, the defendant pleaded a large set-off and paid 2*l.* into court; the matter was referred, and the plaintiff had awarded 10*l.* beyond the 2*l.* paid into court; the plaintiff became bankrupt, and it became necessary for his attorney to tax his costs in order to prove them under the fiat. The master thought the lower scale ought to be adopted, because the sum recovered was less than 20*l.*: held, that the rule was to tax between party and party; an attorney ought not to be allowed to subject his client to the payment of unnecessary extra costs by bringing an action in a court where he knows he cannot recover full costs from his adversary; if the master saw the attorney had not been guilty of any neglect, in not inserting in the order of reference, a power to the arbitrator to certify for costs on the larger scale, he may allow that scale. Referred back to the master for the purpose. New Case. Waller v. Smith, Ex. I. 408.

See PRACTICE—EQUITY, 11.

PRACTICE—EQUITY.

7. Affidavit of Service abroad.—An order had been made, that service of subpœna on a defendant at Boulogne should be deemed good service, and that service should be proved by affidavit before any person authorised to administer an oath, and which should be authenticated by the British consul there: the service was made, and the affidavit was made before the "deputy mayor of Boulogne;" the British consul certified that the latter person was "the deputy mayor," but the certificate did not shew that the deputy mayor was authorised to administer an oath. Order of service, and all subsequent proceedings upon it discharged. Mackellar v. Mackellar, V. C. I. 391.

7 a. Bill.—A plaintiff may dismiss his bill before argument upon payment of costs. Curtis v. Lloyd, I. 102.

8. Answer.—An original bill must be answered before an answer will be required to a cross bill. Wheatley v. Whittaker, M. R. I. 119.

9. Arrest—Attachment.—A plaintiff illegally holding a defendant in custody cannot legally detain him while in such custody by another writ at his own suit. Hawkins v. Hall, M. R. I. 263.

At Common Law the same plaintiff who illegally holds a defendant in custody, cannot legally charge him while in such custody with a declaration at his own suit. Id. per Lord Langdale.

10. Feme Plaintiff.—Where a wife claims beneficially under a settlement made upon her before marriage, she should file a bill by her next friend, and her husband should be made a defendant, her husband giving security for costs. England v. Downes, M. R. I. 327.—See SETTLEMENTS, 3.

11. Injunction.—After appearance to an injunction bill and before answer, the court will, in urgent cases of waste, issue an injunction. Randall v. Commercial Railway Co. V. C. I. 406.

12. Injunction will not be granted ex parte where the bill had been filed, but the defendant had not been served with subpœna. Bulwer v. Thomas, I. 102.

13. Issues.—Where facts alleged by the bill were denied by the answer and the case was involved in obscurity owing to the doubtful credit to which all parties were entitled; the court, as the only fair mode of arriving at truth, and of clearing the characters of the litigants, directed issues to try the facts by a jury. Milner v. Singleton, V. C. IV. 381.

14. Laches.—New Rules.—A plaintiff's bill was filed in October, 1836, and answered by a defendant in the December following. In June 1837, A moved to dismiss the bill, upon which the plaintiff undertook to speed the cause. But nothing further was done until February, 1839, when the V. C. granted a commission to examine witnesses, which was contended to be irregular: held that one defendant had nothing to do with the other. Order of V. C. discharged. Howard v. Prines, L. C. II. 7.

15. Orders of Course.—An order to amend a bill after an injunction has been granted, is an order "of course." Wiggins v. Lord. See query? M. R. I. 379.

The practice is in an uncertain state, and ought to become the subject of a general order. Id. per Lord Langdale.

16. Order for hearing causes.—3d General Order, 5th May, 1837.—Where a cause in which an order on the merits had been made by the V. C. was set down by one of several defendants for hearing before the Master of the Rolls, and five days afterwards by another defendant for hearing before the V. C. an order upon the merits had been made in the cause by the V. C.: held, that the entry of the cause at the Rolls was irregular, and that it could only be heard before the V. C. Sandys v. Long, M. R. II. 24.

17. Order on the merits.—An order for removing a guardian ad litem, and appointing another, is an order upon the merits. Id.

18. Parties.—Where necessary parties to a suit are not before the court it will order the cause to stand over, in order that they may be made parties. After which the plaintiff must bring them before the court, or shew that he had used his best endeavours to do so. Willatts v. Busby, M. R. I. 360.

19. The proper parties to a bill for relief in Equity with regard to tithes demised by the rector, are the rector and his lessee where the demise is by parol; and the lessee only when the demise is by deed. Foot v. Besant, Ex. Eq. I. 361.

20. Service of Orders.—See IV. 379.—Where the defendant, a naval officer, was abroad, the court refused to allow the service of an order to be substituted by being made on his clerk in court. Ward v. Arch, V. C. II. 24.

The enjoyment of an easement under that statute, must be continuous and uninterrupted for the full period of twenty years next before the suit adversely to all the world, and such an enjoyment is invalidated by a unity of possession during any portion of the twenty years. Id.

There are but three modes in which a right on the part of the public to a way over a river can be established. 1st. by Act of Parliament; 2d. by prescription, to support which a jury must be satisfied that the right has existed from time immemorial. 3d. by proof of a dedication on the part of the owner of the river to the public. No particular time during which the public has been allowed to enjoy the right, is necessary to be shewn to establish a dedication. Anon. Q. B. Per Lord Denman, I. 366.

PRESENTATION.

See ADVOWSON.

A, an insurance broker, was applied to by G to insure the ship, M, for 10,000*l.* which he refused to do until G brought an authority from B, the captain of the ship. B having given the required authority, A then effected the insurance and paid premiums amounting to 800*l.* which on G's becoming insolvent he sought to recover of B, alleging that he was the person for whom the insurance was effected, and that G was his agent only. At the trial of an action by A against B for the premiums, the jury found that G was the party credited by A, that G had been paid, or allowed for the insurance in an account with B, and that A would have been paid had not G become insolvent. B had a verdict. Auchterlony v. Owen, N. P. I. 279.

PROMISSORY NOTES.

1. A promissory note cannot be re-issued after the debt for which it was originally given has been satisfied. Bartram v. Caddy, Q. B. I. 104.

2. A agreed to lend B a sum of money upon a promissory note, payable three months after date at the rate of 10½ per cent. interest, with an understanding that the note should be renewed if desired by the drawer every three months for a period not exceeding eighteen months. The notes were occasionally overdue between the times of their expiration and renewal: held, (reversing a decision of the Court of Review, which had held otherwise, II. 12.), that the transaction was protected by the stat. 3 and 4 W. 4. c. 98, allowing unrestricted interest on three months' bills, and was not against the usury laws. Exp. Terrewest, in re Poynder, L. Ch. III. 21.

3. M gave R a note of hand in the following form:—"Twelve months after date I promise to pay Messrs. R F and Co. the sum of 500*l.*, to be held by them as a collateral security for any monies now owing to them by Mr. J M, which they may be unable to recover in realizing the security now held:" held, that the note in question was not a promissory note, but must be taken as a conditional promise. Robinson v. May, Q. B. III. 103.

4. A notice thus—"This is to inform you, that the bill I took of you for 15*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* is not taken up and 4*s.* 6*d.* expences, and the money I must pay immediately," is not a good notice of dishonour to the maker of a promissory note. Messenger v. Southey, C. P. IV. 44.

Where a new church is built under the authority of an act of Parliament in substitution of an ancient parish church, the common law will entitle the rector to claim the chief seat in the chancel, and whether he be the endowed or the spiritual rector only, unless some other person can prescribe for such seat for himself by reason of immemorial enjoyment. Rights of this nature are adjudicated upon by the Ecclesiastical Court, which in its ordinary authority can protect and enforce such rights. Spry v. Flood, Eccles. Court, III. 137.

REWARD.

1. The plaintiff, a police officer, sought to recover a sum of money, which defendant had advertised as a reward to be paid to any person who should give him information, leading to the discovery of felons who had stolen his property. The plaintiff gave that information, but the defendant refused to pay him the reward: the defendant demurred to the declaration on the ground that the promise was contrary to the policy of the law, and therefore one that the court would not enforce.—Demurrer overruled. England v. Davison, Q. B. IV. 25.

Unless the Court clearly sees that an engagement is contrary to public policy, it will not prevent its being carried into effect. Id.

2. Where a reward is offered for information leading to the detection of felons, that person is entitled to the definition "first information," who was the first to communicate a fact which ultimately turned out to be material for a conviction. But such person will not be entitled to the reward, if the information was received by him from a third person, who in giving the information to the former only, made him a channel of conveying it to the parties offering the reward. Eve v. Stee, C. P. III. 86.

2. Service of a rule nisi to compute on one of two defendants, joint makers of a promissory note, will entitle the plaintiff to make his rule absolute as against them both. Bennett v. Beckett, Ex. III. 88.

SEPARATE USE.

A devised to trustees upon trust for his wife for life, remainder, as to part of the devise, to A B and her heirs, and as to other part, to M A T, "so and in such manner that she should not anticipate, charge, sell or dispose of her life estate, and that no husband might have any control over her, nor should she be liable to his debts, and her receipts should be good discharges." The testator died in Oct. 1820: M A T was then unmarried. On the 23d April, 1827, M A T married. On the 25th Oct. 1826, A B made her will and devised to trustees upon trust to receive the rents and pay them to M A T for her life, "so as she should not sell or dispose of her life interest, or raise money thereon by mortgage or otherwise, and so as the rents should not be subject to but be exclusive of the control or interference of any husband, nor be liable to his debts, and her receipt only to be a good discharge." In Oct. 1827, A B died. In Jan. 1830, the wife of the testator died, and his devise took effect in possession. In 1832, M A T and her husband granted an annuity, secured upon the devise made by both wills, and payments were made up to Jan. 1834. In Jan. 1835, the husband of M A T took the benefit of the Insolvent Debtors' Act, and his wife refused to pay the annuity. The annuitant filed a bill, claiming to be entitled to his annuity, by reason that as to the devise by the testator, M A T, at his death, was unmarried, and the limitation to her separate use was not effectual, the restraint against anticipation was void, because the devise was not accompanied with a gift over on an attempt to alienate: held, that in the Court of Equity, a married woman had, for more than a century past, been considered capable of possessing property for her own use, independent of her husband, as a feme sole. The property might be created by contract before the marriage, or by gift from the husband or any stranger, and the court will treat the husband as a trustee. Property given to the separate use of a woman, without power of anticipation, may, under the authority of the court, be enjoyed by her as her separate estate during coverture, and that in respect of such estate she may be considered as a feme sole. The words "independent of her husband" mean that the marital power of the husband shall not be permitted to contravene the donor's intention. That as to the estate of A, devised in trust for M A T, the annuitant had acquired no right over it by virtue of the security executed to him by M A T, and her husband, but as to the estate of A B, the annuitant was entitled to his annuity. Tullett v. Armstrong, M. R. I. 21.

See Ashton v. M'Dougall, M. R. I. 295. Green v. Campbell, M. R. I. 247. Nedby v. Nedby, L. C. I. 86. 184., and Newlands v. Holmes, III. 184. 215. 361. These four last-named cases were decided before the law was finally settled, by the L. C. in Tullett v. Armstrong.

On Appeal—The jurisdiction which the court has assumed in similar cases justifies it in extending it to the protection of the separate estate, with its qualifications and restrictions attached to it throughout the subsequent coverture, and in vesting such jurisdiction upon the broadest foundations. This the interests of society require. Decree of M. R. affirmed, per Lord Cottenham, III. 216.

See the Letter of the Editor of "THE LEGAL GUIDE" to LORD COTTENHAM, I. 225; also his Review of the Judgment of the M. R. Id. 22; see also II. 209.

THE LAW AS NOW SETTLED extends to this,—that where property is given or settled to the separate use of an unmarried woman, with a restraint against alienation, and she is unmarried when the gift takes effect, and during her coverture she does not dispose of it, then, upon her subsequent marriage the restriction will come into operation, and she may enjoy the property, as her separate estate, against her husband; but her power of disposal will cease during the coverture. Tullett v. Armstrong, Scarborough v. Berman, L. C. III. 216.

2. A bequest to a feme covert "or her assigns for life, for her and their own absolute use and benefit," does not constitute a gift to her separate use. Rymer v. Christy, M. R. IV. 344.

See AGREEMENT.—HUSBAND AND WIFE.

3. Personal property, viz., furniture and other household effects, purchased and settled upon a woman, before marriage, to her separate use, is not liable to be seized under a fi. fa. issued against her husband. But goods purchased with the wife's money, after the marriage, become the property of the husband, and are liable to be taken in execution by his creditors, in the absence of any evidence to prove an agency for the trustees of the wife. Corn v. Bryer, Ex. N. P. IV. 60. Ex. V. 124.

They cannot be deprived of this privilege by a warrant from the crown, under the sign manual, or by any other power short of an act of parliament. Id.

SETTLEMENT ON MARRIAGE.

1. Where a marriage settlement (as admitted by all parties) was framed contrary to the intention of the parties, the court will alter and render it conformable to that intention. Keymer v. Perring, L. C. III. 377.

2. By an ultimate limitation in marriage articles personal estate was limited to such persons as under the statute of distributions would have become entitled to the personal estate of Mrs. M., "in case she had died intestate and unmarried." Mrs. M. died leaving children, her husband surviving and eight children. She also left a brother and sister, who claimed the fund: held, that the word "unmarried" meant "discovert," that the children were next of kin to their mother within the meaning of this limitation, and that they were the only persons entitled to the fund, over-ruling a decree of the Vice-Chancellor, who held that the children of Mrs. M. were not, under the limitation in the settlement, her next of kin, as a to be entitled to the funds, but that they belonged to the persons who would have been entitled under the statute of distributions to the personal estate of Mrs. M at the time of her decease, in case she had died intestate, and without having been married. The court has held in many cases, that "unmarried" means "never being married." Maugham v. Vincent, L. C. IV. 138.

3. A widow, in contemplation of a second marriage, made a settlement of all her property upon the children of her first marriage, which had been left her by her first husband, which by her directions was prepared and executed without the intended husband's knowledge. After the marriage, the husband took possession of part of the property as owner, and on his becoming acquainted with the settlement, shortly afterwards, stated a case to counsel as to the possibility of effecting a revocation of it; but he took no steps to do so, and the wife continued to deal with the property according to the powers conferred upon her by the settlement: held, that the settlement was not fraudulent and void as against the marital rights of the husband, because there was no evidence of a treaty of marriage when the settlement was executed, or that it was concealed from the intended husband, and that after he had discovered it, which was soon after his marriage, he had filed no bill, nor taken any steps to impeach the settlement; therefore the children of the first marriage were entitled to call for the execution of the trusts of that settlement, and that the husband's title to equitable relief was barred by acquiescence. England v. Downs, M. R. IV. 152.

4. Executory.—Where a settlor directs trustees at a future time to convey lands so far as the law would permit in strict settlement, and the court sees a plain intention that no more was directed to be done, it will give effect to such intention. Banks v. Ld. Despen- cer, V. C. IV. 398.

SETTLEMENT, VOLUNTARY.

1. Where parties set up and rely upon a voluntary settlement obtained from parties far advanced in age, proof by them is necessary, (if the validity of such deed is impugned,) that it was properly executed, and not obtained by fraud. Relief can only be obtained in equity by shewing some equitable fraud, which cannot be made known by a court of law. Bittell v. Turnley, M. R. I. 326.

2. A, by deed, dated 14th February, 1818, in consideration of 100*l.* paid to him by B, covenanted to maintain, clothe, educate, apprentice, and bring up B's son (the plaintiff) in a suitable and proper manner, as if he were his own son, and that the heirs and executors of A should convey and assign his real and personal estate, of which he should die possessed after the death of his wife to B's son absolutely, if A should have no child of his own, but if he should have such child or children, then to such child or children and B's son equally. The plaintiff was brought up in ignorance of this provision, and was brought up, maintained, educated, and clothed by his father. A died, in 1827, without issue, and made a will without noticing the deed providing for B's son. The executors inserted advertisements in the London papers for claims, but none came in, and they distributed A's estate: held, that the presumption was that the deed had been abandoned, as the covenant had not been performed, nor was it clear that the consideration of 100*l.* had been bond fide paid. If the claim were valid, the executors of A were personally liable. Hill v. Gomme, M. R. II. 328. affirmed by the L. C. on appeal, III. 230.

SETTLEMENT OF PAUPERS.

SHERIFF.

1. Attachment against.—Where a defendant was outlawed in a bailable action before the statute 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. an attachment was granted against the sheriff upon his refusal to accept the defendant's bail when in custody under a capias utlagatum. Gibbs v. Grigg, Q. B. III. 26.

2. Duties of.—A sheriff's officer is not justified in arresting a party without producing his warrant at the time of the arrest, and if he insists upon doing so he is liable to an action for damages. Evans v. Steman, Sher. C. III. 122.

An action was brought against the printers of the House of Commons, for an alleged publication of certain papers by order or under the authority of that House. The defendants suffered judgment by default, and a writ of enquiry was issued commanding the sheriffs of Middlesex to execute it on a certain day. The sheriff received notice of certain resolutions of the House of Commons "that to bring or assist in bringing an action against their printer for such publication, would be a breach of the privileges of the House," and that in the event of the sheriff promoting or carrying on such proceedings, they would become amenable to the authority of the House of Commons. A motion was made by the sheriff for a rule on the plaintiff to shew cause why the execution of the writ of inquiry should not be stayed until the further order of the court: held, that there were not sufficient grounds for the court to interfere. Stockdale v. Hansard, Q. B. III. 41.

3. Liabilities.—In a penal action under the 32 G. 2. c. 28. ss. 1. 12. against the sheriff by reason that, as the officer was proceeding with the plaintiff to prison within twenty-four hours after the arrest, the plaintiff in order to avoid going to the prison, submits to be taken to a public house in order that he might arrange with his creditor. The jury found that the plaintiff was taken to the public house without his free and voluntary consent: held, that a consent so obtained, (that is, that the plaintiff finding himself about to be forcibly carried to gaol submits to be taken to a public house to arrange with his creditor) was not free and voluntary within the statute. It is not necessary to shew the warrant, to prove the arrest by the defendant. Barsham v. Bullock, N. P. I. 328.

4. A writ of ca. sa. was obtained on the 14th June to arrest a debtor, upon receiving which the sheriff issued a warrant to one of his bailiffs, who on one occasion got sight of the debtor, but he being on horseback managed to ride off—upon which the bailiff relinquished the pursuit. The debtor subsequently frequented markets and other places of notoriety, and if ordinary diligence had been used, might have been captured, but the officer neglected to take any steps towards doing so. This the jury considered to be sufficient negligence to charge the sheriff with the debt. Pugh v. Ker, N. P. II. 123. See also Id. 295.

5. A writ of ca. sa. was placed in the hands of a sheriff's officer, and after a considerable time, on the sheriffs being ruled to return the writ, he returned that the defendant was not to be found in his bailiwick. It was, however, proved that he was seen therein frequently in the course of several months. In an action against the sheriff for negligence, the jury found for the plaintiff. Stewart v. Carroll, N. P. III. 381.

6. A sheriff is liable to be sued for damages for false imprisonment, where his officer, after arresting a person under a mistake, refused to release him on being apprised thereof. Carter v. Evans, Coroner's Court, IV. 190.

7. If a sheriff's officer, after making a seizure of effects, which he believed belonged to the party against whom he had a writ of execution, refuses to listen to explanations, that they are the property of other persons, or neglects to avail himself of proffered information on the subject, he will be held liable in damages for the injury sustained. Robinson v. Evans, Coroner's Court, III. 191.

8. Although, in an action against a sheriff for an illegal seizure of plaintiff's effects, no special damage be proved, yet the fact of a bailiff being in possession, and that circumstance becoming known in the neighbourhood, constitutes a sufficient injury to support the action. Id.

9. Poundage.—A sheriff has no right to poundage where the defendant tenders the amount of debt and costs to the officer on the presentation of the warrant. Colls v. Cooke, Q. B. IV. 171.

See INSURANCE, 3.

SHIPS' STORES.

Ships "provisions" do not fall within the nomen generale "ships' stores," but must be paid for beyond the price agreed to be given for the "ship and stores," when the latter is sold under that description only. Arrowsmith v. Johnson, Ex. 1. 75.

SHIPPING.

1. In an action brought by the owner of a vessel against the owner of a steam tug, in which the former complained that through the carelessness and negligence of the defendant's servants, they had so managed and conducted the steam-tug, that it dragged the plaintiff's vessel against another ship, and the owners had been obliged to make compensation to the master of the latter ship: the judge (Tindal, C. J.) thought it resolved itself very much into the question, whether those on board the vessel belonging to the plaintiffs had a bond fide belief that those in the steam-tug would obey the order of the pilot? The plaintiffs had a verdict. Cummings v. Griffiths, N. P. IV. 172.

2. The broker, through whose instrumentality the owners of a ship obtain a freight, is entitled to be paid his brokerage, although the charter-party was executed at the house of another broker. Burnett v. Burch, N. P. IV. 173.

3. If a ship is described to a vendee as being "sea-worthy," she ought to be so for "all purposes" generally, whatever her cargo might be; and in an action on a policy of assurance, it is a question for the jury to say, whether the evidence has proved that at the time the ship sailed she was in a fitting state to go to sea with the cargo she then contained, and on the particular voyage. Castle v. Irving, N. P. IV. 234.

SHOPKEEPERS.

1. Shopkeepers are liable to damages for an injury sustained by a passenger along a public street, occasioned by the shutter apertures in the foot-pavement being left open in a negligent manner. See Peacock v. Trimmell, N. P. IV. 159.

2. A put a vicious poney, which had run away once before on the same day, into a cart, with which he ran away again, and coming in contact with some goods exposed for sale in the town of P, the cart was overturned and A sustained some injury, for which he sued the shopkeeper. By the judge's direction, a verdict was returned for the defendant, which, on motion for a new trial, the court refused to disturb. Marriott v. Stourley, C. P. IV. 345.

Two things must concur to support such an action, viz. an obstruction by default of the defendant, and no want of ordinary care to avoid it on the part of the plaintiff.

Indebitatus assumpsit to recover 4,531l., as the value of 5,000l. stock, which the plaintiff had sold and caused to be transferred to the defendant, (the purchaser and not the broker), and for which the plaintiff had not received value from the broker. The defendant pleaded that the stock had been transferred by virtue of a contract for sale to the defendant since the passing of the Stock Jobbing Act, 7 Geo. 2. c. 8. s. 8, in consideration of 4,531l. to be paid to the plaintiff, and that at the time of making such contract the plaintiff was not actually possessed of or entitled unto in his own right, or in his own name, or in the name of a trustee, to the use of the stock so contracted to be sold, or any share in the same stock, by means whereof the contract became null and void. The plaintiff put in a general demurrer: held, that the plea was no answer to the action, and that the contract was not within the 7 Geo. 2. c. 8. s. 8, and the plaintiff had judgment. Mortimer v. M'Allan, Ex. III. 248, 311. IV. 280.

SUBPENA.

1. Disobeying.—Where a witness who had been subpœnaed on the trial of a cause which was withdrawn about a quarter of an hour previous to his appearance on account of his absence, the Court granted a rule nisi to show cause why he should not pay the costs of the day, or why in case of his refusal to do so an attachment should not issue against him. Ginger v. Peach, C. P. III. 104.

2. In an action against a party for disobeying a subpœna duces tecum: held, that an action is maintainable against an absent witness, though he might not have been called upon for his subpœna, if it were proved that he had absented himself in such a way that even if he were called to appear in court he could not possibly do so. It is sufficient evidence to support the action that the plaintiff was obliged to withdraw the record in consequence of the absence of the witness. Lamont v. Crook, Ex. IV. 109.

3. One partner is not liable for damages for not attending as witness on a trial when the subpœna was served upon another partner, who explained to the person serving it that he was not the person proper to be served. Samuel v. Davis, N. P. I. 104. Q. B. N. P.

4. If witnesses neglect to appear when a trial is called on, it is the duty of the counsel to withdraw the record, and if that is done entirely through a witness's neglect, he will be liable for the expences. It is not necessary first to swear the jury. Per LORD DENMAN. See Newton v. Harland, C. P. Vol. V. page 13.

5. To hear Judgment.—The new rule (3rd Order, 21st December, 1833) respecting the service of subpœnas to hear judgment applies to both plaintiffs and defendants, and the affidavits required to be produced by a defendant verifying the service of subpœnas to hear judgment must be such as is required to be produced by a plaintiff. *Rigg v. ## SUMMONS, WRIT OF.

1. Informal.—A writ of summons merely required the defendant to cause an appearance to be entered for him in the "Court of Exchequer." The defendant moved for a rule to set aside the service, on the ground of irregularity, because the writ did not say whether the defendant was to appear in the Court of Exchequer or in the "Exchequer of Pleas," whereby the defendant did not know where to make his appearance. Rule refused. Salmond v. Rollin, Ex. III. 186.

2. An omission of the letter "d" in the word "and," as given in the statute form, is immaterial. Id.

It depends upon the form given by the act of parliament, and that is "in our Court of ——" without stating any court; no precise form is therefore given by which to designate this court in particular, per Parker, B. Id.

TRANSFER.

An act authorizing the formation of a Joint Stock Company required all transfers of shares to be made by deed, under the hands and seals of both parties by "deed and conveyance," the plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract by letter for the sale and purchase of shares. W. P., and in the transfer from R. W. P. a blank was left for the name of the purchaser (the plaintiff); before the transfer was so made by R. W. P. in blank, he had not paid the calls upon the shares—no opinion was given by the court as to the latter objection, but as to the transfer made in blank: held, that such a transfer executed with a blank left for the name of the transferee which was to be inserted after it was executed was void at the common law. *Hebblewhite v. 2. Liability of.—If trustees lend money upon personal security, the court will hold it as no security at all, and consider the money as actually remaining in the trustees' hands, and deal with them as if they had the money actually in their own pockets. Dalton v. Hobhouse, V. C. I. 390.

3. Non-liability of.—The court will relieve trustees from liability, where the trust funds have been misapplied or placed on an insufficient security by the agency of the cestui que trust. White v. Smith, M. R. II. 71.

4. Protection in case of difficulty.—The trustees of a marriage settlement lent part of the trust fund to the husband, with the concurrence of the wife on a security, not warranted by the settlement: held, that the executors of the surviving trustee had a right to maintain a bill against the husband, and the other cestui que trusts for the restitution of the fund. Where persons undertake to be trustees, they are not entitled to act with caprice, but if they find the trust property involved in complicated questions, which they did not contemplate when they undertook the trusteeship, they have a right to come to the court for relief, and it will judge of the circumstances. Greenwood v. Wakeford, M. R. II. 372.

5. Suits against.—Where the next friend of a cestui que trust, who though of age was too incompetent to be trusted with her own affairs, filed a bill against her trustees for an account, to which they did not object, but were desirous of discharging themselves by a final decree upon the bill. The court observed that the appointment of a next friend would be a security for the trustees, and ordered the usual decree for an account. Wilkinson v. Harwood, L. C. III. 85.

A bequest to trustees and executors, "and the survivor and survivors of them, and the executors and administrators of such survivor," is not a personal confidence. Id. Per Ld. Langdale.

6. The court will not punish a trustee for defending himself, and a plaintiff who unadvisedly sues a trustee without effect will not be allowed to restrain such trustee from levying costs. Murley v. Greenham, L. C. I. 390.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER.

1. Abstract.—An estate was sold subject to certain conditions of sale, one of which was that the vendor would deliver "an abstract" within twenty days, and that any objections thereto, which should not be made in writing within ten days after such delivery, should be considered as waived. Another condition was "that in case the purchaser should raise and insist upon objections not provided for by the conditions, and which the vendor should not be able or willing to remove, the vendor might rescind the contract on his repaying the deposit without interest or costs. An imperfect abstract was delivered on the 27th February, 1839, the purchaser delivered objections on the 9th March, which not being cleared up, he commenced an action to recover his deposit-money, interest and costs, an injunction to stay the proceedings was refused. Tunner v. Smith, L. C. on appeal, IV. 358.

2. Limited interest of Vendor.—Abatement of Purchase-money.—Where a vendor had only a limited interest in an estate, which he had contracted to sell, and was thereby incapable of performing the whole of the contract; the purchaser, if he chooses to accept less than the amount of his contract, is entitled to a conveyance of such part of the estate contracted to be sold as the vendor can make a good title to, and also to an abatement out of the purchase-money to compensate for the difference in value between the estate contracted for and that conveyed. Graham v. Oliver, M. R. IV. 168.

3. Deposit money.—Re-sale.—Interpleader.—Fem-

ployed H, an auctioneer, to sell some property, whereof C became the purchaser, and at the time of sale paid a deposit of 134*l.* to H. C failed to complete, and after a lapse of two years, F alleging that fact, again employed H to sell the property, which was then purchased by V, and he paid H a second deposit of 128*l.* It appeared that F had acted as the agent of T, who was the real owner of the property, and who on disputes taking place, sued H for both deposits, upon which he obtained a judge's order for C, V, and T to interplead, but on the hearing, the judge declined to interfere in the matter. H then caused notice to be given to the attorneys who appeared for the other parties at such hearing, that he intended to file a bill of interpleader and injunction against them, unless the matter was arranged. They replied to this notice, but took no steps to determine the right to the deposits. H then filed his bill, and obtained an injunction, restraining the vendor and purchasers from proceeding at law against him: held, that the right of the first purchaser to a specific performance must be disposed of before the claim to his deposit could be settled, and upon that depended the next question, whether the second purchaser was entitled to his deposit with a compensation for breach of contract; the court refused to determine any thing in the way of interpleader, until the question of specific performance was determined, but granted the injunction, and ordered H (the auctioneer) to have his costs of the action, and of the suit out of the fund in court (both deposits). Hoggart v. Cutts and others. M. R. IV. 230. See V. 391. on appeal, L. C.

4. Interest.—A purchaser cannot recover damages for loss of interest during the continuance of negotiations carried on after the day appointed for completing a contract, which is finally abandoned, without averring in his declaration a readiness to perform the contract, on his part after such day, or alleging that by a subsequent agreement, the contract had been enlarged to a reasonable time, within which a further breach of the contract had been committed. Metcalf v. Fowler, Ex. IV. 430.

5. Laches.—Lapse of time, a bar to specific performance.—In 1818, R agreed to purchase certain premises of S for 50*l.* and paid 30*l.* at the time, the contract was entered into. No legal assurance was made, S died in 1823, having devised the premises to his wife, who died in 1824, having also devised them. After her death, some negotiation took place respecting the estate. A draft conveyance was prepared, but nothing further done until 1834, when a bill for specific performance was filed by R against the executor of S, which was dismissed. Reynier v. Green, M. R. IV. 107.

6. Possession, character of purchaser in, until purchase money paid.—A agreed to purchase land of B, and paid a deposit, and agreed to pay the remainder of the purchase money on a given day, with interest thereon in the meantime, upon condition that he should take immediate possession: he entered accordingly and commenced building; but difficulties having arisen between the parties, and the purchase money not being paid at the time stipulated or the interest regularly, ejectment was brought by B, no notice to quit having been previously given, but possession was demanded by B: held, that this was only a tenancy at will which might be determined by demand of possession. Dee d. Thomas v. Chamberlain, Ex. I. 393.

7. Possession, taken by a purchaser by mistake.—Where the agent of a joint stock company took possession of land by mistake, and without showing any deliberate intention on the part of the company to take such possession otherwise than in the ordinary way, and on discovering his error had immediately taken such steps as he considered to rectify it; a motion to pay purchase money into court was therefore under these circumstances refused. Tomlinson v. Manchester and Birmingham Railway Company, V. C. IV. 167.

8. The rule is, that where a purchaser deliberately takes possession, and is in the possession of land, he shall not be at liberty to retain such possession, and at the same time keep back the payment of the purchase money. Id. See also Cattell v. Simons, M. R. III. 407.

9. Real estate devised to trustees for sale, and the trustees were authorized to give effectual receipts for the purchase money, and the purchasers were not to see to its application, and the trustees were to stand possessed of the purchase money upon trust for six daughters, (English women,) some of whom married Frenchmen, resided in France and had children; an objection made to the title on the ground of their being aliens, was overruled. De Houmelin v. Sheldon, M. R. I. 42. Id. 218. L. C. II. 84. Judgment of M. R. affirmed, 6th Nov. 1839. MSS.

WARRANT OF ATTORNEY.

1. Execution of, under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 9. attested by plaintiff's attorney.—Where a warrant of attorney was given as a collateral security with a mortgage for securing a sum of money, and the warrant of attorney was attested by the attorney then acting for the mortgagee, but who had been occasionally called upon to act for the mortgagor—the court set it aside, although the mortgagor declined to call in another professional adviser, when recommended by that attorney to do so, on the ground that he wished his affairs to be kept as private as possible; but the court refused to interfere by ordering the mortgage and securities to be given up, which was the subject of a Court of Equity. Rising v. Dolphin, B. C. III. 310.

2. Execution of, attested by an Attorney acting for both parties.—Where a warrant of attorney was attested by an attorney, who alone was present and attested its execution, but who had previously, and on the occasion of making the warrant of attorney, acted as the attorney for the plaintiff, to whom he made out his bill of costs for preparing the warrant of attorney: the Court held that the attorney must be taken to have acted as the attorney for the plaintiff, and not for the defendant; that wherever there was only one attorney present at such transactions, it ought clearly to appear that he acted in no manner for the party to whom the security is given; and that the warrant of attorney was bad. Saunders v. Westley, Ex. IV. 78.

3. Nomination of attesting attorney by the plaintiff's attorney.—It is not necessary for a party executing a warrant of attorney to originate and primarily suggest the name of an attorney to attest its execution; it is sufficient if he spontaneously adopts an attorney mentioned to him even by the plaintiff's attorney, and that attorney attests the execution as required by the act. Taylor v. Nicholl, Ex. III. 362. RULE ESTABLISHED.

4. A was indebted to B in a sum of money, for which A agreed to give his warrant of attorney. B instructed his attorney to prepare such an instrument, which he accordingly did, and called upon A to execute it, telling him that some professional person must be present on his executing the instrument, and said "I will send Mr. S. to attend on your behalf." Mr. S. attended accordingly, and explained the instrument to A, and asked him whether he wished him to attest it on his behalf, to which he replied in the affirmative. The Court held that the provisions of the act had not been complied with, and the warrant of attorney was set aside. Gripper v. Barstow, Ex. IV. 300.

To bring a case within the act, it must appear that the defendant understood that he had an option on the subject. If that were so, and the nomination or recommendation of a professional man by the plaintiff's attorney was confirmed or adopted subsequently by him, (as was the case in Taylor v. Nicholls, ante 3.), then the act would be substantially complied with. Per ALDERSON, B. Id. See Bligh v. Brewer, 1 C. M. & R. 650.

5. Revival of Judgment on.—A judgment was entered up against a defendant in pursuance of a warrant of attorney, but no execution was issued thereon until five years afterwards, and previous to its being done then the defendant signed an agreement in writing, "admitting the debt due, and consenting to the plaintiff's issuing execution without a writ of scire facias, although there might have been no execution within a year and a day." A fiat of bankruptcy issued against the debtor: held, that this being a simple agreement between a debtor and a creditor, involving no interests of third parties, it was sufficient to dispense with the necessity of a scire facias, there being no fraud shown on the part of the defendant. Morris v. King, Q. B. IV. 249.

WARRANTY.

In an action against the builder of a barge for a breach of a warranty, that "it was fit for use at the time of sale," the jury was directed to decide "whether the barge was, at the time of delivery, fit for use, considering its nature and condition, or whether it was unfit, and that through the carelessness of the defendant in building it." Shephard v. Pybus, IV. 171.

WAY, RIGHT OF.

To an action of trespass the defendant pleaded a justification under 2 & 3 W. 4. c. 71. s. 2, and by two of his pleas set up a user for twenty years and forty years, the pleas were not made out by the evidence, which did not show a user for the last four or five years, and the plaintiff had a verdict which the Court refused to set aside, observing that "user up to the day of action brought is not required, yet user up to a reasonable time must be shown, and certainly three or four years used cannot be presumed in order to support a plea of this kind. Parker v. Mitchell, C. P. IV. 108. See Vol. IV. 148. for an essay on the Prescription Act.

WILLS.

1. Acknowledgment of signature to.—Where a testatrix prepared her own will, and acknowledged the signature thereto in the presence of two witnesses, but at different times and apart from each other, the acknowledgment was held insufficient under the stat. 1 Vict. c. 26. s. 9. In re Bligh, Pre. C. I. 7.

2. A will was executed in the presence of one witness, who attested that execution; subsequently the testator acknowledged his signature in the presence of three witnesses, who then attested it: held a sufficient acknowledgment. In re Regan, P. C. I. 7.

2* A will was signed in the presence of one witness, and afterwards, on the same day, was acknowledged in the presence of such witness and in that of another person, and declared it to be her hand-writing: held to be a sufficient signature within the statute. In re Wordington, P. C. I. 362.

3. A testatrix wrote her will and signed it, but not in the presence of any witnesses. She afterwards sent for witnesses, and on their arrival she thus expressed herself, "I am very glad of it, thank God." She then requested them to witness the will, which they did in her and each other's presence: held a sufficient signature. In re Warner, Pre. C. I. 362.

4. Erasures and obliterations.—Where the deceased left a will attested by two witnesses, but without date, and in a bequest therein of a legacy of one thousand pounds, the word "one" was written upon an erasure. The court, on proof by the only witness residing in England, that the word "one" was in the testator's hand-writing, although he, the witness, could not state whether the alteration was made before or after execution, and by the person who found the will, that he noticed the alteration at the time of such finding: probate was decreed on the presumption that the alteration was made before signature. In re Teesdale, P. C. III. 364.

5. Interlineations.—In a codicil, whereby a testator bequeathed a legacy of 50*l.* to two servants, the words "each of" appeared to have been interlined, and the interlineation was unattested, and the time of its being made could not be ascertained. The interlineation being in the testator's handwriting: probate was decreed with the interlineation on the presumption that it was made before the codicil was executed. In re Sheriffe, P. C. IV. 251.

6. Attestation in testator's absence.—Where the deceased had made several wills, and on the day of his decease executed a codicil in the presence of two witnesses, who took the codicil into another room, and there, in the presence of each other, attested it in the testator's absence: the court refused probate. In re Newman, P. C. I. 110.

7. Where a testator made a codicil, and having signed it in the presence of two witnesses, left the room, and the witnesses then attested the will in the testator's absence: the attestation was held insufficient. In re Brown, P. C. III. 342.

8. The person who prepared a will, after its signature by the testator, took it away, and, with another person who never saw the testator at all, signed the attestation clause: probate was refused. In re Hillier, Pre. C. IV. 94.

9. Where the witnesses to the execution of a will did not sign their names in the room where the deceased was, but carried it into an adjoining room separated by a passage, and there attested it. Although the doors were open, and the witnesses could hear the deceased breathe but could not see him. The court refused probate. In re Ellis, Pre. C. IV. 110.

10. Attestation where a testator may not see the witnesses.—A testator who was in bed and the curtains drawn on both sides and close at the foot, acknowledged and signed a will; the witnesses were in the bed-room, one of them attested it on a table in the room at the foot of the bed, the curtains remaining closed: held, upon the true construction of the act, that where a paper is executed by the deceased in the same room where the witnesses are who attest in this same room where the testator was at the time: held that they do attest in the presence of the testator, though he may actually see or could not see them sign, and probate was decreed. Newton v. Clark, Pre. C. III. 167. See cases there cited.

11. Cancellation.—Where a testator left a will from which he had cut out his signature, with an intention of making a new will, which failed of being carried into effect by the invalidity of the latter instrument: it was held that such cutting amounted to a cancellation under the recent act. Hobbs v. Knight, Pre. C. I. 6.

The act does not contain the words "cancelling and obliterating," but has substituted the words "otherwise destroying." Id.

12. Dateless.—A codicil, in the handwriting of the testator, but unattested and without date, will be presumed to have been made before the new act came into operation, unless such presumption is rebutted by other circumstances, and the court will in such cases suppose prima facie, that a will or codicil was made according to the laws in force at the time. Re Pechell, Pre. C. II. 189.

13. Attorney, Drawer of, made Executor and Residuary Legatee.—A will drawn by a solicitor who was made executor and residuary legatee after some small annuities were paid. The will was disputed by a niece of the testator on the ground that it was obtained by imposition from a weak and incapable testator: held, that the evidence was not sufficient to sustain the act, and probate was refused. Dentling v. Loveland, P. C. I. 269—343.

If a person, whether he be an attorney or not, prepares a will whereby a legacy is bequeathed to himself, the vigilance and jealousy of the court is awakened, and the circumstance viewed with suspicion more or less, according to facts of the particular case. In some cases circumstances of this nature have no weighty importance attached to them, and the rule generally varies according to circumstances; for instance, the quantum of the legacy, and the proportion it bears to the property disposed of, and numerous other contingencies. But in no case will such circumstance amount to more than an inducement to the court to exercise vigilance and circumspection in its investigations, in order that probate may not be granted without full and entire satisfaction that the instrument expressed the testator's intentions. Id.

14. Concealment of, from a Wife.—Where the attesting witnesses to a will admitted in their depositions that means and contrivances were used to keep the wife of the testator ignorant of its execution, and in which they co-operated: held, that the witnesses had made themselves parties to concerted schemes and conspiracies to obtain the will by fraud, and on the evidence of such witnesses, refused to pronounce for the validity of the will. Wintle v. Wintle, Pre. C. I. 379.

15. Execution, proof of due.—Where a will on the face of it appeared to have been duly executed and attested by two witnesses, but from an affidavit (which, by a rule of the court, is required in cases where the attestation clause does not expressly declare that the testator signed the will in the presence of both the witnesses, who were present at the same time, and subscribed their names in the presence of the testator) it appeared that the instrument was not so executed, the court refused probate. In re Ayling, Pre. C. I. 48.

16. The court will not permit a witness to be re-examined in order to supply a deficiency in the proof of the execution of a will discovered after publication of evidence. In re Richards, P. C. III. 396.

17. By executors after renunciation.—An executor, being also a legatee, and having intermeddled with the effects, subsequently renounced and assigned his legacy: held, that he had sufficiently divested himself of his interest, so as to be a competent witness in a suit. Mundy v. Slaughter, Pre. C. I. 248. II. 30.

18. Signature must be at the foot or end.—A testator duly made and executed his will, but after the signature and attestation, was written an appointment of executors: held, that, this was not such a signing at the "foot or end" as required by the act, and probate was refused. In re Howard, Pre. C. II. 343.

19. The court refused probate in a case where the testator had written his will on two sides of a sheet of paper, but had with the witnesses signed and attested it on the first side only. In re Millward, Pre. C. I. 47.

20. Signature in pencil.—A will in the testator's own handwriting dated and signed in pencil was held to be admitted to probate, and not to be regarded as a deliberative paper only. In re Roberts, Pre. C. IV. 363.

21. Signed by another person for a testator.—A will signed by another person for a testator thus: "Signed on behalf of the testator and by his directions by me," and the testator acknowledged the signature in the presence of his wife and mother who attested the will: held, that the wife's interest under the will was void, and probate was decreed. In re Clarke, Pre. C. I. 316.

22. Husband of legatee incompetent as witness.—An attesting witness to a will, who subsequently marries one of the legatees, is an incompetent witness to prove the validity of that will. M'Kensie v. Yeo, Pre. C. IV. 223.

23. Loss of.—Where a will was lost by accident before probate had been obtained, the court granted probate of a copy until the original should be found. In re Bramfield, Pre. C. II. 393.

24. "Mariner."—The term "mariner" or seaman, in section 11 of the New Will Act, comprehends all persons in her majesty's navy—though superior officers of the ship—being at sea: probate was allowed of the unattested codicil of a purser of a man-of-war (a warrant officer) dying at sea. In re Hayes, Pre. C. II. 279.

25. Soldiers.—A surgeon of the East India Company's service on board one of her Majesty's ships in charge of recruits for the Queen's service is a "soldier" in actual military service within the meaning of the new Will Act. In re Donaldson, Pre. C. IV. 124.

26. Obliterations, effect of.—A will duly made and executed before the New Will Act came into operation, with unattested obliterations made since: held that the obliterations were of no effect, and probate was decreed as to the erasures in blank. Reeve v. Kent, Pre. C. III. 311.

27. Revocation.—Where a deceased had duly made and executed his will, but subsequently his wife died, and he quarrelled with all his sons, and made various alterations in his will, cutting them off with a shilling. At his death the will was found with these obliterations and alterations, and with the names of the attesting witnesses erased: held, that the will was revoked, that the deceased died intestate. Holly v. Munnings, Pre. C. III. 88.

28. The drawing a pen through the testator's name and across the attesting clause is not a revocation under the new Will Act. In re Stephens, Pre. C. IV. 144.

29. Suicides.—A testator committed suicide the day after he made his will, and the coroner's jury returned a verdict of temporary insanity. Upon evidence that he was of sane mind, probate was decreed. See in re Thompson, Pre. C. IV. 61.
